AUTUMN.

BY THE EDITOR.

FATHER of Mercies, God of love,
Whose gifts all creatures share,
The rolling seasons as they move
Proclaim thy constant care.

When in the bosom of the earth
The sower hid the grain,
Thy goodness marked its secret birth,
And sent the early rain.

The spring's sweet influence, Lord, was thine,
The seasons knew thy call:
Thou mad'st the summer sun to shine,
The summer dews to fall.

Thy gifts of mercy from above
Matured the swelling grain;
And now the harvest crowns thy love,
And plenty fills the plain.

Oh, ne'er may our forgetful hearts
O'erlook thy bounteous care;
But what our Father's hand imparts
Still own in praise and prayer.

To Father, Son, and Holy Ghost,
The God whom we adore,
Be glory as it was, is now,
And shall be evermore.

IT is pleasant to leave the hot, hard pavements of a city for the meadow's cool green sward; pent-up streets for a spacious but sequestered valley; dull walls of brick or stone for the height and majesty of mountains that dip their feet in the lake, and raise their heads to the clouds; the roar of carriages and din of crowds for a quiet scene, whose only sounds are those of bleating sheep and lowing cattle, the murmur of a stream or dash of tiny waves on the shelving shore, the shouts of happy reapers where the corn falls to their sickles, or is borne off to threshing-floors. Every man of taste enjoys the beauties of such a scene; and a man of devout, habitual piety sees God as plainly mirrored there, as are the flowers, trees, rocks, and hills in the glassy surface of its lake.

Such appear to have been the circumstances of David, when in the 65th Psalm he composed that magnificent ode,—grand song for a Harvest Home,—where he adores God in Nature and soars on the wings of inspiration to the height of his argument. No doubt descriptions of country scenes, glowing with the rich colours of Thomson or Goldsmith, have been penned in city garrets. But while their authors, drawing on imagination, saw no more of green things and nature than some poor rose, or dusty plant of thyme that stood on the window sill, thirsting for a shower and drooping for lack of sunshine, that Psalm has the freshness of painting where the artist, carrying palette and canvas to the open fields, copies direct from Nature. The very mountains appear to have been towering before David, of which, singing God's praise, he says, "Which by his strength setteth fast the mountains;" overhead, the clouds, heaven's treasuries of rain, floated in the blue air, and below, winding along, went the river that sparkled in the sun, and, conducted by a thousand conduits, gave fertility to the soil, of which he said, "Thou visitest the earth, and waterest it: thou greatly enrichest it with the river of God: thou makest it soft with showers: thou blessest the springing thereof;" and when, still rising from nature up to nature's God, he sung, "Thou crownest the year with thy goodness; and thy paths drop fatness; the pastures are clothed with flocks, the valleys also are covered over with corn; they shout for joy, they also sing," one cannot but feel that the scene was before him—hills dotted with snowy fleeces, and an umbrageous valley where crowded reapers, to shouts, and song, and merry laughter, made wide gaps in the golden corn. The scenes of autumn raised David's mind to God. And well they may ours; for in meditating on this period of the year, I may remark, that Autumn is the season in which God is eminently, or rather pre-eminently visible.

It is a remarkable fact, that, notwithstanding the progress of arts and science, and the vast number of useful as well as brilliant discoveries man has made during the last four thousand years, he has not added so much as one new grain to those he cultivates for food. Sculptured monuments, as old as, if not older than, the days of Joseph, show that wheat, barley, and our other grains were well known to the Egyptians; as well known in the early ages of the world as in this. Another, and a no less remarkable fact is this, that the cereal grasses—by which we mean those plants that yield wheat, barley, and such other grains—are nowhere, on the face of all the earth, found growing wild. Apparently unable to live by self-sowing, they have totally disappeared from every country which man, abandoning, has left to its own resources—flowers, forests, fruit trees, roofless cities and ruined temples remain, but no stalks of corn, to tell that he once was there. If they cannot live now, it seems fair to conclude, that these plants never did live without his culture; and that the knowledge of their uses and of their modes of cultivation he owed to the direct instruction of Him, his teacher in this as in many things else, who, to quote the words of Scripture, "took the man, and put him in the garden of Eden to dress and keep it."

These facts suggest such an intercourse between man and his Maker as corresponds with Scripture, and those hints it gives of the intimate and happy communion in which they lived, till man fell and sin estranged them. Ignorant of these things, and, at least to appearance, altogether ignoring Divine Providence, one of our poets ascribes the bounties of harvest to human industry alone, and, thrusting God entirely out of view, sings:

Attempered sun arise,
Sweet beamed, and shedding oft through lucid clouds
A pleasing calm; while broad and brown below
Extensive harvests hang the heavy head,
* * * * * *
Far as the circling eye can shoot around
Unbounded tossing in a flood of corn.
These are thy blessings, Industry! rough power!
Whom labour still attends, and sweat, and pain,
Raiser of human kind! by nature cast,
Naked and helpless, out amid the woods
And wilds, to rude inclement elements;
With various seeds of art deep in the mind
Implanted, and profusely poured around
Materials infinite, but idle all,
Still unexerted, in the unconscious breast,
Slept the lethargic powers; Corruption still Voracious, swallowed what the liberal hand
Of Bounty scattered o'er the savage year;
And still the sad barbarian, roving, mixed
With beasts of prey; or for his acorn meal Fought the fierce tusky boar; a shivering wretch!
* * * till Industry approached
And roused him from his miserable sloth:
His faculties unfolded; pointed out
Where lavish nature the directing hand
Of art demanded.

Giving all the honour to human industry and its triumphs which is due, the heathen themselves teach us to bring a higher actor than man upon the scene. They recognised their dependence for the bounties of harvest on the will and providence of God—by this grand truth redeeming from childishness some of their wildest legends, and softening to some extent the savage features of customs from which humanity revolts. A tribe in our Indian Empire, for example, never sowed their fields till they had first taken steps to propitiate their god. These, as was related to me by an officer who had had charge of their district, consisted of a human sacrifice, offered up in the person of a prisoner of war, around whom the peasants stood grimly, knife in hand; each ready, so soon as the fatal blow was struck, to rush in on the victim, slice a piece of flesh from the bleeding corpse, and, hastening with it to his fields, sprinkle them with the dripping gore. Neither the pity with which, spectators of such a murderous scene, we should have looked on the trembling victim, nor the horror with which we would have turned our eyes from such savage rites, could blind them to the fact, that these heathen, however culpable and revolting their mode of expressing it, owned a power superior to human industry, and in the harvests of their fruitful fields, saw God, to use the words of David, "crowning the year with His goodness."

The Greeks attributed man's first knowledge of the arts of agriculture to other than his own genius. They regarded them as a revelation, not a discovery; and ascribed them directly to Divine instruction. According to their mythology, Ceres, the goddess of corn and harvests, who gives her name to that family of plants which, called cereal grasses, yield wheat, barley, and such other grains, first taught a native of Attica the art of husbandry. She showed him how to plough the ground; how to sow and reap corn; how to make bread, and cultivate fruit trees. Nor did the benignant divinity stop there. Reminding us of the true story that relates how Jesus sent his disciples forth to carry the tidings of salvation to a perishing world, the legend, rising to worthy ideas of what a God should be and do, relates that Ceres, having presented her own chariot to her disciple, commanded him to take farewell of his native land, and travel all over the earth to communicate the arts of agriculture to its rude inhabitants—who had till then subsisted on nothing better than roots and acorns.

We find a nation more ancient than the Greeks who also regarded agriculture as a Divine gift, and recognised in the fruits of harvest more than the industry of man; even the providence and power of God. These were the Egyptians. According to them, it was Isis, one of their most celebrated deities, who, on being changed into a cow and afterwards restored to the human form, communicated to their ancestors man's earliest knowledge of the arts of husbandry. In acknowledgment of the gift and in honour of the giver, they worshipped her under the form of a woman, holding a globe in her hands, and also a vessel filled with ears of corn. Nor did they consider themselves indebted to Isis for the knowledge of agriculture only; but plainly, though in a wild and weird legend, attributed to her benignant influence the bounties of every harvest. In Egypt, as is well known, these depend on the overflowings of the Nile; and, as the story ran, it was to the tears she shed over the body of Osiris, her murdered brother, that the country owed those annual inundations which imparted such fertility to the soil of Egypt as made it the granary of the world.

In these old legends, who may not recognise traditions — though changed and distorted—of those early days when man had God for his teacher, and Eden for his home—a proof and illustration of our statement that in Autumn, with its ripened fruits and golden harvests, the power and providence of God are pre eminently conspicuous? Not that the other seasons do not also proclaim his glory. They do, were it by nothing else than their regular succession. It was reckoned a great triumph of human art when they constructed a chronometer in London which formed perhaps man's nearest approach in mechanism to the perfection of the works of God—a time-piece which, after being carried round the globe, was found on the ship's return to have deviated from true time by two seconds only in the course of a whole year. But the seasons are regulated by a clock which, placed in the heavens, has gone on without mending or winding, not for one year, nor a hundred, nor a thousand, but many thousand years with undeviating regularity. How manifold are thy works, Lord God Almighty; in wisdom hast thou made them all! In their unfailing succession how do the seasons display thy providence, and illustrate thy promise, given beneath the rainbow, by a mountain altar and beside the stranded ark, "While the earth remaineth seed-time and harvest, and cold and heat, and summer and winter, and day and night, shall not cease."

Whether the phenomena be those of winter, when streams lie locked in ice, and the earth looks dead, wrapped in a shroud of snow; or of spring, at whose call nature undergoes an annual resurrection, and leaves her grave in the bloom of a perpetual youth; or of summer, gay with flowers; or of autumn, crowned with ears of nodding corn, "all thy works praise thee, O God, and show forth thy glory." And, thanks to science, each new discovery in the realms of nature but confirms our faith in the Word of God; and, like the steps of one who climbs a mountain, enlarges our views of the goodness, wisdom, and power of Him who is the Maker and Monarch of all. Yet autumn is the only one of the seasons when the Church, in days of thanksgiving, calls her members specially to own and praise the goodness of God. And why but because it is specially conspicuous when in bountiful harvests He crowns the year with his goodness, and supplies those who seek daily bread with a twelvemonth's store—in overflowing barns and swelling stack-yards, with food for a whole year to come?

Autumn crowns the other seasons. It shows God's work complete and finished; and therefore glorifies Him most—the other seasons being but preparatory steps to this. Winter prepares the bed for the seed; its pause resting, its snows and rains watering, and its swelling frosts breaking up the soil. Spring, with soft and warm breath wakens the vitality of the buried grain; from its dry and husky form evoking a green tiny blade. With her showers of light and heat, with cooling rain and burning sunshine, summer nourishes the tender plant, developing the flowers that are the parents of the precious fruit. Lord of the year, these "cast up" the way for the approach of Autumn, and so the poet of the "Seasons" sings—

> Crowned with the sickle and the wheaten sheaf,
> While Autumn, nodding o'er the yellow plain,
> Comes jovial on; the Doric reed once more,
> Well pleased, I tune. Whate'er the wintry frost
> Nitrous prepared; the various blossom'd spring,
> Put in white promise forth; and summer suns
> Concocted strong, rush boundless now to view,
> Full, perfect all, and swell my glorious theme.

Stop in midsummer, and the seasons and labour that preceded is labour lost,—it were the springing of an arch without its key-stone, or the walls of a house without roof and coping. It is when fields, once white with winter snow, once green with reedy leaves, once waving in the wind with upright heads and empty ears, grow golden, fall to bands of joyous reapers, are borne from the rough stubble to full barn-yards and busy mills, it is then that God comes forth from the clouds and darkness around his throne, the Father and Friend of all—crowning the year with his goodness, and giving bread to both his praying and prayerless creatures. We crown autumn with ears of corn; and she, as the Jews did with their first fruits, carries her golden treasures to the Temple and lays them on the altar of her God. She crowns Him with her honours; to Him, as having blessed the labours of the husbandman, and guided the secret processes of nature, and directed the procession of revolving seasons, and distributed the proportions of shower and sunshine, ascribing the glory and praise that are due.

Autumn is a joyous season.

The harvest was particularly so in old times; especially in that happy land where God, their lawgiver, directed the Israelites both how to cultivate, and how to reap the ground. "Thou shalt not sow thy field," He said, "with mingled seed; thou shalt not plow with an ox and an ass together." In Italy I have often seen an ox and an ass in the same yoke; nor do these injunctions forbid it. Made for the Jews, to whose circumstances they were adapted, and whom they were intended to warn against intercourse and especially intermarriages with the surrounding heathen, their authority has passed away ; but not so, at least in spirit, those harvest laws which God enjoined on Israel. What benevolence breathes, what grand lessons of humanity are embodied, in the following rules :—"When ye reap the harvest of your land, thou shalt not wholly reap the corners of thy field, neither shalt thou gather the gleanings of thy harvest . . . thou shalt leave them for the poor and stranger . . . When thou cuttest down thine harvest in thy field, and hast forgot a sheaf in the field, thou shalt not go again to fetch it: it shall be for the stranger, for the fatherless, and for the widow. When thou beatest thine olive tree, thou shalt not go over the boughs again, it shall be for the stranger, for the fatherless, and for the widow. When thou gatherest the grapes of thy vineyard, thou shalt not glean it afterward : it shall be for the stranger, for the fatherless, and for the widow. And thou shalt remember that thou wast a bondman in the land of Egypt : therefore I command thee to do this thing."

The result of laws so well adapted to foster the spirit of humanity, we see in that charming picture of a harvest field which adorns the pages of the Book of Ruth. There, save where stiff old age or tender childhood seek to earn a little wage, the reapers, fair women and stalwart youths, a blithe and merry band, go down in steady line on the ranks of the standing corn. Behind them, scattered over the stubble, where some bend beneath the weight of years, and others are busier with play than work, come old men and women, widows, and orphan children, gleaning the stray stalks, left for them and the birds of heaven, growing into a sheaf of corn which, borne on their heads, they carry home at nightfall to grind in the household mill, to eat and be satisfied, and praise Him, who, kind guardian of the poor, said to the husbandman, "Thou shalt not gather the gleanings of thy harvest." Well, one day on the uplands of Bethlehem, the sun is shining bright, and with song and challenge and merry laughter the reapers ply their flashing sickles amid the corn, when the master appears on the scene. A kind man is Boaz, and pious as kind. "The Lord be with you," is his "good morning" to his servants,—the familiar but devout wish he offers. Suspending work and song to do him reverence, they in turn illustrate a rule that may be as well expressed by the words, "such master, such servants," as by those in more common use, "such priest, such people,"—"The Lord bless thee," is their respectful, kind, and devout response. And now, not deeming the poor beneath his notice, the good man turns from the reapers to the gleaners, and among these pensioners of God's bounty and his own, his eye lights on a widow, young in years but of modest mien. Poorly clad and of a sad countenance, early acquainted with sorrow, a widow, friendless, a stranger in a strange land, the gentle Ruth appeals to the kindliest feelings of a noble heart. Nor in vain. Her whom ruthless villany would have marked down for its prey, he commends to the care of virtuous maidens, and with a delicate attention to the feelings of the poor, worthy as well of our imitation as of our praise, he whispers to the reapers, "Let fall some handfuls of purpose for her, and leave them that she may glean them." Beautiful picture ! one we love to dwell on.

Our modern system of husbandry has blotted all this out. We have bigger stacks ; we make more money ; but it may be a question whether the country has not lost more morally than it has gained materially by the change—lost more in the dying out of these old kindly customs than gained in the greater produce of the soil. Nor is it possible to look on this picture of an old harvest field, lighted up with the sunshine of human kindness, without some feeling of regret that such scenes belong to the past, and, only found now in books and picture-galleries, are numbered with the things that were.

Still, with its harvests and the bounties of the year, Autumn is a gladsome season. One is glad of it for the sake of the very birds, the sweet choristers of bush and field, and many other creatures else. They rejoice and revel in its profusion ; and, storing up its bounties in hollow tree or homes beneath the ground, are provisioned against the storms of winter. How dead his soul in whom it awakens no feelings of gladness and gratitude to see, in fields where the sheaves stand thick and tall, plenty for man and beast ; ground to hope that the poor of the land shall eat and be satisfied, and praise the name of the Lord their God.

Its very labours present a cheerful aspect. What sights so pleasant as those it offers ? What toil where the sweat in which man eats his bread wears less the aspect of a curse ? The blue sky flecked with snowy clouds, the neighbouring wood where some late songster peals out her music tinted with the colours of the rainbow, the long stretches of golden corn that bespeak food and plenty, the healthful breeze wantoning with the ruddy cheek and dishevelled hair of youthful reapers, the bright flashes of the sickle, the brighter flashes of happy faces, the merry laughter of light hearts, the robust health that makes a play of work, how pleasant the spectacle ! How different the sunless room in the crowded city, where the workman sits, pale and lonesome, breathing a stifling atmosphere ; or the tall mill, where wan and ill-developed forms stand amid ceaseless whirr and dust, watching from early morn to night the threads and flying spindles ; or the forge where, begrimed with smoke and stunned with din, half naked men swing the heavy hammer and blow the roaring fire ; or the dripping pit, where the grim miner, leaving the sun and green fields, descends to pass his days in the regions of perpetual night, perilling life for the treasures the earth hides in her bowels. What greater contrast than a pale, sickly needlewoman, toiling with thin fingers by the night lamp at her weary task in city garret or hot, crowded, stifling workshop, and yonder rustic maid with form to which health and out-door labour lend grace, mirth sparkling in her eyes, on her cheek roses that shine through the tan, in one hand a reaper's sickle, and in the other the nodding heads of corn. Alas ! that in many country districts their moral should correspond so ill with their material aspects. It is sad to think that beneath those charming scenes of rural beauty that culminate in the happy spectacle of a harvest field, there lies a coarseness of manners, and licentiousness of conduct that makes the innocence of country life, as contrasted with that of town life, an utter dream. The habits of the peasantry in some quarters are little higher than those of the cattle they tend—a sad and shameful fact; one which calls aloud for a remedy on the part of the ministers, parents, and masters of this Christian and Protestant land.

But to return to the gladsome and joyful aspects of this season. What a pleasant sight, when winds have winnowed the standing sheaves, to see the loaded cart rocking over the furrowed fields; grey-haired peasants who, bent and done with labour, are themselves ready to fall like a shock of corn in its season, leaning on their staves, and mothers with smiling infants in their arms, turning out of doors to see the last load borne home amid the shouts of brawny men, and smiles of maidens, and shrill cheers of troops of boys and girls, who, infected with the general happiness, swell the procession, and cheer—they know not why. And when early snows powder the hill tops, and russet leaves fly whirling through the air and sweep along the road, how pleasant in passing the snug farmstead amid these tokens of coming winter, to see the bounties of Providence stored under roof and thatch, safe from frosts and storm. The precious fruits of the earth safely lodged, let Harvest Home be celebrated. But with cheerfulness, let grateful thanks be given to Him who blessed the hands of labour, and whose paths, as He held the winds in his fist, and measured out due proportions of shower and sunshine, dropped fatness on fields that had otherwise been scorched with heat or drowned with rain. Where or at what other time are thoughtless folly and wild riot more reprehensible? Let people be happy by all means, but holy also; celebrating harvest homes in the spirit of the law which required the Jews to carry the first cut sheaf of corn to the house, and lay it, a pious offering, on the altar of God. The beastly riot, the drunkenness, and wild excesses of other days are happily disappearing from ours. May they everywhere, and soon, give place to the practice,—to her honour first begun in England,—where, with an ample feast and pleasant hours for all who shared in harvest labour, the fête is opened by an act of worship; and voices that rung with merry laughter amid the falling corn, and shouted as the last waggon swung in at the gate with its golden load, sweetly mingle in praise to Him to whose mercy we owe alike the bread that perisheth, and what never perisheth—Jesus, the bread of life.

Autumn is a solemn season.

Like a fine piece of music which now sinks into dying strains and now swells into a flood of melody, with passages both grave and gay, this season presents varied features—combining deeply solemn with bright and cheerful aspects. Now the mornings are cool and bracing, the days are clear, and the nights, lighted up by a full harvest moon, shine with unusual splendour; and if flowers, lingering only in gardens, and tempting the bee in the uplands where heather robes the hills in purple, have vanished from field and moor and meadow, the loss is largely compensated. In place of one uniform, sober robe of green, dulled by summer dust and heat, the woods assume the gayest garb, and glow with such bright and varied hues as sets at nought the pride of dress, and highest arts of painters. The tints of Autumn impart such beauty to the earth as glowing sunsets to the sky. Yet, as in that lovely victim of a fell disease, who sits cushioned in a sick chamber, with hands white as the snowy pillows that support her form, and eyes that shine with a strange, unusual lustre, and cheeks tinted like a delicate rose, the beauties of autumn are those of decay: and he who can hold converse with nature may, as if there were "tongues in trees," hear this solemn voice sounding forth on the ears of a heedless world, "We all do fade as a leaf." In these dying leaves, man beholds the affecting emblems of himself. Beautiful, but solemn sight, they teach us that by-and-by this life and world shall know us no more than the trees shall know them.

Autumn leaves fade to fall. The connection between their fragile forms and the stem grows weak, the flow of sap stagnates, and at length ceases—and they die; and now a wind, the howling herald of winter, strikes the tree and strips it naked. Flying leaves fill the troubled air, go whirling along the ground, and, swept from their parent stem to be scattered far and wide, present a sight that suggests sad thoughts to thoughtful minds—how sin has broken the holy ties which united us to God; how sinners are hurried away and along by the power of temptation; in the case of the best, how true the words, "Our iniquities like the wind have carried us away."

Here, thank God, the emblem ceases. Swept away by the gale, tossed by eddies into rotting heaps, left on roads to be trodden under foot and mingled with the mire, or dropped into brawling streams that convey them, madly dancing, to the river which flings its wreck ashore or floats them out to sea, they return no more to the parent from whose arms they were torn. But the ravages of sin are not irremediable. Whom it has carried away from God, Jesus has come to restore, and by faith in his blood restores,—"Hearken unto me, ye stout-hearted, that are far from righteousness, I bring near my righteousness." "Return ye backsliding children, and I will heal your backslidings." And such power does the grace of God impart to believers, that, though once like withered leaves, which winds whirl into the air, roll along the road, and seizing, fling into flood or fire, they now withstand temptations,—as a crag the roaring blast, or a tree with roots rifted in the solid rock, the tempest that may shake, but cannot remove it—"They that trust in the Lord, shall be as Mount Zion, which cannot be moved."

While her forests with their sere and yellow leaves warn us of our own decay and death, the fields of Autumn recall to thoughtful minds truths yet more solemn. These fields give as they get. This abundant crop, and that scanty one, teach us, that they who in prayers, sacrifices, and labours for the cause of God, sow sparingly, shall reap also sparingly, but that they, on the other hand, who sow bountifully, shall reap also bountifully—learning in heaven, if not on earth, that God loveth a large and cheerful giver.

Moreover, what husbandman ever reaped wheat from acres he sowed with barley? Be the season favourable or adverse, be the soil the richest loam or hungry moorland, as was the kind of seed sown in Spring, so is the kind of harvest reaped in Autumn. Even so, as in those fields where the same grain falls to the reaper's sickle that fell from the sower's hand, as man soweth in his life he shall reap at his death; "Be not deceived," says Paul, "God is not mocked; whatsoever a man soweth, that shall he also reap; for he that soweth to the flesh [indulges in the lusts of the flesh] shall of the flesh reap corruption [the miseries of hell]; but he that soweth to the Spirit, shall of the Spirit reap life everlasting."

Moreover, the season which reminds us of these truths reminds us of the grand occasion when they shall be realised—to the everlasting joy of some, and the everlasting sorrow of others. Around us the emblems of our death hang in the tinted foliage, and lie at our feet in withered leaves; above us, the sun, as if himself decaying and wan with age, sheds a fainter light, communicates a feebler warmth, and, like man in the evening of life, goes earlier to bed, and is later to rise! but before us the field with its crowd of reapers, and flashing sickles, and falling corn—to be borne off, the grain to the garner, the chaff to the fire—suggests something yet more solemn—the most solemn scene of which this world shall be the theatre; the last great assize: all Adam's family met face to face for the first and the last time, in one vast assembly; the God of Glory descending to judgment; the great white throne filled by the august person of his Son; the crowd of angels, ministers to do his will, and give, in the curse executed on one class and the crowns conferred on another, to every man according to his deeds, entering the vast, awed, agitated, solemn multitude to part it into two great divisions; to call those who have accepted Christ to glory, and consign such as have unhappily rejected him to inexpressible and endless woe. Giving a grandeur and solemnity to the scene which, though unheeded, perhaps, either by the farmer who is thinking only of his profits or the reapers who are thinking only of their gains, belongs to none other scene on earth,—Jesus said, "The harvest is the end of the world; and the reapers are the angels. As therefore the tares are gathered and burned in the fire, so shall it be in the end of this world. The Son of Man shall send forth his angels, and they shall gather out of his kingdom all things that offend, and them which do iniquity, and shall cast them into a furnace of fire: there shall be wailing and gnashing of teeth. Then shall the righteous shine forth as the sun in the kingdom of their Father. Who hath ears to hear, let him hear." Yes: let us hear; heed the warning; seek and embrace the Saviour; and in making our calling and election sure, work while it is called to-day, lest we should have to bemoan our folly, and cry, as we look back with unavailing regrets on the past, and forward with shrinking dread on the future, "THE HARVEST IS PAST, THE SUMMER IS ENDED, AND WE ARE NOT SAVED!"

THE OLD AGE OF ST. PETER.

THE life of the great Apostle, to whom the Lord of the Church assigned this name as at once characteristic and prophetic,* may be divided, both naturally and conveniently, into four distinct periods. Of these, the last only forms the special subject-matter of the present inquiry; but, as it can hardly be considered except in its relations to the antecedent history, it will be necessary so far to take a brief glance at them also.

(1.) Of the years, probably between thirty and forty, that preceded the preaching of the Baptist, we are told little or nothing, and are left to inference or conjecture. Within certain limits there is little risk of error in the picture that suggests itself. The boyhood at Bethsaida (John i. 44), spent chiefly in his father's calling: the experience of all the chances and perils of the fisherman's life, stormy nights, and labour often fruitless; intercourse with the peasants of the villages, and the publicans or douaniers of the towns of Galilee; visits, annual, or it may be more frequent, to the great feasts of Jerusalem; the weekly Sabbath service in the synagogue; this must have been his life, as it was that of the thousands that were living round him. Education there was probably none but of the most elementary character. When the two, Peter and John, stood before the Sanhedrim, those who listened wondered at their boldness, because "they were unlearned and ignorant men," had received no training like that which was given in the schools of Jerusalem (Acts iv. 13). It was, however, one great blessing of the synagogue system, one which was transmitted to the Christian Church, and has been perpetuated in our own parochial machinery, that it did provide even in the smallest village, wherever there were as many as ten householders, some means for raising the youth of Israel out of the brute ignorance in which the masses in heathen countries were left to live and die. The resident Rabbi was of necessity qualified to be a teacher, and often gathered the boys of the town into an actual school. Few were left in total ignorance of the law, which, at the age of twelve, every Jewish youth was bound to observe.* They learnt to repeat their

* The two occasions on which the name was solemnly bestowed are both of them significant. First, when as yet his faith had only showed itself in accepting the testimony of Andrew, that he had "found the Christ," and coming, for the first time, before his Lord, he was greeted with the strange words, "Thou art Simon, the son of Jona, thou shalt be called Cephas" (John i. 42). And secondly, when he had been ed, this time through no human testimony, but by a direct apocalypse to the yet higher truth, "Thou art the Christ, the Son of the living God," and then heard the meaning of the name brought out, "Thou art Peter, and on this rock I will build my Church" (Matt. xvi. 13).

* At this age, in the popular language of the Jews, after an examination in the elements of religious knowledge, they became Children of the Law, and shared with their parents in the observance of Jewish feasts. Our Lord's journey to Jerusalem, then apparently for the first time going up to Jerusalem, to keep the passover, and his Shemâ, the great creed of Israel: "Hear, O Israel: The Lord our God is one Lord." The verses written on their phylacteries were committed to memory.* The Book of Deuteronomy and the Proverbs of Solomon were probably the chief text books of education. It was no exceptional case when the Apostle, speaking to the offspring of a mixed marriage in a heathen country, said emphatically, "From a child thou hast known the Holy Scriptures daily" (2 Tim. iv. 15).

Of the events of St. Peter's life we of course know nothing; but we may surmise, without much risk of error, that the wild insurrection of the Zealots, who, under Judas of Galilee (A.D. 6), in the days of the taxing (Acts v. 37), dared to defy the whole power of Rome, must have stirred the feelings of his boyhood or early youth. One of these Zealots, once probably a follower of Judas, we have even in the number of the twelve,† and to the confused hopes and dreams thus formed we may look as the source of that longing expectation of "a kingdom to be restored to Israel," to which even the Apostles clung with so strange a tenacity (Acts i. 6). More distinctly we may think of the companionship with his elder brother, Andrew; of his marriage with some Galilean maiden, probably of his own rank in life; of their purchase of a house in Capernaum, and, it may be, a small farm on the shores of the Sea of Galilee; of the children prattling at their knees, the joy of their father's heart.‡ But above all, in those early years must have been laid the deep foundations of that friendship with the son of Zebedee, which lasted even to the end, and of which the Gospel of the beloved disciple bears so many traces.§ The hot impetuosity of Simon, and the fiery energy of the Son of Thunder, must have drawn them together, as kindred natures are attracted to each other, and we can hardly doubt that they, sharing the restless fever of the time, looked for the Son of David, who was to come before long and claim his father's throne. The words of joy at finding the Messiah, imply a long and yearning expectation (John i. 41).

(2.) With the preaching of the Baptist there came the first great change. The rumour spread that a great prophet had risen up; and Simon, with other Galileans, chiefly, it would seem, those who shared his Messianic hopes, went to Bethabara, on the east side of Jordan, where John was baptising (John i. 28). They were among the multitudes who, moved by that strong, earnest preaching, confessed their sins, and plunged into the waters of the Jordan, as washing away the evil of their past deeds, and entering on a better life. What followed is familiar to every reader of the Gospel, and need not be repeated here, except in its leading outlines. To find the new teacher greater than John, and to feel, before any sign or wonder had been wrought, that this was indeed the Christ,—to receive the new name, Cephas, or Peter, witness not of the strength which he then had, but of the work to which he was called, and the character that was needed for it,—to return for a time to the old life, then to leave it, and with it to leave, without abandoning, home, and wife, and children, in order to take his place among the fishers of men,—to be led gradually out of earthly dreams and poor ambitions to the true thought of a kingdom of God,—to take his place first within the circle of the Twelve, and among the Twelve to be called to the foremost rank, to pass into the inner circle, the elect of the elect,—to be present with those other chosen ones in the moment of highest glory on the Mount of the Transfiguration, and the moment of deepest humiliation in the garden of Gethsemane,—after those divine experiences, to forsake and deny his Master through a coward fear of the rough tongues of Roman soldiers and Jewish housemaids, to meet his Lord's reproachful yet forgiving glance, and to rush into the dark, throw himself on the ground, and weep bitterly;—this was what lay before him in the future, which then he saw not. Through all these changes we see the natural character of the man breaking out ever and anon, and showing its evil and its good. He is foremost in his confession, and the first to retract; he alone throws himself into the waves to join the loved Form that he saw through the darkness of the night, and then, his faith failing him, begins to sink; prominent in all questionings and murmurings, impetuous, zealous, but also wavering and inconstant; in years a man, but in character a wayward boy, needing the education of a Divine guide or teacher. That guidance was necessary to lead him to the true thoughts of God, and of the kingdom, and of Christ; it was needed also to prevent the friendship which had been the blessing of his life from passing into bitterness. Peter's question, "What shall we have therefore?"—the prayer of the sons of Zebedee, that they might sit, one on their Lord's right hand, the other on his left, in his kingdom, the vexed displeasure to which that prayer gave rise,—all this gives tokens of a jealous rivalry which, but for the lesson which checked it, might have passed on into the bitterness which M. Renan traces, and may claim as the first discoverer, in the Gospel of the beloved disciple. But the lesson was learnt effectually. On the night of the Last Supper their words and glances show the full confidence of friendship (John xiii. 24, 25). Peter, in the shame or confusion of his repentance, turns to John for help, and is not repelled—with him he must "sitting in the midst of the doctors, both hearing them and asking them questions," give us the analogous stage in the unfolding of the perfect life.

* The passages so written were the following:—

1. "Sanctify unto me all the first-born," &c. (Exod. xiii. 2—10).
2. "And it shall be when the Lord shall bring thee," &c. (Exod. xiii. 11—16).
3. "Hear, O Israel: The Lord our God is one Lord," &c. (Deut. vi. 4—9).
4. "Thou shalt fear the Lord thy God," &c. (Deut. vi. 13—22).

The ground of selection in the first three appears to have been the occurrence of the words, "they shall be a sign upon thine hand," "frontlets between thine eyes." There is something striking and instructive in the fact that words from 3, 4, were the weapons with which our Lord baffled the attacks of the tempter, and that they formed throughout the key-note of his teaching.

† "Simon, called Zelotes" (Luke vi. 15). The name inaccurately given as "Canaanite," in the Authorized Version of St. Matthew and St. Mark, means the same thing.

‡ This seems the natural inference from our Lord's answer to St. Peter's boast, "We have left all, and have followed thee," "Verily I say unto you, There is no man that hath left house, or brethren, or sisters, or father, or mother, or wife, or children, or lands" (Mark x. 29). The marriage is more distinctly recorded Mark i. 30; Matt. viii. 14.

§ The assumption that the feeling which shows itself in St. John's Gospel is one of poor rivalry and jealousy, is almost the most groundless as it is almost the most offensive hypothesis in M. Renan's Life of Jesus. Such a thought could scarcely have commended itself to any one in whom the capacity for friendship had not been extinguished in sentimentalism.

have spent the hours of that solemn Sabbath that followed the Crucifixion*—with him he went, as if after a midnight vigil, very early in the morning, to the sepulchre in the garden. When Peter hears of the trial in the far future which is to test the thrice-asserted love, and cancel, as it were, the thrice-repeated denial, he turns with eager affection to ask, "Lord, and what shall this man do?" (John xxi. 21.)

(3.) The next period of the Apostle's life is that of highest activity and fame. He takes the place assigned to him as the spokesman of the Twelve; the holder of the Keys, binding and loosing, forgiving and retaining sins. The Spirit descends on him as on the others. He shares with them the marvellous power of the Gift of Tongues, but he stands forth conspicuous among the rest as the chief prophet in that "goodly fellowship." The man who had quailed in the porch of the High Priest's palace, stands unabashed before the High Priest himself, and all the priests, elders, and scribes of the great Sanhedrim, denounces their guilt, reasons with them out of their own Scriptures. His voice we cannot doubt was listened to in the Church with most reverence. By his hands signs and wonders were wrought in the name of God's "holy servant,† Jesus." Men brought their sick and laid them in the streets, that even the very "shadow of Peter," as he passed by, might "overshadow some of them" (Acts v. 15). And still the old friendship lasts. Peter and John go up together to the temple, together stand before the council. For a time, it may be, the new element brought into the Church by the admission of the "Grecians," or Hellenistic Jews,‡ tended a little to diminish his influence. They could not feel the same confidence in the Galilean Apostle as had been felt by those who had seen and known him during the ministry of his Lord (Acts vi. 1); and the very fact that the whole brunt of the persecution raised by Saul fell not on him, but on Stephen (Acts vi. 9, 11), shows at once, both that there must have been a new element in the teaching of the latter, and that he must have occupied for the time a more commanding position among the preachers of the Faith even than the chief of the Apostles. The death of the great martyr, and the dispersion of the greater part of the disciples,§ must have restored the old pre-eminence; and the work assigned to him in the history of Cornelius raised him to a position, if possible, yet more commanding. At Joppa, the great seaport of the South of Palestine, where the crowd of sailors, traders, artizans of other nations, mingled with the Jewish population, living in the house of a man whose calling in the eyes of the stricter Jews was looked on as unclean, his thoughts may well have turned with hope, perplexity, and fear, to the wide Western Sea which spread out before him, and the vision which taught him to think of no man, circumcised or uncircumcised, as "common and unclean," gave him the guidance which he needed. In quite another sense than that which mediæval credulity gave to the words, he had the keys of the kingdom, and, thus taught, he opened the door of faith unto the Gentiles, so wide that no man afterwards, not even he himself, could shut it. It was given to him to be the human instrument of the foundation of the Gentile as well of the Jewish Church. In another than the Romish sense, the Catholic Church, the Communion of Saints, the Universal Fellowship of Believers, may look to him as to the Rock on which its Lord has built it.

(4.) It would be interesting with an unsurpassed interest to trace step by step the history of the years that followed, but here our materials all but fail us. We see him indeed exposed to the sharp persecution which, under the revived monarchy of Herod Agrippa, and the consequent ascendancy of the Sadducees' faction, attacked the Apostles who had hitherto escaped. We watch what may have been the first step in a life of missionary activity, or more probably of a falling back for a time into the shelter of a hiding-place. Obviously the one great fact, or rather series of facts, in them, of which we should watch the unfolding with absorbing eagerness, would be the relation between the two teachers whose names are foremost in that great period of the Church's history, between the one who was to be known as the "greatest," and him who was content to be thought of as the "least" of the Apostles (1 Cor. xv. 9). Contrasted in many ways, they undoubtedly were from the first. On the one side, a youth and manhood spent in the rough toil of the fisherman and the peasant; on the other, the instruction of the schools of Tarsus, and the full training of a scribe in those of Jerusalem, sitting at the feet of Gamaliel: on the one side, as far as we can gather, a frame indicating strength and energy, a stature that commanded respect, a voice clear and powerful (Acts ii. 14); on the other, a "bodily presence weak," and "a speech contemptible" (2 Cor. x. 10). On the one side, again, not the claim only, but the actual possession of a fuller knowledge of the teaching of Christ on earth, through three years of close companionship; on the other, not the claim only but the actual possession of a fuller knowledge of the mind of Christ as the Lord and Teacher of His Church. In the early stages, however, the contrast did not pass into any real, or even apparent antagonism. In spite of the distrust of the disciples he received the persecutor Saul into his house, as a brother in the faith! (Gal. i. 18) Fourteen years afterwards (years of which we know absolutely nothing of his life or work), when the work of Paul was already coming to be known as wider and

* The two had been together in Gethsemane. Both had gone, John taking Peter into the High Priest's palace (John xviii. 15). John must have been cognisant of, if not an actual witness of the denial; and yet they are once again together, within less than two days, on the morning of the Resurrection. What passed between the two in that solemn interval which the Gospels shroud in silence we know not, but the inference that they must have been together is irresistible.

† Not "child," as in the Authorized Version. The Greek word corresponds to "the Servant of the Lord" in Isaiah xlii. 1, 19; xliii. 10; lii. 13.

‡ Not proselytes from Greek countries, but Jews who were settled in them, spoke Greek habitually, and used the Septuagint or Greek version of the Old Testament. Contrasted with these in the Apostolic Church were the Hebrews, sc. the Jews of Palestine, who spoke only or chiefly the Aramaic or degenerate Hebrew of their own country.

§ The fact that the Apostles remained at Jerusalem during this crisis, and could remain safely, while it was in part a proof of their courageous love, shows also that, in some way or other, their teaching was not so directly antagonistic to the system of the Pharisees as that of Stephen had been.

mightier than his own, he was found still faithful to the lesson which the history of Cornelius had taught him. In the great controversy whether circumcision, and with it the whole yoke of Judaism, was to be imposed on the Gentile converts, he gave no grudging or half-hearted support to the cause of which Paul was the great leader, extended to him and Barnabas the right hand of fellowship, brought forward his own experience, entered his protest against the Judaizing party, as putting a yoke upon the neck of the disciples which the Jewish Christians themselves and their fathers had been unable to bear (Acts xv., Gal. ii.).

Between the council at Jerusalem, and the probable date of the Epistles, our knowledge is still scantier and dimmer. St. Paul is the foremost figure in the Church's work, and all others, even the chief of the Apostles, fall into the background. Here and there we get glimpses of work limited in its range, partly by his acceptance of the "Gospel of the circumcision" as his special trust (Gal. ii. 9), and partly also by the fact that in his mission-work he was accompanied by his wife—like himself no longer young, and unequal, we may well believe, to the more perilous and laborious journeys which marked the activity of St. Paul.* Another influence, however, was at work only too successfully, which tended at once to give him a spurious prominence, and to reduce him, so far as it operated, to a real insignificance. The converted Pharisees, who had brought their Phariseeism into the Church of Christ (Acts xv. 5), the Judaizing party who dogged the footsteps of St. Paul at every turn, slandering his character for truth and purity and consistency and common honesty (2 Cor. i. 17; vii. 2; viii. 20; xi. 12; Gal. i. 10), undoing, as far as it was possible for them to undo, his work, were at this time making desperate efforts to claim St. Peter as their leader. Emissaries from that section of the Church appeared in Galatia and at Corinth, speaking in the name of Cephas, claiming themselves to be special delegates,† clothed with extraordinary power, from the foremost of the Twelve. It was easy to represent this recognition of the Church of the Circumcision as the region of his own activity as showing a want of sympathy with St. Paul's work among the Gentiles, his own adherence to the customs of Moses as a protest against the conduct of one who became to those that were without the Law, as without the Law himself. So accordingly it was that the cry, "I am of Cephas," was heard among the party-watchwords in wild debate at Corinth (1 Cor. i. 12). It lies in the nature of all party warfare, that those who thus used his name would try to force him into accepting the position which they thus assigned to him. They would repeat to him every slander against the rival teacher, which they circulated among the churches. He would hear as James heard, that the Apostle of the Uncircumcision was not only proclaiming to the Gentiles their freedom in the Gospel, but was going beyond the limits marked out by the Synod of Jerusalem, "teaching all the Jews which are among the Gentiles to forsake Moses, saying that they ought not to circumcise their children, nor to walk after their customs" (Acts xxi. 21). It would not be difficult for them, by tearing words from the context of thought, or acts from the context of the life, to justify the charge. He had said repeatedly and emphatically, that "circumcision was nothing" (1 Cor. vii. 19; Gal. v. 6; vi. 15), that the Law tended to increase sin (Gal. iii. 19; Rom. iii. 20; v. 20; vii. 7). He had taught men (here, as it might be argued, in direct contravention of the decrees of the Council), that they might without scruple, except in one special case, eat of things sacrificed to idols (1 Cor. x. 27, 28).

It was natural that such resolute persistency should have some result, and for a moment the effect was that of placing the two great Apostles in a real, as well as seeming, antagonism to each other. At some period, probably two or three years after their meeting at Jerusalem, and St. Paul's departure from Antioch on his second missionary journey, and in order, it may be, to fill up the gap left by the departure of so many teachers (Paul, Barnabas, Silas, Mark), Peter came down to the city which was, as it were, the mother of all the churches of the Gentiles, as Jerusalem was of all the churches of the Jews. At that city the disciples had just received the name which has since risen to such a world-wide glory, but which was then comparatively unknown, which was never used by the disciples of each other, or by the unbelieving Jews of the believing, which does not occur once in the whole teaching of St. Paul.* The question which was now at issue was whether he would find in that new name a stronger tie of brotherhood than that of Abraham or Israel, or fall back within the old barriers, behind the old wall of partition. At first he was consistent with himself. He acted as the vision of Joppa and the history of Cornelius had taught him to act. He counted no man common and unclean. He mingled freely with the Gentile Christians, entered into their family life, shared their meals, partook of their agapæ, or feasts of charity, united with these feasts the higher Supper of the Lord (Gal. ii. 12). But the Judaizing party, with the reckless and restless tenacity which marked their policy, were determined to counteract this protest against their own exclusiveness. Whether those who came as delegates from James were abusing his name as they had done once before (Acts xv. 24; Gal. ii. 12), or whether they had so far worked on him as to draw from him the expression of some wish, forgetting the different circumstances of the two churches, that Peter at Antioch would follow the same line of action as he was following at Jerusalem, we do not know. In either case it might have been plausibly argued that there was no inconsistency with

* May we not trace an unconscious embodiment of his own experience in the words which bid husbands to "give honour unto the wife as unto the weaker vessel?"—(1 Peter iii. 7; comp. 1 Cor. ix. 5).

† "The very chiefest Apostles." There is a touch of sarcasm in the phrase. "The envoys extra-ordinary" of the Mother Church at Jerusalem (2 Cor. xi. 5; xii. 11).

* "The disciples were called Christians first at Antioch" (Acts xi. 26). It was natural, therefore, that there chiefly the persecution to which the Church was exposed should first turn upon the name so given, and in St. Peter's words, "If any man suffer as a Christian, let him not be ashamed" (1 Peter iv. 16), we may see the natural result of that residence in Antioch which we learn neither from his own Epistles nor yet from the Acts, but only from St. Paul's incidental mention of it in Gal. iii. 11.

the decrees of the Council, that the Gentile converts were left free to do as they liked in all things morally indifferent, that the Law was recognised as binding upon Jews only. The result of the argument, and of the real or alleged authority of James, was to throw Peter into a state of melancholy vacillation. The scene in the gateway of the High Priest's palace was acted over again, and the Apostle who had been bold before the danger came, or when backed by a numerous following, shrank from standing alone against the violence and yells and anathemas of the Judaizers. "Fearing them of the circumcision, he separated himself," and by that single act undid his former work, went backwards to a standing-ground that he had forsaken, built again the things that he had destroyed, helped, so far as in him lay, to make the chasm between the Jewish and Gentile Churches wider and more lasting.

Such was the position of the two parties at Antioch when Paul arrived there, probably during the journey briefly mentioned but not narrated in Acts xviii. 22.* He saw at once, with his wonted clearness of insight, all that was at stake, and resolved once more, as before in the case of Titus, "to give way by subjection, no, not for an hour." (Gal. ii. 5.) To do so would have been to acquiesce in a condemnation of his own conduct, to sanction a lasting division between the Jewish and Gentile Churches, to make the glorious reality of a Church Universal, the brotherhood of mankind in Christ, an unattainable ideal. He found public feeling outside the narrow limits of the party which St. Peter was identifying with the Church, strongly against him,† but no one, it would seem, had as yet ventured to stand forth in open opposition to the Apostle to whom the keys of the kingdom of heaven had been entrusted, to the rock upon whom the Church was to be built. Yet so skilfully had the faction played its part, professing here at least to recognise the rights of the Gentile believers, and taking their stand on what all had agreed to as a compact, that even "Barnabas was carried away with their dissimulation" (Gal. ii. 13). Unconscious of any inconsistency, perhaps priding himself on returning to the same ground that he had occupied before, he too withdrew from those with whom he had lived previously in closest bonds of brotherhood. It was a crisis that called for the spirit of an Athanasius or a Luther, and that spirit was found in St. Paul. Regardless of all the prestige of authority that gathered round the great name of Peter, regardless for the time, though not forgetful, of the great work which he had done for the Church of Christ, he "withstood him to the face before all." He and those who acted with him were "not walking uprightly according to the truth of the Gospel" (Gal. ii. 14); were dwelling on the words of a compact with the hair-splitting dexterity of casuists, not entering into the heart and spirit of the life of brotherhood in Christ. With sharp burning words he pressed home the charge of inconsistency against the great Apostle. "If thou, being a Jew, livest after the manner of the Gentiles, and not as do the Jews" (Peter continued, it would appear from this, to adhere to the letter of the vision at Joppa, while he lost sight of its significance, eating meats which the Jew would look on as unclean, yet shrinking from the society of the uncircumcised as polluting, or at least unfitting for him) "why compellest thou the Gentiles to live as do the Jews?" This was the real question at issue. It was easy to say that the Gentiles were left free, that the yoke of the Law was not imposed on them; but in reality they were brought under a coercion of the most stringent kind. They were practically told that the adoption of Judaism was the condition of their communion with the Church of the Apostles. Without this, there might indeed be a formal recognition of their membership in the Church, but practically they would be treated still as members of a different and inferior body, still outside the barrier, still as "heathens and publicans."

What followed this startling antagonism between the two great preachers of the faith, what other scenes brought the great drama of St. Peter's life towards its conclusion, we know not. The silence of St. Luke as to the contest itself, and as to the whole period of St. Peter's history to which it belonged, is every way significant. Writing as the friend and companion of St. Paul, he wrote, we may well believe, what that teacher would have him write,—would not dwell on the momentary weakness and inconsistency of the Apostle whose name had been set up in rivalry with his, would much rather seek to show how it had been given to him to open the door of faith unto the Gentiles, how he had been a chief instrument in assuring them their freedom. The Acts of the Apostles do not profess to give us any full record of the work of the Twelve. Their labours, journeyings, martyrdoms, are left to the dim uncertainties of tradition. We have but the Acts of St. Peter and St. Paul, and even of these only enough to enable us to see how each worked according to the measure of the gift of Christ,—how, in spite of temporary estrangement, they were one in heart and mind, joined in a brotherhood indivisible.

Beyond this, then, our knowledge of the old age of St. Peter is traditional and conjectural. All that we can do is to compare the traditions with notices and hints dropped unconsciously in the Epistles, to see how far the one confirms the other, and to indicate the salient points in the closing pages of the life that thus comes to stand out clearly from the darkness.

(1.) There is a probability indefinitely great that at some period subsequent to the scene at Antioch, Peter found his way, journeying probably through the provinces of Asia, to the great Imperial city. There, still accompanied by his wife, and by the disciple who was as his own son by adoption, still true to his calling as the Apostle of the Circumcision, he preached to his brethren of the stock of Abraham, and became not indeed the founder, but in part the organiser of the Roman Church. Difficult as it is to arrive at chronological accuracy, it seems probable that we may ascribe the journey through the Asiatic churches to

* On this hypothesis, more probable in itself than any other, he came fresh from Jerusalem, better informed perhaps than Peter as to the real wishes and feelings of St. James, and the scene on which he dwells so emphatically in Gal. ii. 13, 14, was then of comparatively recent date, and still fresh in his memory.

† Not, as in the Authorized Version, "because he was to be blamed," but "because he had been condemned."

the period of two years and upwards of St. Paul's imprisonment at Cæsarea and at Rome, and his arrival at the latter city between St. Paul's first and second imprisonments. Neither the Acts of the Apostles nor St. Paul's Epistles, nor yet St. Peter's, give any trace of the two having met again. Once, however, it may be they did meet, or stranger and more touching still, knew of each other's presence in the Imperial city, perhaps in the same prison, without meeting. There, as the old legend tells, Peter, seeking to escape the pressing danger, passing out of the gate of Rome upon the Appian Way, saw in vision the same face that had once before turned and looked upon him in the High Priest's palace, and turned back with a new confidence to bear his testimony unto the death.* There, as he passed to the place of execution, "girded" by another's hand, and carried "whither he would not" (John xxi. 18), he turned to the wife who had been so long the faithful sharer of all the chances and changes of his life, and bade her be of good cheer as being an heir together with him of the grace of life. There sentenced to die, not as a Roman citizen, like St. Paul, but as a Jewish malefactor, he too was crucified, choosing, as the legend runs, which art has made familiar, to be nailed to the cross, not as his Lord had been, but with his head downwards.

The Epistles confirm much that tradition thus reports to us. "She that is at Babylon saluteth you" (1 Peter v. 13). Of the three views which have been taken of this passage, that which rests on by far the strongest grounds is that which sees in "Babylon" not the old half-desolate city on the Euphrates, nor a town of the same name in Egypt, but the mystical name of Rome. The language of the Apocalypse shows how familiar such hidden meanings were, how natural it would be to the Asiatic Christians to understand that by it was meant the new Babylon, the mistress of the nations (Rev. xiv. 8, xvi. 19, xvii. 8).† If, as seems probable enough, we see in the Revelation of St. John the great ingathering of prophecies and visions that had before been presented singly, we may well believe that St. Peter's use of the words was significant. He taught the believers of the dispersion, i.e., chiefly the Jewish converts, to look forward to a judgment upon the city of the Cæsars as searching and overwhelming as that which had broken up the vast monarchy of the Chaldæans. In this case, therefore, we have in the Epistle what coincides with the tradition; and the mention, not of the Church,‡ but of the woman, that was elect with those to whom she sends her greeting, adds yet another link. She, her husband's companion in travel, might well send a salutation to those whom she had known, whose wives and daughters she had probably taught to aspire after a higher and purer life, to whom she had presented a type of womanhood as yet new and strange to them.* The mention of Mark, whom St. Paul's Epistles show to have been at Rome during his first imprisonment (Col. iv. 10, Philemon 24), and of Silvanus, his friend and fellow-worker, not under the Hebrew name by which Peter had once known him (Acts xv. 22, 32), but under its new Latinised form, leads to the same conclusion.

(2.) To this period of his life also we may assign, without much risk of error, the work which a very early tradition ascribes to him of putting on record, through St. Mark's help as an interpreter and amanuensis, what he remembered and thought it right to publish of his Lord's work and teaching. To trace the internal evidence of that origination of the Gospel which bears St. Mark's name—to show the signs of a vividness of perception and the otuches of graphic power which indicate the testimony of an eye-witness, before whose mind the old past was living once again—to point out the hundred points of contact between that Gospel and the Epistles of St. Peter—will be the subject of a separate study. Here we can only point to words in the Epistles which fall in with the tradition, as indicating something like the purpose which was in this manner carried into effect. These we find in close connection with his recollections of the past, of the vision on the Mount of Transfiguration, of the last recorded scene on the shores of the Sea of Galilee. Once and again we have the words, "I will not be negligent to put you in remembrance of these things. . . . . Yea, I think it meet, as long as I am in this tabernacle, to stir you up by putting you in remembrance." Yet further, "Moreover I will endeavour that ye may be able after my decease to have these things in remembrance" (2 Peter i. 12—15). Would not this purpose ripen naturally into act, and lead him to place on record the acts and words which would help to convince others, as they had convinced him, that he had not followed "cunningly devised fables"?

(3.) But at some time or other in this period of his life we must think of him as coming into contact for the first time with what must have been a new treasure of wisdom and knowledge, equivalent almost to a new apocalypse of truth. During the thirty years or so that had passed since the conversion of Saul of Tarsus, the two, as we have seen, had but seldom met. True, he had once heard in brief outline the substance of the Gospel which St. Paul preached to the Gentiles (Gal. ii. 2). True, he had publicly recognised his teaching and his work; but, after this, there had been an interval of separation and distrust, for a time, of actual antagonism, brought about, as we have seen, by ignorance and misrepresentation. During all those years, the only time in which he listened to St. Paul's voice was when it spoke in sharp reproof at Antioch. We have no reason to think it likely that any of St. Paul's Epistles would at that time come within his reach. But two indeed of those now extant were then written. But now, in his old age, he came in contact with Silvanus, who

* The legend may possibly find a partial confirmation in 2 Peter i. 14. The life of St. Paul gives us repeated instances of this personal manifestation of the Lord's presence (Acts xviii. 9; xxii. 18; xxiii. 11). St. John had a like vision in Patmos (Rev. i. 13). Was it strange that the same should be given to St. Peter?

† So in later Rabbinic writings Edom is the received synonyme for Rome, possibly because Babylon had been preoccupied, as it were, by Christian writers. So, even in the time of Jeremiah, prophecies against the historical Babylon were conveyed, by a strange use of cypher-writing, through the otherwise unmeaning name of Sheshak (Jer. xxv. 26; li. 41.) So, also, Rahab had been the prophetic name for Egypt (Ps. lxxxvii. 4, lxxxix, 10; Is. li. 9: and (in the Hebrew) xxx. 7); and Jareb of the King of Assyria (Hos. v. 13, x. 6).

‡ The word "Church," as the italics show, is interpolated by the translators.

* Here again, as before, we are free to trace a personal element in Peter iii. 1—7.

for years had been St. Paul's companion, who was joined with him in the salutations to the churches of Thessalonica, who possibly acted as his amanuensis in writing the Epistle to the Romans.* From him, therefore, Peter may well have obtained a copy of some at least of the great Epistles in which the teaching of the Apostle of the Gentiles has come down to us for an everlasting possession.† Can we not picture to ourselves the flood of new feelings and thoughts which would rush in upon his soul as he sat and read them? Delight to find a heart that beat so entirely in unison with his own, loving Christ as he himself loved Him, a truth essentially the same, though presenting here and there different phases, and including "some things hard to be understood," a new warmth of affection towards the "beloved brother Paul," who, when they last met, had reproved him so sharply—wider thoughts, it may be, than he had had before known as to the mystery of Christ and the hidden symbolism of the types and shadows of the Law,—all these are traceable in his Epistles; and this also, the influence of the teaching of St. Paul on the mind of St. Peter, will well repay a distinct and full inquiry.

(4.) Lastly, we must not forget that in every church which he visited he would come under the influence of men speaking by special inspiration, of prophets dwelling fully and in burning words on the sufferings that were coming on the Church and on the glories that were to follow,—glories which they saw as certain in the far horizon, and which to them seemed near and coming quickly, as men count nearness and quickness. One who heard such words again and again, and was persuaded of their truth, could not remain indifferent to them; and yet it might well be that words true in themselves might excite in men's minds unfounded hopes, and so expose them to disappointment and derision. It was needful for him, in the last words of counsel which he, an elder, sent forth to his brother elders, to speak distinctly as to the nature, office, limits of the "prophetic word."

With such fruits fresh gathered into the garner of his old age, with a mind illumined at once by a long experience and by the guidance of the Spirit of Truth, soaring far above the strife and contention with which faction and party had sought to identify his name, looking back upon the past, to the days when his Lord had been with him upon earth, and he saw his glory and listened to his words, looking forward to the time as already near when he would have to put off his tabernacle as that Lord had showed him,—all the feara nd vacillation and self-confidence of the natural man, the Simon Bar-jonah, having passed away,—the true Peter, at last worthy of his name, sends forth the great encyclical Epistles which were then the stay and bulwark of the Church against the hosts of dark and dangerous errors, and which continue to give light to all seekers after truth, and comfort to all penitents and mourners.

E. H. Plumptre.

* Tertius, equivalent in meaning to the Hebrew Silas, has been by some writers identified with Silvanus (Rom. xvi. 22).

† Possibly also of some that have not come down. We have no Epistle from St. Paul to the Churches of Pontus, Cappadocia, and Bithynia, yet St. Peter speaks of letters written to them. The extant Epistles to the Galatians and Ephesians treat but scantily of the subjects in connection with which he mentions St. Paul's teaching (2 Peter iii. 15).

HOW THE MINISTER COMFORTED HIS CHILDREN.

The busy village of Frieden looked as bright as the morning sunshine always made it. It was a new village, that had been made by a few years' run upon the mines; but already it wore a picturesque and sober air, that was owing partly to the houses being built of wood and painted with a rich deep brown, and partly to its comfortable irregularity and its care to avoid having the appearance of a street. The smoke curled at a hundred points out of the thick beech wood, and a hundred mazy paths were worn over the grass. A group of roofs might be sometimes seen across a meadow, or a clearing with children playing before the doors, and at one angle the buildings approached so closely to the rough rutted mountain road that they made almost a street corner. Yet idle and vagrant as such a town might look now, it was a pushing, energetic place three hundred years ago, and, as the folk said, "as new as fire." Men grew rapidly rich in Frieden. The gossips could tell how Hans—Ugly Hans he was called—had come in one evening with nothing but a pickaxe over his shoulder, though now they took off their caps to him as he passed; and how Dirck, the grocer's apprentice, was become the Burgomaster; and the old gentleman, muffled in furs, had been nothing but a lazy cowherd; and how Wurtz, the poor orphan boy, had just finished the great house that stood where the solitary mill-wheel turned thirty years before.

The Minister used to preach against riches, but people got rich notwithstanding, and went to the great wooden church to feel how rich they were. And besides, they liked the Minister. He was a man of great wisdom, simplicity, and love. He knew them, and preached to them as if he had been one of themselves. The miners sang his hymns in their pits and round their smelting fires; the charcoal burners sang them in the woods; on Sunday little groups would come winding down the hillsides and sing them up to the very church door; and sometimes the Minister's heart would run over as he heard the lusty, joyous way in which they lifted up his psalms in the service. The Minister's house stood at one end of the village, under the shadow of the squat wooden spire. The people had built it for him, and for many a year the Minister and his wife had passed in and out of its ivy porch. The poor liked them with all their heart; and the rich could not always forget that they had been poor. Beyond the occasional rudeness of a churchwarden, and once or twice the panic fear of a failure in the mines, life had been easy and sweet to the good man. Too many of his parishioners would still sit on the alehouse bench; rough oaths would still be heard from rougher men; but there were more readers for the little library he had collected with infinite pains in the Town Hall, more households where God was feared; the misconduct came from strangers who had not settled down to the ways of the place, and the quiet of the dark woods and solemn hills that brooded over Frieden seemed to have crept into the simple daily ways of its people.

Then the Minister's wife sickened and died; the bier passed out through the tangled ivy; and from his window the Minister could look down on the soft swell of grass where he had buried his heart, and watch the shedding of the hawthorn blossoms and the whirl of withered leaves.

It was two years since then. The sun shone before every door, the blue smoke rose softly over the trees, the children laughed and raced as they trudged to school, the tinkling of the cowbells dropped merrily down from the upland pastures, and bluff, cheery voices came and went over the hillsides. Only the Minister's house was sad and still. "We will visit the grave to-day, my children," the minister had said, and had called them into his little study. Great books in well-stamped pigskin bindings lay on the oaken table and on the window settle. On the wall a portrait of Martin Luther, by Lucas Cranach, hung opposite another portrait with the sweetest eye and a gentle mouth. The painter had spent a week once in the parsonage, and had left behind him in remembrance this sketch of its mistress. Underneath it was framed a copy of verses on marriage, written in a cramped and delicate hand, one of her husband's poems that she had copied and that he had found among her papers. Six of the children sat themselves round the room; the Minister took the seventh upon his knee. Before him lay the first German Bible, open at the eleventh chapter of the Gospel of John. "She is not dead, but sleepeth," he said as his eye fell upon the page and then glanced tremulously up to the sweet face against the wall. He was struggling to command himself. "I have brought you here, dear children, to speak to you about your mother, and that you may never forget her, nor think when we walk to the grave that she is there only: for she is with Jesus and all the saints.

"Your dear mother left behind her the testimony of every one in this congregation, that she was a god-fearing, faithful, and Christian woman, who loved and honoured the Son of God, his Word, and his servants. You know as well as I that she never avoided a sermon, and carried her Psalter with her to the church, and read it eagerly at home. Moreover, she would speak of what she heard, and indeed wrote out with her own hand all the sermon of the Lord at the Supper, and the fifteenth chapter of First Corinthians, which I have laid aside as a treasure for you, my dear little daughter, that you may think of your dear mother who nursed you but six days. O what a busy hearer she was! The text that was expounded she always had open before her. And you, my son, will think of this, that after dinner she read the entire Bible aloud to me, in her clear simple way, three times.

"I must recal for you, children, what I have heard she said when her parents had proposed a husband to her; for she prayed in her own room to God:—'Dear Father, send me one who hath love for thy Word, for I am convinced that for thy sake he will continually love me.' Oh, how often have I heard her passionately thanking God that He had thought her worthy of honour and had made her the handmaid and partner of his servant! For she always remained a rib in our marriage, and never became head. I think how often she has comforted and invigorated me out of the Word of God when I was in necessity and tribulation; how she has warned me that even for our children's sake I should do nothing against God, his Word and my conscience; God her faithful God, would not leave her. When I think of this, my heart melts within me. Willing and ready she was to have gone with me to the end of the world, if there had been need. But God wished to draw her out of this present misery, as indeed her heart had said to her two years previously. She was much shocked and grieved about her dear sister who died in her first week, so that she had heavy and anxious dreams. Thereafter didst thou, my poor dear little Caspar, cause her much trouble and sorrow when God for our sins' sake had placed his mark upon thee in the womb. From that time all her courage and joy disappeared, and she was filled with dying thoughts. Like a true prophetess she often announced to me her death, and passionately comforted me, and always said, 'You are more useful here to God, his Church, and our children, than I,' until at last she lay abed with thee, my darling, and when she had rejoiced over thee until the morrow, fell into a burning fever, that by the will of God carried her away in eight days. Meanwhile, like a Christian and devout wife, she committed her affairs to her God, and many times would comfort me, saying: 'How can you look so? Hath not God taken home the beloved wives of your good friends, and they are not lost? You will find me again. You have prayed for an heir, that our God would leave one of his servants behind you. And now hath God bestowed on you and me seven children, in whom you may see your and mine, and my dear father's and brother's, and your mother's and sister's likeness, whom let them be commended to you for Christ's sake and mine, for God will be with you and them, and soon bring us again together.'

"At last, as her pain increased and her strength was weakened, she thanked God who had called her to the knowledge of the Gospel, and kept her therein until the end; and then she blessed me, and committed her poor soul into the faithful hands of the Son of God. When her mother asked her to whom she would commit her seven little children? she replied, with an earnest sigh: 'To my faithful God and my dear husband.'

"On the seventh day, when she felt the weakness of her head, she said, 'O God, if it were thy will, I would willingly fall asleep, soft and still. Dear Lord Jesus, comfort me by thy Spirit, and uphold me by thy Word, and receive me in a happy hour, as Thou didst receive the spirit of St. Stephen.' Thereupon she lay some hours, and died out like a candle. God grant her, and all faithful souls, joy in the kingdom of heaven, and a speedy resurrection ; and vouchsafe also to me and all mine such a blessed and Christian death ! Amen.

"I relate all this so that you may not carry a doubt that your dear mother is departed in God, and lives in God, in blessed rest and peace, and that you may not do her the dishonour and shame of fancying that we should redeem her out of purgatory. It is a poor honour to the dead when their heirs believe them to be prisoned, wicked, and tormented folk. God preserve all saints from such honour ! Our mother is at peace, has everlasting light, and lives in God. We believe that, because of God's Word, and her own confession and happy departure ; and, therefore, we will not do the blood of the Son of God, and our dear mother, the dishonour of thinking that Christ's blood has been lost to her and is powerless, and that she is a tortured and imprisoned mother. For it must come to great dishonour of the Son of God and his precious blood and perfect sacrifice, if we set about redeeming a believing man from sin and pain by human works and sacrifices. The Son of God has come into the world : to lead sinners to repentance, and to save all from guilt and pain who hold to Him by a personal faith. Wherefore, whosoever would bethink himself of other mediator, ransom, offering, and intercession, is robbing the Lord Jesus of his divine glory.

"This sure and comfortable doctrine you are to preserve all your life, and to hold all contrary doctrines in abhorrence. Whoso believeth in the Lord Jesus, and by the mercy of God is sprinkled with the blood of the Son of God and renewed through the Holy Ghost, and abideth in faith by the Word of God, and in patience and in a good conscience, he is happy, and hath eternal life, and doth not come into condemnation, nor dare suffer aught more after death. For the blessed angels carry such faithful souls into the bosom of Jesus, as they carried Lazarus. But whoso dieth in guilt, and unbelief, and contempt of God's Word, and without brotherly love and a good conscience, is tormented under the wrath of God, and can find no ransom. Wherefore it is the greatest honour that a husband can show his believing wife, or a child its believing mother, not to doubt of her salvation, and therefore so to live always that we may appear with honour at the last day, before God and our kindred.

"And now, since you have often heard how children should love and honour their parents, I will tell you how you ought to love and honour your dear mother, and my true companion, now passed into the grave and the hidden life.

"Greater honour and obedience you cannot show to your dear mother, than, before all things, to fear, love, and trust your Heavenly Father who has created you, and given you body and life from ours ; and with all your heart to love and honour and call upon His beloved and obedient Son that hath redeemed you from death by His precious blood, and hath made you children of God ; and that by the Holy Spirit you obey the most worthy Gospel, and willingly learn in God's Word, and pray with a true heart, and be diligent in study as baptised and sanctified children and royal priests of our dear Father in Heaven. For this is pleasing to our blessed God, and to the blessed angels, and to all the host of Heaven, and to your dearest mother, as Solomon saith—Thy father and thy mother shall be glad, and she that bare thee shall rejoice. You can give no greater joy and honour to me who am yet in this mortal and sinful life, than when you walk blameless, and are pious and industrious. Shall it not then give joy and comfort to a sainted mother when she knows it in God, or hears from the blessed angels, or at the last day will learn it, by your commendation from the Son of God, that after her death you have remained steadfast Christians ?

"For the piety of children, and whatever is done in true knowledge and heartfelt trust of the Son of God, and after the will of our Father in Heaven, is kept no secret, but God and all the heavenly hosts see it and magnify it, and rejoice thereover (Luke xv.). Nor can anything evil remain secret : but God and our angels see it and lament it, with grieved hearts.

"Moreover, you will do your mother great honour and gladness if with your heart you love and worthily honour me, her dearest husband and your true father, even as she did when she was with me in the body. You may partly remember how she directed all her faculties and thoughts to do whatever was loving and pleasing to me. If you are like her, not only in figure and feature, but also in love and obedience, you will be welcome when she will see you again on that day. Therefore bethink yourself that you are to be like your dear mother in her many fair virtues, and that you are not to grieve your sick old father who, as it is, must carry a heart heavy with sorrow, because he has lost his best friend and most precious treasure on earth, next to God and his Word. Abide in unity and friendship : see that ye fall not out by the way, as Joseph said to his brethren. For have you ever heard an ugly or unkind word from your dear mother, or seen in her a rude unseemly gesture ? I can and must say this, in words of simple truth, that she never had a difference with me. She only spoke when she could help to soften and reconcile ; she loved and honoured my friends, was retiring, genial, and pure, and my most faithful chancellor of the exchequer. I mention these things for the sake of the little ones who did not know their mother, or cannot recall her, that you may have her moral and virtuous example always before your eyes. If, as I hope to God and daily sigh and pray, you remain thus among each other and to me, you will best honour your mother as beseemeth pious children, and when I am taken away from you, God will be with you as He was with me, who, after my father's death, was a poor orphan among strangers, and whom He hath graciously kept and blessed for now eight-and-thirty years. For His gentle goodness and rich mercies have been great and innumerable, as Jacob saith. He is the God of the widow and the orphan, as the Holy Scriptures testify, and as many times I have proved ; and He will be father and mother to you if you continue to obey Him and me, and will follow your dear mother's virtuous example. And verily you do owe this honour and fidelity to your mother, not only for the sake of God's commandment, but because she bore you near her heart, and with pain and anxiety brought you into this world, and with motherly fidelity brought you up in the fear and admonition of the Lord, as long as God left her to me. You will not forget her fidelity, and will often think with yourself: So that I may be kept an obedient child to my departed mother, and may not grieve her, I will direct my way in the name of Christ, that I may rejoin my mother at the last day with all Christian and childlike obedience.

"Think, too, what a joy it will be to your mother, and what an honour to you before God and all the heavenly hosts, when you see her at the right hand of the Son of God, saved by His blood, and wearing the unfading crown of which she was made worthy through grace, in her holy and unblemished married life; for in true faith toward God and in steadfast love and fidelity to me, by a holy and modest life, and bearing her cross with humility and patience, she persevered unto the end. That, my beloved daughters, will be a noble mother for you to love, who will walk through the green fields of the everlasting Paradise, with Sarah, Rebecca, Rachel, Hannah, Elizabeth, and with the honourable and faithful wives of St. Peter and St. Philip, and other blessed patriarchs, apostles, and servants of the Church, and who, I firmly hope, will have by you this honour, that, to the glory of God, she hath borne and suckled a holy Paul or pious Samuel, or modest and virtuous daughters, who will faithfully teach the Word of God in church and school and home. For on that day she will be the happiest mother who has brought up for God a faithful servant and a good child.

"And so the highest honour that a good child can pay his dear mother is to fear God, to be ready to pray, to love the Holy Scriptures, to act rightly and worthily by his aged father, to be modest and gentle, to be truthful, faithful, and quiet, and to bear himself well to his brothers and sisters, servants and neighbours.

"Furthermore, you will remember that pious children not only honour and love their parents while they live on the earth, but also when they have departed in the Lord. The child of God loveth and honoureth his heavenly Father eternally, and doth his will with joy for evermore. Even so it is right and seemly that the children of men, when they love their parents, should retain that love with all reverence for evermore. For it is a pure, noble, and perfect love when a child with his whole heart and will loveth his sainted mother into eternity, and is loved and honoured back again by her. And this love to God and to our parents and neighbours, the Holy Ghost, who is the very love and fire of God, begins in us by the knowledge of the Son of God; and when sin has cooled its heat, and it seems altogether extinguished, He purifies and rekindles it till the little spark that yet glimmers in our lost nature becomes a great fire and ardour of divine love. Preserve this. Love is a part of our rational and immortal soul, and is the very flame of the loving heart of God; and so love dieth not, nor goeth out in the hearts of pious children.

"Therefore since pious children love their parents living, because of God's word, and the will of the Lord Christ; so do they love them also, departed out of this world, and blend their affliction and sorrow with the hope of eternal life, where they will joyfully rejoin their beloved parents. A pious child doth not forget his father, though he be many years away, but hopeth and waiteth for him every hour, and delighteth himself against his return. How then should a child forget parents in the grave, and whose return is much more certain than if his father had made a journey only as far as Prague or Wittenberg.

"And all this I say to you as to those I love best on earth, for you know that your dear mother, to whom God be gracious, hath wandered out of this painful life into the eternal, and lieth now in her rest, hoping with all saints, for the revelation of the Lord Christ, who will call and awaken us out of our earthbeds, and bring us again together in great honour and everlasting joy, where we shall abide to all eternity in perfect love and righteousness. And this I say, you know; that your dear mother hath been sowed in God's acre, and like a blessed grain, lieth buried in the ground; for you four dear elder ones accompanied her to her sleeping chamber. But you must learn and verily believe out of God's word that your departed mother now liveth in God, for as Christ saith (Luke xxi.), God is not a God of the dead, but of the living. And the living God is your mother's God, for she was sprinkled with the precious blood of the living Son of God and redeemed unto eternal life, and hath believed in the living Word of God. Therefore, although our dear mother seemeth to our eyes stone-dead, yet in God's eyes and hands is she living.

"It is true that by the light of reason we cannot understand that the dead are living, but by the light of grace, which is the Holy Gospel, we believe that all who sleep in Christ have their life hid in Him. The Lord Christ is not to be found among the dead, say the angels at the Holy Sepulchre; nothing dead is found in the Lord Christ. How therefore can your mother be dead, having been baptised into Christ's death, and become one of his members? The Holy Ghost calleth all that rest in their earthbeds, them that sleep. But he that is asleep is not dead, as Christ saith of the Ruler's daughter (Matthew ix.) Moreover, we cannot tell how we live, even when we fall into a soft or gentle slumber, or how we have lived in our mother's womb and in our cradle; and yet we live. Even so do we live also in the grave.

"You will, therefore, be altogether sure of this, that although her body is dissolved and your dear mother lieth in her resting place, and sleepeth her soft sleep, yet is she already with Christ. But how she is occupied in that secret and hidden life, God hath not revealed to us, no further than what the Son of God saith of the rich man, and Lazarus the beggar (Luke xvi.). For there it is plain and clear that the unbelieving and condemned man knows that he had yet five brethren alive, and careth for them. Wherefore, if natural brotherly love dieth not nor is extinguished in a lost soul, shall not a saintly mother keep her mother's heart and faith to her own flesh and blood? And if a mother's heart can never die, the love and reverence of children must likewise be immortal. Men die, but the fourth commandment dieth not, and it requireth the honour and obedience of children, not only upon earth, but also in eternity.

"When the Son of God brings us together in the air from the four corners of the world, shall we not know each other? Shall not the old love and friendship stir and rekindle in angelic purity and a spiritual nature? After his sleep did not Adam know his Eve, who was taken out of his side, and though he had never seen her nor heard her speak all his days? Did not Mary Magdalen know her dear Lord by His voice, and the rich man see and know from afar Ahraham and Lazarus? Therefore, dear children, we shall not only see with our eyes, and know our Redeemer clothed with our flesh (as Job sings, ch. xix.), but you and I will see our dear mother stand at the right hand of the Son of Man, in a new and glorious body and the brightness of heaven, and honour her, and with her enter into the honour and glory of God, and together with her and all other saints enjoy an eternal, angelic and heavenly habitation, in all modesty and blessedness, and far more glorious than when Adam, with his Eve, walked round Paradise naked, and they were not ashamed. For then the natural life will cease, and the spiritual life will commence,—the life which we live together in God like the very angels, in perfect wisdom, righteousness, joy, and immortality.

"You know, my boys, though the poor and blind heathen have not come out of the light of reason to the knowledge of the true Lord of death, who alone can lead the dead out of death's meshes, yet the best of them have the faith that there will be a life after this, where honour and virtue will be rewarded, shame and vice punished, and so the old king Cyrus, when he earnestly blessed his children, spoke to them of another life, and exhorted them to live uprightly, and so as to give him hereafter pleasure and joy.

"But we who walk in the light of grace, which the Son of God hath brought us out of the Father's bosom, can speak with more certainty of the future life. And, therefore, our faith is more certain, our hope more strong, and our joy greater, in that we journey on happy in the Lord, and with joy expect to meet again. On earth there is toil and labour, care and want, and our days are full of sorrow and trouble, and break off like a thread, because for our sins' sake we carry death about our neck. And if sometimes a ray of sunlight glances down upon us, yet are there so many heavy and dark clouds that we can hope for little abiding joy on earth; for every hour and moment we have to expect the bitter death which divides many a joyful marriage, and breaks many a heart with anguish and woe. But on that day when death is overthrown, and mortality swallowed up, and all sorrow barred back into hell, then will there be joy and bliss without end.

"All this I willingly say to you, my dear children, so that I may quench the woe and sorrow in my heart by these passionate discourses and tears of love, and mitigate my sorrows by a hoped-for joy and comfortable thoughts seized from the living Word of God, and may also comfort you so much as may be, and exhort you to all godliness and virtue. I have lost a true treasure and noble jewel, a modest heart, a good and firm friend, and my heart's comforter; although she is not lost, for God hath taken her into His keeping. In these last and miserable times, when even the very truest and best Christians scarcely stand, she is much better guarded by God's hand than by my arm, and I, moreover, am old and mortal, and would have grieved to leave her behind me in misery and contempt.

"Therefore, I prepare myself for a happy journey that I will take, and go back to those I love the best, and for old love and friendship will speak further with her. You, dear children, do also miss your truest and best friend in this world, you, especially, my poor girls. But He who defended and preserved Jacob on his pilgrimage, Joseph and Daniel in their prisons, me and my brothers after the death of our dear father, will also be your God, and will preserve you, dear little daughters, like Esther and the Mother of the Lord, from sin and shame, and give you many good friends, as He richly hath to me."

At this point the Minister's voice grew weak. He had spoken steadily on, though the tears sometimes rolled down over his sallow cheeks. It was like treading upon thorns to go back thus over his great sorrow. His heart would shrink under his words, as if they had been blows. But he did it deliberately. It would be good for his children: it was fitting he should suffer this for them. The elder ones had been wrapt up in their father's story, and were solemn and hushed as if their mother's steps were on the threshold. Lisbeth had been watching a great white butterfly dancing up and down among the hollyhocks, and wondering if she might play with the sunshine on the grass. But Caspar, who had been wishing he might go out and catch the butterfly, had fixed his eyes suddenly upon his father. He heard him speak of going away, and began to cry in a soft, subdued way, looking at him through his tears. The gentle sobbing caught the Minister's ear. He could command himself no longer. They all wept together. At last he continued:

"You are right, my dear children, when you help me to bear, and soften to me my pitiful pain. These tear-drops are pure and loving water, better than all consecrated water, and whereby our heart's sorrows will be soothed and calmed. We hope for the time when the Son of God shall wash away all these tears from us, and change our light affliction into an eternal glory. But because our dear God, and your dear mother, have commended you to my faithful hand and heart, you shall be for both their sakes my very dearest little friends. For I can say with truth, a dear gift from a dear hand. What her true mother's heart begged for you from her dear Lord, that, I trust, you will have as God may help me. I am persuaded also of you, that you will show me back child-like fidelity, and will not desert me in my old age, and will so behave that, next to my beloved Bible, I may have all my joy and pleasure in you before death, and through eternity.

"Seek ye first the kingdom of God, and so will the God of all grace be with you, and will provide you with all good. Therefore, Lord Jesus, Thou dear Son of God, Thou who hast manifoldly blessed me, and saved me from much sorrow, and sent me good friends, I pray Thee from the bottom of my heart, Let my children be commended to Thee and thy grace: sustain them in their parents' faith, let them be blessed vessels of grace that thy name may be praised, and defend them from all false doctrine and heresy; and fetch us in a happy hour out of this misery, and bring us again with honour and a good conscience to our dearest mother. To that may Christ keep us, the only and beloved Son of God in eternity! Amen."

And then the Minister took the eldest and the youngest by the hand, and they all went out. The sun was brighter than ever; the air was filled with the merry sounds of life; the good wives bustled cheerfully about their doors, as the little procession wound over the path to the graveyard. It was very simple, and so was the grave. "Great charges and needless pomp show nothing," said the Minister; "but it pleases me well when a mother adorns the grave of her boy and plants it with a little garden of sweet smelling flowers and herbs. There you see a mother's truth that blossoms winter and summer alike, and the true love's roses that never fade. And I would gladly that children so planted out the graves of their parents." They stood by the little knoll. The children spread fresh flowers upon it from their mother's garden. The Minister took off his hat, and read the fourteenth chapter of John; and as they went back they heard sweet voices singing in the fields the old funeral hymn:—

> She lives where none can mourn and weep,
> And calmly shall this body sleep
> Till God shall death itself destroy,
> And raise it into glorious joy.*

THE PITMAN TO HIS WIFE.

Sit ye down on the settle here by me, I've got something to say to thee, wife;
I want to be a new sort of man and to lead a new sort of life;
There's but little pleasure and little gain in spending the days I spend,
Just to work like a horse all the days of my life, and to die like a dog at the end.

For where's the profit and where's the good, if one once begins to think,
In making away with what little sense one had at the first, through drink?
Or in spending one's time and one's money, too, with a lot of chaps that would go
To see one hang'd, and like it as well as any other show?

And as to the pleasure that some folks find in cards or in pitch and toss,
It's little they've ever brought to me but only a vast of loss;
We'd be sure to light on some great dispute, and then, to set all right,
The shortest way was to argue it out in a regular stand-up fight.

I've got a will, dear wife, I say, I've got a will to be
A kinder father to my poor bairns, and a better man to thee,
And to leave off drinking and swearing, and all, no matter what folks may say;
For I see what's the end of such things as these, and I know this is not the way.

You'll wonder to hear me talk like this, as I've never talk'd before;
But I've got a word in my heart, that has made it glad, yet has made it sore.
I've got a word like a fire in my heart that will not let me be,— "Jesus, the Son of God, who loved, and who gave Himself for me."

I've got a word like a sword in my heart, that has pierced it through and through.
When a message comes to a man from Heaven he needn't ask if it's true;
There's none on earth could frame such a tale, for as strange as the tale may be,— Jesus, my Saviour, that thou shouldst die for love of a man like me!

Why, only think now! if it had been Peter, or blessed Paul,
Or John, who used to lean on his breast, one couldn't have wondered at all,
If He'd loved and He'd died for men like these, who loved him so well,—but you see
It was me that Jesus loved, wife! He gave Himself for me.

It was for me that Jesus died! for me, and a world of men,
Just as sinful and just as slow to give back his love again;
He didn't wait till I came to Him, but He loved me at my worst;
He needn't ever have died for me if I could have loved Him first.

And couldst thou love such a man as me, my Saviour! then I'll take More heed to this wandering soul of mine, if it's only for thy sake.
For it wasn't that I might spend my days just in work, and in drink, and in strife,
That Jesus the Son of God has given his love and has given his life.

It wasn't that I might spend my life just as my life's been spent
That He's brought me so near to his mighty cross and has told me what it meant.
He doesn't need me to die for Him, He only asks me to live;
There's nothing of mine that He wants but my heart, and it's all that I've got to give.

I've got a friend, dear wife, I say; I've got a heavenly friend,
That will show me where I go astray, and will help me how to mend,
That'll make me kinder to my poor bairns, that'll make me better to thee—
Jesus, the Son of God, who loved and who gave Himself for me.

Dora Greenwell.

* The minister was a worthy friend of Luther, and the words he used are his own, as he carefully wrote them down for the sake of the younger children.

A BIOGRAPHY IN HALF A VERSE.

It was an honourable testimony which a succeeding generation bore to one of the sages of Greece, that he had brought philosophy down from heaven to earth. Preceding teachers had dealt too much in lofty, abstruse speculation, which, however sublime it might be in itself, did not arrest the minds and touch the hearts of common men engaged in the struggle of actual life. He was recognised as a benefactor of his race, who made the doctrines of philosophy tell upon the ordinary affairs of the world.

Such honour, in measure unspeakably greater, is due to the Bible. It deals, indeed, with the deep things of God; its themes are spiritual mysteries; but while it begins with these, it does not end with these. It handles them as instruments wherewith to awaken a slumbering, and to heal a diseased world. While the upper end of its revelation lies unseen in heaven, the lower end touches the earth at our feet. While its fountains spring under the clouds that conceal the Creator's throne, its streams meander all through this wilderness.

In dealing with the Scriptures, and their great themes, we are liable to fall into error on two opposite sides. We may aim too high, or too low; and equally in both cases miss our mark. If we deal merely with doctrines, however true and noble they may be,—if we do not touch life with them, we shoot above the mark, and our effort proves abortive; if we deal with temporal affairs only, attempting to influence them for good, without rising to heaven for a power to enforce our lessons, we shoot below the mark, and our effort proves abortive. Go to high heaven for your doctrines, but do not abide always soaring there; touch the earth and man with those mighty motives which you draw from the depths of God's eternal counsel. On the other hand, deal plainly, and hand to hand, with the wants of the world; but in order that your labour may not be lost, trust not to the power of your puny arm; ere you get a purchase sufficient to move the sluggish earth, you must for length of lever go all the way to heaven.

In this respect the Bible is a wonderful book; it is altogether unlike every other. It takes you straight to heaven, in order to send you down with greater momentum upon the earth: it gives you a plain task to do with your own hand, but it draws fire from heaven wherewith to animate your heart and nerve your arm. If we miss the way on either side, it is our own fault. That soldier of Jesus Christ who keeps his eye on his marching orders, will always be found in the right place.

Preaching, for example, is addressed, neither to unencumbered angels on the one hand, nor to creatures who are done when they are dead on the other. Preaching is addressed to beings who have an interest in both worlds. It is not merely a meditation on glorious truths about the being and character of God, the beauty of holiness, and the happiness of heaven; nor is it, on the other hand, a struggle maintained by an arm of flesh against the sins and sorrows of humanity. The beings to whom the preaching is addressed belong to both worlds, and the preaching is moulded accordingly. For the fountain of its power, it ascends to the very throne of God, and wields all the mysteries of redemption; but for practical issue, it touches, not now and then, but always, the wants and waywardness of sinful men. Like the atmosphere that hangs over this globe, its upper edge is unseen, unsearchable in the sky; but its under edge goes into every crevice on the earth's surface, and presses on the earth at all times and at all places. Religion comes from heaven, but literally and emphatically it comes to the earth.

The 16th chapter of the Epistle to the Romans has always appeared to me like a gallery of monuments. These are the only pictures of the ancient worthies which the Lord has permitted to be taken and transmitted. Let us be content with their characters as they are embalmed in the Bible, and attempt not to palm upon ourselves and others spurious paintings of their features. Their names are written in the Lamb's book of life within the veil; and written also in duplicate on this document, hung upon the temple gate outside for our use. When they are raised in glory, all men will see how they look; till then, let us be content with these glimpses of their new nature that are given on the page of inspiration.

This record of honoured names illustrates also the love that reigned in the Christian community, and welded all their glowing hearts into one. At Corinth, Paul remembered many of his fellow Christians whom he had met at various places during his missionary journeys; and he conveys a message to each of them whom he knew to be at that time resident at Rome. He names them affectionately and discriminately. He does not say the same thing twice over. Although the care of many churches lay on his mind, his memory readily recalled the name and distinguishing peculiarities of all who had stood out as eminent in the community for love to the Lord, or kindness to the brethren.

That personal recognition and affectionate salutation which was a habit among the first Christians, is fitted to reprove us to-day. How little of cohesion in the Christian community. How little of the attraction of love binding member to member of Christ's body, in spite of differences as to condition of life. I have seen a quantity of long hairs tied together tightly at one extremity, and loose all along the rest of their length, employed for the purpose of experiment in electricity. When an electric current of one kind was sent through the bundle, all the individual hairs crept together, and lay closely clasping each other, as if they had been plaited into one compact cord. When the opposite current was sent through, they opened as if they had been living creatures; each stood out from all, and all from each, till the compact cord became an outspread fan. They separated, moreover, with a thrill and a haste that almost seemed to betoken mutual animosity.

Thus when love from the fountain-head is the current that courses through a Christian community, its members cleave to each other for mutual helpfulness; thus they are strong for trial or work: but when the contrary current of selfishness and pride, springing from the earth, pervades the society, all start off from each and each from all. Tied to each other at one point by ecclesiastical arrangements, they separate as widely as possible, whenever they are free to move; thus they become useless one to another, and feeble before the common foe.

It is quite true that a severe fight of affliction lay upon the Christian brotherhood in those days; and that the persecutions which they endured acted as a mighty pressure to wedge them together heart to heart; it is also true, that ordinarily persecution has had the effect of entwining the disciples of Christ round each other; but all this does not in the least degree excuse the coldness that often prevails in the Church in a time of prosperity. When all around is prosperous, love should not abate, but abound the more. It is due to the selfishness and worldliness of human hearts, that the goodness of God does not in point of fact do more than the suffering of an evil day to melt all the brotherhood into one. In point of fact, when the sun is shining, Christians seem to love each other less; but they might and should at such a time love each other more. Although we notice the fact that times of trial are generally times of mutual love, we must beware of employing it to excuse our coldness.

From this long, bright, variegated gallery (Rom. xvi.), we select one portrait for fuller study. We pause a while before this likeness of a Christian lady of the olden time, that we may consider what makes her character so winsome, and her life so useful: "Salute the beloved Persis."

First of all, it is the portrait of a woman that we find hung up in a place of honour in this monumental hall. In the Christian community woman finds her true place at last. Such a memorial-monument the Lord himself sets up, (Matt. xxvi. 13.) Woman had her right place by God's appointment at the first; and she will have her right place in the general assembly of the firstborn at the end of all; but between the two elevations there was a grievous fall. The fall of our first parents not only brought both low as regards their common relation to God, it also dislocated the relation of the parts, and left the woman crushed and debased and broken off from the man. This dislocation was universal over the world; and it has remained permanent wherever a power from heaven has not interfered. Even in the Hebrew Commonwealth, although her condition was made immeasurably better, the restoration was not complete. The elevation of humanity from the effects of the fall has been accomplished by two stages; these correspond to the stages of Abraham's experience. He was first called out from among his fathers who worshipped idols beyond the flood, and permitted to dwell for a time in a kind of intermediate state, separated for God and by God from communion with idolaters, but not yet admitted into Canaan, and taught the method of serving God. After he had remained for a while in an intermediate territory and in an intermediate state, he was brought all the way into the promised land, and led into God's gracious presence through the offering of a sacrifice. The Hebrew Commonwealth corresponded to that first call of Abraham out from the heathen and nearer to God; and the Christian revelation corresponds to the second period of Abraham's call,—his full emancipation from old slavery, and his entrance into the liberty of God's children.

Woman was in Israel lifted up, and kept up by God's own hand; but still, like the other creatures, she continued groaning and travailing in pain, until Christ came and wholly delivered her from bondage, introducing her into the glorious liberty of the children of God. (Rom. viii.)

Man could not attain a perfect state until woman was again raised to his side. It is impossible to restore perfect health to a human body while one side is under a paralysis. So humanity at large could not be well while one of its sides hung palsied, not a fit support, but a burden to the other.

These are the last times. We have now a constitution and laws that shall, when fully executed, complete the restoration of the race. Christ has cast down the high things, and exalted the low. Especially has He lifted woman from the dust, and placed her by redemption where she was left by the Creator's hand at first, a helpmeet to man; and the benefit from woman's elevation accrues equally to man and to woman. Both sides of humanity were equally hurt by the dislocation; and both are equally blessed by the healing of the wound. Godliness is profitable unto all things, and all persons, and all times. To men and women, to rich and poor, for time and eternity, to be in Christ is great gain.

Women sat at Jesus' feet to learn, lavished gifts in devotion of soul to his person as Saviour, ministered unto Him of their substance, stood weeping at the foot of his cross, embalmed his body dead, mingled with the Apostles in the upper room at prayer, and went forth hand in hand with man in the blessed mission to convert the world. Behold the tokens of the Healer's power! Behold the union of the broken and scattered fragments of our nature! bone coming to bone, and flesh covering them! Behold the preparation and the pledge of the paradise from which sin drove us,—into which Christ crucified brings the transgressor back.

Look now to the character and work of this particular woman.

Her inner life. She was "in the Lord." Hitherto we have been able to keep our footing with comparative ease in shallow water. At this point a single step takes us far beyond our depth. Few and feeble must our words be on this transcendent theme.

The expression "in the Lord" occurs frequently in Scripture. It indicates the new spiritual life through faith in Christ. It is one of those subjects that are at once very easy and very difficult of comprehension. Nor let any one suppose that this is merely to utter a paradox. Some of the greatest concerns of men are precisely of this character: they are at once most easy and most difficult. Life itself, for example. We who are living know very well what life is; but when any one tries to tell what it is, he soon comes to his wits' end. The exercise of any of the senses supplies other examples. We know very well what taste is, or smell. There is nothing that we know better; but try to explain what they are to one who has not experienced them, and you will find yourself very helpless.

We must fall back on the plain declarations of Scripture: "I live, yet not I, but Christ liveth in me." "Your life is hid with Christ in God." "He is our life who hath made both one." "Abide in me." "I am the vine, ye are the branches," &c. (John xv.) "If any man be in Christ, he is a new creature." Salute such and such persons who were in Christ before me.

When God's holy law is revealed to the conscience, the soul discovers itself undone. "The commandment came, sin revived, and I died." There is a sense of utter ruin,—of death. Cut off from all other hope and ready to perish, the soul turns to Christ, and clings. "God be merciful to me a sinner." In virtue of its own emptiness, the heart clasps strongly to the loving Redeemer, and that strong clasping brings life. Cut off from all other roots, the branch is grafted into the vine, and henceforth grows. This saved sinner lives now, but Christ is his life.

Persis was once an alien, without God in the world; she was a severed branch, preparing for the burning. Now the change in her is complete. She has not only ceased to contend against Christ; she has not only come over to the side of his church; she has not only come near Christ; she is in Christ: the life that she now lives in the flesh, she lives by faith of the Son of God. She hangs on Christ's person and righteousness for favour with God and an entrance into heaven. She walks about among her fellows in conscious union of spirit with the risen Redeemer. When her heart admits hatred and envy, she grieves because these abnormal beatings in her breast touch and hurt and grieve her Lord, in whom her life has its root. When she does any good work, the emotion which stirs her heart and nerves her arm is Christ's love, not only flowing from Christ to her, but out of Christ through her being, as through a member of his body. She bears about with her the dying of the Lord Jesus, and so the life of Christ also is manifested in her mortal body.

Her manifested character: "the beloved Persis." She was a general favourite. It is not only Paul that loves her: the expression carries much more. He spoke to many, of various conditions and tastes, and he spoke to all of this lady as a beloved one. He knew that they all loved her, otherwise he would not have ventured so to characterize her in a public letter to the church. When one of our ministers is long and far removed from his flock, he may send them a pastoral to be read in the public assembly. He may have occasion in that letter to name one or more of the congregation; in naming them he may, if he please, indicate in a word or two their prominent characteristics; but in such circumstances he must confine himself to what is obviously true; if he venture to indulge in some partiality of his own, he will shock the sense of the community, and so destroy at a blow his own credit. It is demonstrable that this lady was loved not by Paul only, but by all who knew her. Her character had gained her the victory, and she reigned as a queen in the hearts of willing subjects.

Here is one result of her inner life. We read of Christ that "in Him was life, and the life was the light of men." She was in the Lord as to her spirit's life, and therefore she was like the Lord in dignified mien and winsome behaviour. The life was light within, and the light shone through a transparent countenance. "Beloved Persis." Christians ought to be amiable. The more of the life in Christ within, the more of loveliness without. A selfish Christian, a peevish, ill-natured Christian, an evil-speaking, censorious Christian, a hard-hearted, close-handed Christian, a scolding, threatening, angry Christian!—these names are enough; I need not pause to explain the sense, for the sound has already conveyed the warning. These expressions are natural contraries.

We are not able in every case—perhaps not absolutely able in any case—to determine whether these and similar carnal dispositions are only blemishes that mar a Christian, or evidence that the man is still unrenewed. None of us can venture to define the maximum of earthliness that is consistent with the life of the soul. But we do not lose anything by this ignorance; perhaps these dispositions may not certainly prove that you have no part in Christ, but these dispositions in you are certainly not marks of Christ. We must get them crucified quickly, and if any one is slack in the desire and effort to cast out these enemies, on the ground that, though not perfect, he is yet safe, that fact is proof that he is still in his sin, and a stranger to the love of Christ. He may be a disciple who has one or more of these failings still hanging about him, but he is not a disciple who is willing to have them hanging about him still, in the hope, that though they mar his holiness on earth, they will not block up the entrance to heaven. No: it is the business of a Christian to be winsome in all his ways, and to be most loved where he is best known.

Up and be doing. Cut off this right hand and pluck out that right eye when they offend the head and mar the beauty of the living member. Show on all sides a beautiful life, that when its beauty becomes attractive, Christ may be honoured.

Her labour. She seems to have done her work alone. In the earlier portion of the same verse, two women are named, who seem to have associated themselves in their labours of love. Indeed, that is ordinarily both the law and the practice of Christian missions. They go two and two, whether men or women, when they go forth to win souls. Everywhere, however, and in all periods, exceptions occur. Some natures are comparatively strong and independent, while some are tender and timid. Tryphena and Tryphosa, from their names most probably sisters, at all events sisters in the new-born family of God, evidently were accustomed to lean on each other when they had difficult work in hand. When the mission-field is hard, and the mission agents tender, by all means let them go two and two; but where one is fitted by the Lord for her peculiar work, and a work that she is fitted for lies to her hand, she need not waste time waiting for a colleague. If she has a stout heart let her take to the stey brae at once; let her go her own way, leaning only on the grace of the Lord, and accountable only to the Master in Heaven. Such seems to have been the character of Persis. She did her work without a companion; perhaps she had bold fearless ways of her own, where it would have been difficult for any sister to follow her. There, at any rate, she stands alone, with her name embalmed in this blessed book till her Lord come again; there she stands, a living soul, a loved woman, and a great solitary worker on the hard field of the world. This is her honour in the meantime until the earth shall give up her dead, and Persis shall get yet a higher praise,—"Well done, good and faithful servant; enter thou into the joy of thy Lord."

It was not soft and languid wishing for the good of her neighbours that occupied the leisure of this Christian lady. Nor was it merely such work as she could do with tender hands in a drawing-room, and thus contribute to the stock of a benevolent bazaar. She did not embroider a costly piece of silk, and then arrange a lottery as the means of squeezing the money from frivolous or covetous hands in behalf of a good cause: she did the thing herself. She went to the needy place, and laid herself along the needy person, and pressed with all the might of a strong faith, and all the gentleness of a lovely character, to tear the lost from their sins, and win them over to the Saviour. The word tells us much. It is well translated,—"laboured." It indicates effort that inflicts pain, and entails weariness. It indicates, indeed, the severest toil—the toil which makes subsequent rest needful and sweet. The task was rough, though the hands that plied it were tender.

Ladies need not be afraid: work to which the love of Christ impels you will never mar the delicacy of true feminine refinement. I could name some things much in vogue at present, which do rub too roughly the tender bloom of newly-ripened womanly beauty; but personal contact with the poor, the ragged, the rude, even the wicked of her race, when she seeks them, as Christ did, in order to save, will throw a halo of heavenly light over the graces of art and nature, at once enhancing their beauty, and securing their permanence. Christianity—the Christianity that flows from an inner life in Christ—is at once the best style of manly courage, and the best style of feminine attractiveness.

I think I see this beloved Persis marching through the lanes of the city, with the children casting themselves in her way right and left to catch a glimpse of her eye, or a touch of her hand. When the eye saw her, then it blessed her. She certainly was not effeminate, who toiled hard amid a degraded heathen population, and toiled all alone; she was certainly not effeminate; but she was feminine. She was strong-minded, for she accomplished a great and difficult mission work alone: but she was refined and gentle; for she was, and was known to be, the beloved Persis.

She "laboured much." When once such a heart begins such a work, it is impossible to check its progress. The life-course of such a missionary is like a river: it is always flowing, and the farther it flows the broader it grows.

But her labour from some cause had ceased. We could not have gathered much from the circumstance that the verb is in a past tense, if that had stood alone: but in the case of the pair of sisters mentioned immediately before, Paul seems to have had the means of knowing that their mission-work was still going on. "Salute Tryphena and Tryphosa, who labour in the Lord:"—he speaks of their labour as a present continued act. Referring in the next breath to the work of Persis, he changes the form of expression, and speaks of it as a thing that was. There must have been a reason for this distinction; but it was not consistent with the brevity of this list to state it, however shortly. We cannot with certainty determine which of several causes may have interrupted this devoted woman's work; but we can without much danger of mistake come very near it. Had she been resident in some Greek city when Paul became acquainted with her and her work, and removed only of late to Rome? If this is the cause of the interruption, the interruption will not continue long. She will soon see something to do in Rome, and as soon as she sees it, she will strike in again. When it becomes your meat to do the Lord's work, you will not stand long idle. Or was she now unfit for labour? Has the soldier been borne by comrades wounded from the front? This is not an unlikely supposition. Do you remember that she was a woman, and that she was alone; that she laboured,—toiled, and toiled much; that she toiled not at man's bidding, or for man's praise; that she served not with eye service, taking it easy when none were near; that she toiled not only at the Lord's bidding, but in the Lord—felt her life hid with Christ, and animated for its work on earth by the beating of his love down into her breast,—remember all this, and you may safely conclude that a fervent spirit carried her faster and farther into the toil than the body could safely bear. She may have lived too fast for living long. The spirit may have been so sharp that in its struggle for a larger room it cut the body through. At the time when Paul wrote, Persis may have been promoted from being the Lord's working servant to be his waiting servant. Perhaps she was laid aside from labour, and fit only to pray: perhaps laid aside for that very end, because the Master had need of more hands in that department. Tryphena, Tryphosa, and the rest will go through a great quantity of work: Persis may be needed within the veil, while the multitude are engaged in the more outward form of worship which consists in working. Joshua will win the battle on the plain, if the hands of Moses are well held up on the mountain.

"The zeal of thy house hath eaten me up!"

This is not so rare a thing in Christ's service as a cold and unfair world would make believe. There is such a thing as a labour so heavy and so abundant, as to shorten the labourer's days ; but a zeal like this is by no means the characteristic feature of the Church ; if it were, the whole world would feel the impulse.

This is the time, this the place, for labour ; "there remaineth a rest for the people of God." Here and now, labour is sweeter than rest ; for rest before labour is merely idleness : there and then, the rest will be sweeter, because the labour has gone before it. Alas ! when will even the disciples of Christ learn from their Lord to shift their life-aim from the question, "How much can we GET of perishing riches," to the question, "How much can we DO, in a labour of faith and love, to leave the world better than we found it ?"

GARDENS AND GARDENING.

IN the Holy Scriptures frequent allusions are made to gardens. When man was created he was placed in a garden to dress it and keep it. In that garden eastward in Eden the Lord God made to grow every tree that is pleasant to the sight and good for food, the tree of life also in the midst of the garden, and the tree of knowledge of good and evil. A mist from the earth watered the face of the ground, and a river flowed through the garden with its refreshing stream. All was then beautiful and perfect. No noxious weeds were there to destroy the fair face of the vegetable creation, or to cause toil and anxiety to the happy pair who were the sole occupants. Ere long, however, sin entered, and death by sin. From the garden of Eden our first parents were driven, the earth was cursed, and brought forth thorns and thistles ; the one causing injury when touched, and the other with the downy appendages of its fruit spreading far and wide a vegetation which choked the growth of useful plants. Now came the sweat of the brow and the labour required for cultivation. Fair flowers still blossomed, but it required the art of horticulture to keep them in vigour and beauty, and to prevent them from suffering from the encroachment of intruders. Still man was gifted with the power of accomplishing this object, and even the cursed earth was permitted to respond to his efforts in the way of gardening. There was a grandeur in the wreck which still showed the wondrous hand of an all-wise Creator, who made man's fall subservient to his high and eternal purpose of salvation and restoration. While God makes his sun to shine on the just and unjust, and gives to all the capability of enjoying external nature, and specially the flowers which deck the mountain side or unfold their variously coloured petals in the pasture, it is to his own people that He gives the power of discerning a Father's hand in all, and of being able to say, If God so clothe the grass of the field, how much more will He care for us, his adopted children, and give us all that is truly good, both for time and for eternity ?

The attention paid to a garden is a good criterion of the character of its possessor ; what Solomon says of the sluggard's field and vineyard, applies to his garden. Nettles covering the face of the earth, tell us that the tenant is careless and lazy, or that his place is vacant. How many tales do these nettles, these garden weeds, tell ! They follow man in his peregrinations all over the world, and the place he once occupied is indicated by their presence. The Prophets speak of deserted palaces and fortresses as covered with nettles. Look at the Bass-rock, where once a garden smiled, and where still some garden-flower, such as Narcissus, remains to mark its locality ; there we find a profusion of nettles, with their poisoned stings inflicting wounds on the passers-by. On that rock-prison of the firm Covenanters—the Bass, in the Firth of Forth—there was a garden on which, no doubt, the sainted Rutherford and others looked during their days of bondage. How many thoughts would not the flowers, when blooming in the free air of heaven, suggest to them of God's providential care, while they were condemned to inhabit the dreary prison cell for their adherence to the truth as it is in Jesus. They knew that Solomon, in all his glory, was not arrayed like one of the lilies, and they felt that their Heavenly Father had provided for them a brighter and more kingly robe, with which they were even then adorned in their dungeon, and with which they would finally appear before the King of kings, in the free atmosphere of their future home.

Look again at that Highland glen, where once a happy population dwelt, where old and young enjoyed the mountain air, and where, it may be, the sound of prayer and praise arose at the morning and evening Bible-reading : where the sturdy shepherd with his dog tended the sheep on wild pastures, even amidst rain and mist and snow and sleet, and returned to his pleasant home, to be welcomed by the wife of his bosom and the children of his love. What has become of this scene now ? Ruined walls, rooms full of nettles, proclaim the departure of the inmates : no sheep are now beheld, no smiling garden round the cottage, no patches of corn giving greenness to the landscape, and telling the weary traveller that he may expect a welcome. Men desiring to be placed alone on the earth have changed the picture. They wish to be Nimrods or mighty hunters, and the pastoral scene has been exchanged for the deer forest ; the noble deer is protected, not for the enjoyment of beholding it freely grazing on the mountain, but for the rifle practice of the proprietor. Men and women, young men and maidens, boys and girls, sheep and oxen, are all expelled, that there may be full scope for sport. Desolation takes the place of pastoral beauty. Even the hunters for flowers are denied access, and the Alpine saxifrages and gentians are ordered to bloom unseen. Those who would search out in the nooks and crannies of the precipitous rocks the exquisite plants which have been planted there by an Almighty hand, are told that these pursuits must yield to the superior importance of the noble chase.

Surely this was not God's intention when He gave man the ability to study and admire his works, which are sought out by all who have pleasure therein.

The love of flowers and of a garden is inherent in the human heart. Even the hard-working artizan, immured in the closeness of a crowded city, loves to look on the flowers. A country walk on a Saturday holiday is a source of vast delight to the jaded workman whose daily occupation precludes him from such enjoyment at other times. In towns where this privilege cannot be easily secured, much gratification is derived from the contemplation of the growth of flowers at the casement or on the window-sill.

What are the casements lined with creeping herbs,
The prouder sashes fronted with a range
Of orange, myrtle, or the fragrant weed,
The Frenchman's darling? Are they not all proofs
That man, immured in cities, still retains His inborn inextinguishable thirst
Of rural scenes, compensating his loss
By supplemental shifts the best he may?

* * * * * *

There the pitcher stands,
A fragment, and the spoutless tea-pot there,
Sad witnesses how close-pent man regrets
The country; with what ardour he contrives,
A peep at nature, when he can no more.

The efforts recently made to encourage window-gardening are likely to be followed by a beneficial effect. It was indeed interesting on a late occasion in Edinburgh to behold the floral productions of closes in the High Street and Canongate, noted for their crowded population and forbidding atmosphere. The old iron pot bearing a treasured geranium, the twining plant in its rude wooden or earthenware can, forming its coils around hoops picked up by a cinder-woman among the ashes thrown out in the streets, and numerous other flowering plants, showed the advantage of encouraging the working-classes to care for plant-growing. The posies gathered by the children from five to ten years of age were objects of great interest, and proved that the prizes offered had set the young to collect the beauteous gems which grew wild in the fields, in the meadows, and on the hill-sides; the small collection of named weeds sent by a young boy could not be seen without calling forth sentiments of the warmest sympathy. While the wild flowers of nature or the cultivated plants of the window afford sources of pleasure to the poor, the productions of the garden supply recreation to the rich; thus the floral treasures of the earth contribute to the comfort and gratification of all members of society. In sunshine and shade, in prosperity and in adversity, in the early days of youth, in the vigour of manhood, and in ripe old age, the garden is an object of interest. The philosophers of old meditated in academic groves, and many a man famed in literature and science has derived hints from meditation among flowers.

In speaking of flowers, the poet remarks:—

Everywhere about us are they glowing,
Some, like stars, to tell us Spring is born;
Others, their blue eyes with tarse o'erflowing,
Stand, like Ruth, amid the golden corn.

Not alone in Spring's armorial bearing,
And in Summer's green-emblazon'd field,
But in arms of brave old Autumn's wearing,
In the centre of his brazen shield.

Not alone in meadows and green alleys,
On the mountain top, and by the brink
Of sequestered pools in woodland valleys,
Where the slaves of nature stoop to drink;

* * * * * *

In the cottage of the rudest peasant,
In ancestral homes, where crumbling towers,
Speaking of the Past unto the Present,
Tell us of the ancient games of flowers.

In all places, then, and in all seasons,
Flowers expand their light and soul-like wings,
Teaching us by most persuasive reasons,
How akin they are to human things.

And with child-like credulous affection,
We behold their tender buds expand;
Emblems of our own great resurrection,
Emblems of the bright and better land.

We do not mean to say that the contemplation and study of flowers in a garden can ever lead us to the true source of permanent peace and joy; such joy and peace cannot come from the contemplation of God's works, they can only be secured by the teaching of the Spirit and the enlightened study of God's Word. The mere knowledge of God's works can never soothe the troubled conscience, nor ease the aching heart in the day of trial. There must be a better foundation, a resting on Him who is the Root and the Branch, the Rose of Sharon, the Lily of the valley, and from whom alone all fulness of comfort flows.

In the Song of Solomon the Church of Christ is likened unto a garden whence the richest perfumes flow. The Israel of God are likened by Isaiah and Jeremiah to a well-watered garden, a garden which the Lord shall bless. The times of reviving to the house of Jacob are signalised by the exchange of the myrtle for the briar and thorn: "For as the earth bringeth forth her bud, and as the garden causeth the things that are sown in it to spring forth, so the Lord God will cause righteousness and praise to spring forth before all the nations." In the final scene as given in Revelation, when the new earth shall be created, there shall be a Tree of Life bearing twelve manner of fruits, and its leaves shall be for the healing of the nations.

When man yielded to the temptation of Satan, it was in a garden; there the curse was pronounced, and there too the Redeemer was promised who was to bruise the head of the serpent. Jesus oft-times resorted to a garden with his disciples. In the garden of Gethsemane our Lord Jesus Christ, God-man, agonised under the hiding of his Father's face, when his sweat was as great drops of blood falling to the ground; there He prayed and poured out his soul in the days of his passion. In the garden Jesus was betrayed into the hands of sinners; and thence he went forth to the judgment-hall of Pilate, thereafter to suffer the accursed death of the cross, and to die, the Just for the unjust, in order to bring us unto God.

J. H. Balfour.

ANNALS OF A QUIET NEIGHBOURHOOD.

BY THE VICAR.

I.

Before I begin to tell you some of the things I have seen and heard, in both of which I have had to take a share, now from the compulsion of my office, now from the leading of my own heart, and now from that destiny which, including both, so often throws the man who supposed himself a mere on-looker, into the very vortex of events—that destiny which took form to the old pagans as a grey mist high beyond the heads of their gods, but to us is known as an infinite love, revealed in the mystery of man—I say before I begin, it is fitting that, in the absence of a common friend to do that office for me, I should introduce myself to your acquaintance, and I hope coming friendship. Nor can there be any impropriety in my telling you about myself, seeing I remain concealed behind my own words. You can never look me in the eyes, though you may look me in the soul. You may find me out, find my faults, my vanities, my sins, but you will not see me, at least in this world. To you I am but a voice of revealing, not a form of vision; therefore I am bold behind the mask, to speak to you heart to heart; bold, I say, just so much the more that I do not speak to you face to face. And when we meet in heaven—well, there I know there is no hiding; there, there is no reason for hiding anything; there, the whole desire will be alternate revelation and vision.

I am now getting old—faster and faster. I cannot help my grey hairs, nor the wrinkles that gather so slowly yet ruthlessly; no, nor the quaver that will come in my voice, nor the sense of being feeble in the knees, even when I walk only across the floor of my study. I have not got used to age yet. I do not feel one atom older than I did at three and twenty. Nay, to tell all the truth, I feel a good deal younger.—For then I only felt that a man had to take up his cross; whereas now I feel that a man has to follow Him; and that makes an unspeakable difference.—When my voice quavers, I feel that it is mine and not mine; that it just belongs to me like my watch, which does not go well now, though it went well thirty years ago—not more than a minute out in a month. And when I feel my knees shake, I think of them with a kind of pity, as I used to think of an old mare of my father's of which

I was very fond when I was a lad, and which bore me across many a field and over many a fence, but which at last came to have the same weakness in her knees that I have in mine ; and she knew it too, and took care of them, and so of herself, in a wise equine fashion. These things are not me—or I, if the grammarians like it better ; (I always feel a strife between doing as the scholar does and doing as other people do ;) they are not me, I say ; I have them—and, please God, shall soon have better. For it is not a pleasant thing for a young man, or a young woman either, I venture to say, to have an old voice, and a wrinkled face, and weak knees, and grey hair, or no hair at all. And if any moral Philistine, as our queer German brothers over the Northern fish-pond would call him, say that this is all rubbish, for that we are old, I would answer : "Of all children how can the children of God be old?"

So little do I give in to calling this outside of me, me, that I should not mind presenting a minute description of my own person such as would at once clear me from any suspicion of vanity in so introducing myself. Not that my honesty would result in the least from indifference to the external—but from comparative indifference to the transitional ; not to the transitional in itself, which is of eternal significance and result, but to the particular form of imperfection which it may have reached at any individual moment of its infinite progression towards the complete. For no sooner have I spoken the word now, than that now is dead and another is dying ; nay, in such a regard, there is no now—only a past of which we know a little, and a future of which we know far less and far more. But I will not speak at all of this body of my earthly tabernacle, for it is on the whole more pleasant to forget all about it. And besides, I do not want to set any of my readers to whom I would have the pleasure of speaking far more openly and cordially than if they were seated on the other side of my writing-table—I do not want to set them wondering whether the vicar be this vicar or that vicar ; or indeed to run the risk of giving the offence I might give, if I were anything else than "a wandering voice."

I did not feel as I feel now when first I came to this parish. For, as I have said, I am now getting old very fast. True, I was thirty when I was made a vicar, an age at which a man might be expected to be beginning to grow wise ; but even then I had much yet to learn.

I well remember the first evening on which I wandered out from the vicarage to take a look about me —to find out, in short, where I was, and what aspect the sky and earth here presented. Strangely enough, I had never been here before. For the presentation had been made me while I was abroad. I was depressed. It was depressing weather. Grave doubts as to whether I was in my place in the Church, would keep rising and floating about, like rain-clouds within me. Not that I doubted about the Church ; I only doubted about myself. "Were my motives pure?" "What were my motives?" And to tell the truth, I did not know what my motives were, and therefore I could not answer about the purity of them. Perhaps seeing we are in this world in order to become pure, it would be expecting too much of any young man that he should be absolutely certain that he was pure in anything. But the question followed very naturally : "Had I then any right to be in the Church —to be eating her bread and drinking her wine without knowing whether I was fit to do her work?" To which the only answer I could find was, "The Church is part of God's world. He makes men to work ; and work of some sort must be done by every honest man. Somehow or other, I hardly know how, I find myself in the Church. I do not know that I am fitter for any other work. I see no other work to do. There is work here which I can do after some fashion. With God's help I will try to do it well."

This resolution brought me some relief, but still I was depressed. It was depressing weather. I may as well say that I was not married then, and that I firmly believed I never should be married—not from any ambition taking the form of self-denial ; nor yet from any notion that God takes pleasure in being a hard master ; but there was a lady—Well, I will be honest, as I would be.—I had been refused a few months before, which I think was the best thing ever happened to me except one. That one, of course, was when I was accepted. But this is not much to the purpose now. Only it was depressing weather.

For is it not depressing when the rain is falling, and the steam of it is rising? when the river is crawling along muddily, and the horses stand stock-still in the meadows with their spines in a straight line from the ears to where they fail utterly in the tails? I should only put on goloshes now, and think of the days when I despised damp. Ah! it was mental waterproof that I needed then ; for let me despise damp as much as I would, I could neither keep it out of my mind, nor help suffering the spiritual rheumatism which it occasioned. Now, the damp never gets farther than my goloshes and my macintosh. And for that worst kind of rheumatism—I never feel it now.

But I had begun to tell you about that first evening. —I had arrived at the vicarage the night before, and it had rained all day, and was still raining, though not so much. I took my umbrella and went out.

For as I wanted to do my work well (everything taking far more the shape of work to me, then, and duty, than it does now—though, even now, I must confess things have occasionally to be done by the clergyman because there is no one else to do them, and hardly from other motive than a sense of duty,—a man not being able to shirk work because it may happen to be dirty)—I say, as I wanted to do my work well, or rather, perhaps, because I dreaded drudgery as much as any poor fellow who comes to the treadmill in consequence—I wanted to interest myself in it ; and therefore I would go and fall in love, first of all, if I could, with the country round about. And my first step beyond my own gate was up to the ancles in mud.

Therewith, curiously enough, arose the distracting thought how I could possibly preach two good sermons a Sunday to the same people, when one of the sermons was in the afternoon instead of the evening, to which I had been accustomed in the large town in which I had formerly officiated as curate in a proprietary chapel. I, who had declaimed indignantly against excitement from without, who had been inclined to exalt the intellect at the expense even of the heart, began to fear that there must be something in the darkness, and the gas-lights, and the crowd of faces, to account for a man's being able to preach a better sermon, and for servant girls preferring to go out in the evening. Alas! I had now to preach, as I might judge with all probability beforehand, to a company of rustics, of thought yet slower than of speech, unaccustomed in fact to think at all, and that in the sleepiest, deadest part of the day, when I could hardly think myself, and when, if the weather should be at all warm, I could not expect many of them to be awake. And what good might I look for as the result of my labour? How could I hope in these men and women to kindle that fire which in the old days of the outpouring of the Spirit made men live with the sense of the kingdom of heaven about them, and the expectation of something glorious at hand just outside that invisible door which lay between the worlds?

I have learned since, that perhaps I overrated the spirituality of those times, and underrated, not being myself spiritual enough to see all about me, the spirituality of these times. I think I have learned since, that the parson of a parish must be content to keep the upper windows of his mind open to the holy winds and the pure lights of heaven; and the side windows of tone, of speech, of behaviour open to the earth, to let forth upon his fellow men the tenderness and truth which those upper influences bring forth in any region exposed to their operation. Believing in his Master, such a servant shall not make haste; shall feel no feverous desire to behold the work of his hands; shall be content to be as his Master, who waiteth long for the fruits of his earth.

But surely I am getting older than I thought; for I keep wandering away from my subject, which is this my first walk in my new cure. My excuse is, that I want my reader to understand something of the state of my mind, and the depression under which I was labouring. He will perceive that I desired to do some work worth calling by the name of work, and that I did not see how to get hold of a beginning.

I had not gone far from my own gate before the rain ceased, though it was still gloomy enough for any amount to follow. I drew down my umbrella, and began to look about me. The stream on my left was so swollen that I could see its brown in patches through the green of the meadows along its banks. A little in front of me, the road, rising quickly, took a sharp turn to pass along an old stone bridge that spanned the water with a single fine arch, somewhat pointed; and through the arch I could see the river stretching away up through the meadows, its banks bordered with pollards. Now pollards always made me miserable. In the first place, they look ill-used; in the next place, they look tame; in the third place, they look very ugly. I had not learned then to honour them on the ground that they yield not a jot to the adversity of their circumstances; that, if they must be pollards, they still will be trees; and what they may not do with grace, they will yet do with bounty; that, in short, their life bursts forth, despite of all that is done to repress and destroy their individuality. When you have once learned to honour anything, love is not very far off; at least that has always been my experience. But, as I have said, I had not yet learned to honour pollards, and therefore they made me more miserable than I was already.

When, having followed the road, I stood at last on the bridge, and, looking up and down the river through the misty air, saw two long rows of these pollards diminishing till they vanished in both directions, the sight of them took from me all power of enjoying the water beneath me, the green fields around me, or even the old-world beauty of the little bridge upon which I stood, although all sorts of bridges have been from very infancy a delight to me. For I am one of those who never get rid of their infantile predilections, and to have once enjoyed making a mud bridge, was to enjoy all bridges for ever.

I saw a man in a white smock-frock coming along the road beyond, but I turned my back to the road, leaned my arms on the parapet of the bridge, and stood gazing where I saw no visions, namely, at those very poplars. I heard the man's footsteps coming up the crown of the arch, but I would not turn to greet him. I was in a selfish humour if ever I was; for surely if ever one man ought to greet another, it was upon such a comfortless afternoon. The footsteps stopped behind me, and I heard a voice:—

"I beg yer pardon, sir; but be you the new vicar?"

I turned instantly and answered, "I am. Do you want me?"

"I wanted to see yer face, sir, that was all, if ye'll not take it amiss."

Before me stood a tall old man, with his hat in his hand, clothed as I have said, in a white smock-frock. He smoothed his short grey hair with his curved palm down over his forehead as he stood. His face was of a red brown, from much exposure to the weather. There was a certain look of roughness, without hardness, in it, which spoke of endurance rather than resistance, although he could evidently set his face as a flint. His features were large and a little coarse, but the smile that parted his lips when he spoke, shone in his grey eyes as well, and lighted up a countenance in which a man might trust.

"I wanted to see yer face, sir, if you'll not take it amiss."

"Certainly not," I answered, pleased with the man's address, as he stood square before me, looking as modest as fearless. "The sight of a man's face is what everybody has a right to; but for all that, I should like to know why you want to see my face."

"Why, sir, you be the new vicar. You kindly told me so when I axed you."

"Well, then, you'll see my face on Sunday in church—that is, if you happen to be there."

For, although some might think it the more dignified way, I could not take it as a matter of course that he would be at church. A man might have better reasons for staying away from church than I had for going, even though I was the parson, and it was my business. Some clergymen separate between themselves and their office to a degree which I cannot understand. To assert the dignities of my office seems to me very like exalting myself; and when I have had a twinge of conscience about it, as has happened more than once, I have then found comfort in these two texts: "The Son of man came not to be ministered unto but to minister;" and "It is enough that the servant should be as his master." Neither have I ever been able to see the very great difference between right and wrong in a clergyman and right and wrong in another man. All that I can pretend to have yet discovered comes to this: that what is right in another man is right in a clergyman; and what is wrong in another man is much worse in a clergyman. Here, however, is one more proof of approaching age. I do not mean the opinion, but the digression.

"Well, then," I said, "you'll see my face in church on Sunday, if you happen to be there."

"Yes, sir; but you see, sir, on the bridge here, the parson is the parson like, and I'm old Rogers; and I looks in his face and he looks in mine, and I says to myself, 'This is my parson.' But o' Sundays he's nobody's parson: he's got his work to do, and it mun be done, and there's an end on't.'"

That there was a real idea in the old man's mind was considerably clearer than the logic by which he tried to bring it out.

"Did you know parson that's gone, sir?" he went on.

"No," I answered.

"Oh, sir! he wur a good parson. Many's the time he come and sit at my son's bedside—him that's dead and gone, sir—for a long hour, on a Saturday night, too. And then when I see him up in the desk the next mornin', I'd say to myself, 'Old Rogers, that's the same man as sat by your son's bedside last night. Think o' that, old Rogers!' But, somehow, I never did feel right sure o' that same. He didn't seem to have the same cut, somehow; and he didn't talk a bit the same. And when he spoke to me after sermon, in the churchyard, I was always of a mind to go into the church again and look up to the pulpit to see if he war really out ov it; for this warn't the same man, you see. But you'll know all about it better than I can tell you, sir. Only I always liked parson better out o' the pulpit, and that's how I come to want to make you look at me, sir, instead o' the water down there, afore I see you in the church to-morrow mornin'."

The old man laughed a kindly laugh; but he had set me thinking, and I did not know what to say to him all at once. So after a short pause, he resumed:

"You'll be thinking me a queer kind of a man, sir, to speak to my betters before my betters speaks to me. But mayhap you don't know what a parson is to us poor folk that has ne'er a friend more larned than themselves but the parson. And, besides, sir, I'm an old salt,—an old man-o'-war's man,—and I've been all round the world, sir; and I ha' been in all sorts o' company, pirates and all, sir; and I aint a bit frightened of a parson. No; I love a parson, sir. And I'll tell you for why, sir. He's got a good telescope, and he gits to the masthead, and he looks out. And he sings out, 'Land ahead!' or 'Breakers ahead!' and gives directions accordin'. Only I can't always make out what he says. But when he shuts up his spyglass, and comes down the riggin', and talks to us like one man to another, then I don't know what I should do without the parson. Good evenin' to you, sir, and welcome to Marshmallows."

The pollards did not look half so dreary. The river began to glimmer a little; and the old bridge had become an interesting old bridge. The country altogether was rather nice than otherwise. I had found a friend already!—that is, a man to whom I might possibly be of some use; and that was the most precious friend I could think of in my present situation and mood. I had learned something from him too; and I resolved to try all I could to be the same man in the pulpit that I was out of it. Some may be inclined to say that I had better have formed the resolution to be the same man out of the pulpit that I was in it. But the one will go quite right with the other. Out of the pulpit I would be the same man I was in it—seeing and feeling the realities of the unseen; and in the pulpit I would be the same man I was out of it—taking facts as they are, and dealing with things as they show themselves in the world.

One other occurrence before I went home that evening, and I shall close the chapter. I hope I shall not write another so dull as this. I dare not promise, though; for this is a new kind of work to me.

Before I left the bridge,—while, in fact, I was contemplating the pollards with an eye, if not of favour, yet of diminished dismay,—the sun, which, for anything I knew of his whereabouts, either from knowledge of the country, aspect of the evening, or state of my own feelings, might have been down for an hour or two, burst his cloudy bands, and blazed out as if he had just risen from the dead, instead of being just about to sink into the grave. Do not tell me that my figure is untrue, for that the sun never sinks into the grave, else I will retort that it is just as true of the sun as of a man; for that no man sinks into the grave. He only disappears. Life is a constant sunrise, which death cannot interrupt, any more than the night can swallow up the sun. "God is not the God of the dead, but of the living; for all live unto Him."

Well, the sun shone out gloriously. The whole sweep of the gloomy river answered him in gladness; the wet leaves of the pollards quivered and glanced; the meadows offered up their perfect green, fresh and clear out of the trouble of the rain; and away in the distance, upon a rising ground covered with trees, glittered a weather-cock. What if I found afterwards that it was only on the roof of a stable? It shone, and that was enough. And when the sun had gone below the horizon, and the fields and the river were dusky once more, there it glittered still over the darkening earth, a symbol of that faith which is "the evidence of things not seen," and it made my heart swell as at a chant from the prophet Isaiah. What matter then whether it hung over a stable-roof or a church-tower?

I wandered a little further along the bridge and along the road. I had not gone far before I passed a house, out of which came a young woman leading a little boy. They came after me, the boy gazing at the red and gold and green of the sunset sky. As they passed me, the child said,—

"Auntie, I think I should like to be a painter."

"Why?" returned his companion.

"Because, then," answered the child, "I could help God to paint the sky."

What his aunt answered I do not know; for they were presently beyond my hearing. But I went on answering him myself all the way home. Did God care to paint the sky of an evening, that a few of his children might see it, and get just a hope, just an aspiration, out of its passing green, and gold, and purple and red? and should I think my day's labour lost, if it wrought no visible salvation in the earth?

Was the child's aspiration in vain then? Could I tell him God did not want his help to paint the sky? True he could mount no scaffold against the infinite of the glowing west. But might he not with his little palette and brush, when the time came, show his brothers and sisters what he had seen there, and make them see it too? Might he not thus come, after long trying, to help God to paint this glory of vapour and light inside the minds of his children? Ah! if any man's work is not with God, its results shall be burned, ruthlessly burned, because poor and bad.

"So, for my part," I said to myself, as I walked home, "if I can put one touch of a rosy sunset into the life of any man or woman of my cure, I shall feel that I have worked with God. He is in no haste; and if I do what I may in earnest, I need not mourn if I work no great work in the earth. Let God make his sunsets: I will mottle my little fading cloud. To help the growth of a thought that struggles towards the light; to brush with gentle hand the earth-stain from the white of one snowdrop—such be my ambition! So shall I scale the rocks in front, not leave my name carved upon those behind me."

People talk about special providences. I believe in the providences, but not in the specialty. I do not believe that God lets the thread of my affairs go for six days, and on the seventh evening takes it up for a moment. The so-called special providences are no exception to the rule—they are common to all men at all moments. But it is a fact that God's care is more evident in some instances of it than in others to the dim and often bewildered vision of humanity. Upon such instances men seize and call them providences. It is well that they can; but it would be gloriously better if they could believe that the whole matter is one grand providence.

I was one of such men at the time, and could not fail to see what I called a special providence in this, that on my first attempt to find where I stood in the scheme of Providence, and while I was discouraged with regard to the work before me, I should fall in with these two—an old man whom I could help, and a child who could help me; the one opening an outlet for my labour and my love, and the other reminding me of the highest source of the most humbling comfort,—that in all my work I might be a fellow-worker with God.

II.

These events fell on the Saturday night. On the Sunday morning, I read prayers and preached. Never before had I enjoyed so much the petitions of the Church, which Hooker calls "the sending of angels upward," or the reading of the lessons, which he calls "the receiving of angels descended from above." And whether from the newness of the parson, or the love of the service, certainly a congregation more intent, or more responsive, a clergyman will hardly find. But, as I had feared, it was different in the afternoon. The people had dined, and the usual somnolence had followed; nor could I find in my heart to blame men and women who worked hard all the week, for being drowsy on the day of rest. So I curtailed my sermon as much as I could, omitting page after page of my manuscript; and when I came to a close, was rewarded by perceiving an agreeable surprise upon many of the faces round me. I resolved that, in the afternoons at least, my sermons should be as short as heart could wish.

But that afternoon there was at least one man of the congregation who was neither drowsy nor inattentive. Repeatedly my eyes left the page off which I was reading and glanced towards him. Not once did I find his eyes turned away from me.

There was a small loft in the west end of the church, in which stood a little organ, whose voice, weakened by years of praising and possibly of neglect, had yet among a good many tones that were rough, wooden, and reedy, a few remaining that were as mellow as ever praiseful heart could wish to praise withal. And these came in amongst the rest like trusting thoughts amidst "eating cares;" like the faces of children borne in the arms of a crowd of anxious mothers; like hopes that are young prophecies amidst the downward sweep of events. For, though I do not understand music, I have a keen ear for the perfection of the single tone, or the completeness of the harmony. But of this organ more by and by.

Now this little gallery was something larger than was just necessary for the organ and its ministrants, and a few of the parishioners had chosen to sit in its fore-front. Upon this occasion there was no one there but the man to whom I have referred.

The space below this gallery was not included in the part of the church used for the service. It was claimed by the gardener of the place, that is the sexton, to hold his gardening tools. There were a few ancient carvings in wood lying in it, very brown in the dusky light that came through a small lancet window, opening not to the outside, but into the tower, itself dusky with an enduring twilight. And there were some broken old headstones, and the kindly spade and pickaxe—but I have really nothing to do with these now, for I am, as it were, in the pulpit, whence one ought to look beyond such things as these.

Rising against the screen which separated this mouldy portion of the church from the rest, stood an old monument of carved wood, once brilliantly painted in the portions that bore the arms of the family over whose vault it stood, but now all bare and worn, itself gently flowing away into the dust it commemorated. It lifted its gablet, carved to look like a canopy, till its apex was on a level with the book-board on the front of the organ-loft; and over—in fact upon this apex appeared the face of the man whom I have mentioned. It was a very remarkable countenance—pale, and very thin, without any hair, except that of thick eyebrows that far overhung keen, questioning eyes. Short bushy hair, grey, not white, covered a well-formed head with a high narrow forehead. As I have said, those keen eyes kept looking at me from under their grey eyebrows all the time of the sermon—intelligently without doubt, but whether sympathetically or otherwise I could not determine.

My vestry door opened upon a little group of graves, simple and green, without headstone or slab; poor graves, the memory of whose occupants no one had cared to preserve. Good men must have preceded me here, else the poor would not have lain so near the chancel and the vestry-door. All about and beyond were stones, with here and there a monument; for mine was a large parish, and there were old and rich families in it, more of which buried their dead here than assembled their living. But close by the vestry-door, there was this little billowy lake of grass. And at the end of the narrow path leading from the door, was the churchyard wall, with a few steps on each side of it, that the parson might pass at once from the churchyard into his own shrubbery, here tangled, almost matted, from luxuriance of growth. But I would not creep out the back way from among my people. That way might do very well to come in by; but to go out, I would use the door of the people. So I went along the church, a fine old place, such as I had never hoped to be presented to, and went out by the door in the north side into the middle of the churchyard. The door on the other side was chiefly used by the few gentry of the neighbourhood; and the Lych-gate, with its covered way (for the main road had once passed on that side), was shared between the coffins and the carriages, the dead who had no rank but one, that of the dead, and the living who had more money than their neighbours. For let the old gentry disclaim it as they may, mere wealth, derived from whatever source, will sooner reach their level, than poor antiquity, or the rarest refinement of personal worth; although, to be sure, the oldest of them will sooner give to the rich their sons or their daughters to wed, to love if they can, to have children by, than they will yield a jot of their ancestral pre-eminence, or acknowledge any equality in their sons or daughters-in-law. The carpenter's son is to them an old myth, not an everlasting fact. To Mammon alone will they yield a little of their rank—none of it to Christ. Let me glorify God that Jesus took not on him the nature of nobles, but the seed of Adam; for what could I do without my poor brothers and sisters?

I passed along the church to the northern door, and went out. The churchyard lay in bright sunshine. All the rain and gloom were gone. "If one could only bring this glory of sun and grass into one's hope for the future!" thought I; and looking down I saw the little boy who aspired to paint the sky, looking up in my face with mingled confidence and awe.

"Do you trust me, my little man?" thought I. "You shall trust me then. But I won't be a priest to you. I'll be a big brother."

For the priesthood passes away, the brotherhood endures. The priesthood passes away, swallowed up in the brotherhood. It is because men cannot learn simple things, cannot believe in the brotherhood, that they need a priesthood. But as Dr. Arnold said of the Sunday, "They do need it." And I, for one, am sure that the priesthood needs the people much more than the people needs the priesthood.

So I stooped and lifted the child and held him in my arms. And the little fellow looked at me one moment longer, and then put his arms gently round my neck. And so we were friends.

When I had set him down, which I did presently, for I shuddered at the idea of the people thinking that I was showing off the clergyman, I looked at the boy. In his face was great sweetness mingled with great rusticity, and I could not tell whether he was the child of gentlefolk or of peasants. He did not say a word, but walked away to join his aunt, who was waiting for him at the gate of the churchyard. He kept his head turned towards me, however, as he went, so that, not seeing where he was going, he stumbled over the grave of a child, and fell in the hollow on the other side. I ran to pick him up. His aunt reached him at the same moment.

"Oh, thank you, sir!" she said, as I gave him to her, with an earnestness which seemed to me disproportionate to the deed. She carried him away with a deep blush over all her countenance.

At the churchyard-gate, the old man-of-war's man was waiting to have another look at me. His hat was in his hand, and he gave a pull to the short hair over his forehead, as if he would gladly take that off too, to show his respect for the new parson. I held out my hand gratefully. It could not close around the hard unyielding mass of fingers which met it. He did not know how to shake hands, and left it all to me. But pleasure sparkled in his eyes.

"My old woman would like to shake hands with you, sir," he said.

Beside him stood his old woman in a portentous bonnet, beneath whose gay yellow ribbons appeared a dusky old face wrinkled like a ship's timbers, out of which looked a pair of keen black eyes, where the best beauty, that of loving-kindness, had not merely lingered, but triumphed.

"I shall be in to see you soon," I said, as I shook hands with her. "I shall find out where you live."

"Down by the mill," she said; "close by it, sir. There's one bed in our garden that always thrives, in the hottest summer, by the plash from the mill, sir."

"Ask for old Rogers, sir," said the man. "Everybody knows old Rogers. But if your reverence minds what my wife says, you won't go wrong. When you find the river, it takes you to the mill; and when you find the mill, you find the wheel; and when you find the wheel, you haven't far to look for the cottage, sir. It's a poor place, but you'll be welcome, sir."

III.

The next day I might expect some visitors. It is a fortunate thing that English society now regards the parson as a gentleman, else he would have little chance of being useful to the upper classes. But I wanted to get a good start of them, and see some of my poor before my rich came to see me. So after breakfast, on as lovely a Monday in the beginning of autumn as ever came to comfort a clergyman in the reaction of his efforts to feed his flock on the Sunday, I walked out, and took my way to the village. I strove to dismiss from my mind every feeling of doing duty, of performing my part, and all that. I had a horror of becoming a moral policeman as much as of "doing church." I would simply enjoy the privilege, more open to me in virtue of my office, of ministering. But as no servant has a right to force his service, so I would be the neighbour only, until such time as the opportunity of being the servant should show itself.

The village was as irregular as a village should be, partly consisting of those white houses with intersecting parallelograms of black which still abound in some regions of our island. Just in the centre, however, grouping about an old house of red brick, which had once been a manorial residence, but was now sub-divided in all modes that analytic ingenuity could devise, rose a portion of it which, from one point of view, might seem part of an old town. But you had only to pass round any one of three visible corners to see stacks of wheat and a farm-yard; while in another direction the houses went straggling away into a wood that looked very like the beginning of a forest, of which some of the village orchards appeared to form part. From the street the slow winding, poplar-bordered stream was here and there just visible.

I did not quite like to have it between me and my village. I could not help preferring that homely relation in which the houses are built up like swallow-nests on to the very walls of the cathedrals themselves, to the arrangement here, where the river flowed, with what flow there was in it, between the church and the people.

A little way beyond the further end of the village appeared an iron gate, of considerable size, dividing a lofty stone wall. And upon the top of the one of the stone pillars supporting the gate which I could see, stood a creature of stone, whether natant, volant, passant, couchant, or rampant, I could not tell, only it looked like something terrible enough for a quite antediluvian heraldry.

As I passed along the street, wondering with myself what relations between me and these houses were hidden in the future, my eye was caught by the window of a little shop, in which strings of beads and elephants of gingerbread formed the chief samples of the goods within. It was a window much broader than it was high, divided into lozenge-shaped panes. Wondering what kind of old woman presided over the treasures in this cave of Aladdin, I thought to make a first of my visits by going in and buying something. But I hesitated, because I could not think of anything I was in want of—at least that the old woman was likely to have. To be sure I wanted a copy of Bengel's Gnomon; but she was not likely to have that. I wanted the fourth plate in the third volume of Law's Behmen; she was not likely to have that either. I did not care for gingerbread; and I had no little girl to take home beads to.

But why should I not go in without an ostensible errand? For this reason: there are dissenters everywhere, and I could not tell but I might be going into the shop of a dissenter. Now, though, I confess, nothing would have pleased me better than that all the dissenters should return to their old home in the Church, I could not endure the suspicion of laying myself out to entice them back by canvassing or other personal influences. Whether they returned or not, however (and I did not expect many would), I hoped still, some day, to stand towards every one of them in the relation of the parson of the parish, that is, of one of whom each might feel certain that he was ready to serve him or her at any hour when he might be wanted to render a service. In the meantime, I could not help hesitating.

I had almost made up my mind to ask if she had a small pocket compass, for I had seen such things in little country shops—I am afraid only in France, though—when the door opened, and out came the little boy whom I had already seen twice, and who was therefore one of my oldest friends in the place. He came across the road to me, took me by the hand, and said—

"Come and see mother."

"Where, my dear?" I asked.

"In the shop there," he answered.

"Is it your mother's shop?"

"Yes."

I said no more, but accompanied him. Of course my expectation of seeing an old woman behind the counter had vanished, but I was not in the least prepared for the woman I did see.

The place was half a shop and half a kitchen. A yard or so of counter stretched inwards from the door, just as a hint to those who might be intrusively inclined. Beyond this, by the chimney-corner, sat the mother, who rose as we entered. She was certainly one—I do not say of the most beautiful, but, until I have time to explain further—of the most remarkable women I had ever seen. Her face was absolutely white—no, pale cream-colour—except her lips and a spot upon each cheek, which glowed with a deep carmine. You would have said she had been painting, and painting very inartistically, so little was the red shaded into the surrounding white. Now this was certainly not beautiful. Indeed, it occasioned a strange feeling, almost of terror, at first, for she reminded one of the spectre woman in the Rime of the Ancient Mariner. But when I got used to her complexion, I saw that the form of her features was quite beautiful. She might indeed have been lovely but for a certain hardness which showed through the beauty. This might have been the result of ill health, ill-endured; but I doubted it. For there was a certain modelling of the cheeks and lips which showed that the teeth within were firmly closed; and, taken with the look of the eyes and forehead, seemed the expression of a constant and bitter self-command. But there were indubitable marks of ill health upon her, notwithstanding; for not to mention her complexion, her large dark eye was burning as if the lamp of life had broken and the oil was blazing; and there was a slight expansion of the nostrils, indicating physical unrest. But her manner was perfectly, almost dreadfully quiet; her voice soft, low, and chiefly expressive of indifference. She spoke without looking me in the face, but did not seem either shy or ashamed. Her figure was remarkably graceful, though too worn to be beautiful.—Here was a strange parishioner for me! —in a country toy-shop, too!

As soon as the little fellow had brought me in, he shrunk away through a half-open door that revealed a stair behind.

"What can I do for you, sir?" said the mother, coldly, and with a kind of book-propriety of speech, as she stood on the other side of the little counter.

"To tell the truth, I hardly know," I said. "I am the new vicar; but I do not know that I should have come in to see you just to-day, if it had not been that your little boy there—where is he gone to? He asked me to come in and see his mother."

"He is too ready to make advances to strangers, sir."

She said this in an incisive tone.

"Oh, but," I answered, "I am not a stranger to him. I have met him twice before. He is a little darling. I assure you he has quite gained my heart."

No reply for a moment. Then just "Indeed!" and nothing more.

I could not understand it.

But a jar on a shelf, marked Tobacco, rescued me from the most pressing portion of the perplexity, namely, what to say next.

"Will you give me a quarter of a pound of tobacco?" I said.

The woman turned, took down the jar, arranged the scales, weighed out the quantity, wrapped it up, took the money,—and all without one other word than, "Thank you, sir;" which was all I could return, with the addition of, "Good morning."

For nothing was left me but to walk away with my parcel in my pocket.

The little boy did not show himself again.

Pondering, speculating, I now set out to find the mill, which, I had learned, was on the village side of the river; and coming to a lane leading down to the river, I followed it, and then walked up a path outside the row of pollards, through a lovely meadow, where brown and white cows were eating and shining all over the thick deep grass. Beyond the meadow, a wood on the side of a rising ground went parallel with the river a long way. The river flowed on my right. That is, I knew that it was flowing, but I could not have told how I knew, it was so slow. Still swollen, it was of a clear brown, in which you could see the browner trouts darting to and fro with such a slippery gliding that the motion seemed the result of will, without any such intermediate and complicate arrangement as brain and nerves and muscles. The water-beetles went spinning about over the surface; and one glorious dragon-fly made a mist about him with his long wings. And over all the sun hung in the sky, pouring down life; shining on the roots of the willows at the bottom of the stream; lighting up the black head of the water-rat as he hurried across to the opposite bank; glorifying the rich green lake of the grass; and giving to the whole an utterance of love and hope and joy which was, to him who could read it, a more certain and full revelation of God than any display of power in thunder, in avalanche, in stormy sea. Those with whom the feeling of religion is only occasional, have it most when the awful or grand breaks out of the common; the meek who inherit the earth, find the God of the whole earth more evidently present—I do not say more present, for there is no measuring of His presence—more evidently present in the commonest things. That which is best He gives most plentifully, as is reason with Him. Hence the quiet fulness of ordinary nature; hence the Spirit to them that ask it.

I soon came within sound of the mill; and presently, crossing the stream that flowed back to the river after having done its work on the corn, I came in front of the building, and looked over the half-door into the mill. The floor was clean and dusty. A few full sacks, tied tight at the mouth,—they always look to me as if Joseph's silver cup were just inside—stood about. In the further corner, the flour was trickling down out of two wooden spouts into a wooden receptacle below. The whole place was full of its own faint but pleasant odour. No man was visible. The spouts went on pouring the slow torrent of flour, as if everything could go on with perfect propriety of itself. I could not even see how a man could get at the stones that I heard grinding away above, except he went up the rope that hung from the ceiling. So I walked round the corner of the place, and so found myself in the company of the water-wheel, mossy and green with ancient waterdrops, looking so furred and overgrown and lumpy, that one might have thought the wood of it had taken to growing again in its old days, and so the wheel was losing by slow degrees the shape of a wheel, to become some new awful monster of a pollard. As yet, however, it was going round; slowly, indeed, and with the gravity of age, but doing its work, and casting its loose drops in the alms-giving of a gentle rain upon a little plot of Master Rogers's garden, which was therefore full of moisture-loving flowers. This plot was divided from the mill-wheel by a small stream which carried away the surplus water, and was now full and running rapidly.

Beyond the stream, beside the flower bed, stood a dusty young man, talking to a young woman with a rosy face and clear honest eyes. The moment they saw me they parted. The young man came across the stream at a step, and the young woman went up the garden towards the cottage.

"That must be old Rogers's cottage?" I said to the miller.

"Yes, sir," he answered, looking a little sheepish.

"Was that his daughter—that nice-looking young woman you were talking to?"

"Yes, sir, it was."

And he stole a shy pleased look at me out of the corners of his eyes.

"It's a good thing," I said, "to have an honest experienced old mill like yours, that can manage to go on of itself for a little while now and then."

This gave a great help to his budding confidence. He laughed.

"Well, sir, it's not very often it's left to itself. Jane isn't at her father's above once or twice a week at most."

"She doesn't live with them, then?"

"No, sir. You see they're both hearty, and they ain't over well to do, and Jane lives up at the Hall, sir. She's upper housemaid, and waits on one of the young ladies. Old Rogers has seen a great deal of the world, sir."

"So I imagine. I am just going to see him. Good morning."

I jumped across the stream, and went up a little gravel-walk, which led me in a few yards to the cottage-door. It was a sweet place to live in, with honeysuckle growing over the house, and the sounds of the softly-labouring mill-wheel ever in its little porch and about its windows.

The door was open, and dame Rogers came from within to meet me. She welcomed me, and led the way into her little kitchen. As I entered, Jane went out at the back door. But it was only to call her father, who presently came in.

"I'm glad to see ye, sir. This pleasure comes of having no work to-day. After harvest there come slack times for the likes of me. People don't care about a bag of old bones when they can get hold of young men. Well, well, never mind, old woman. The Lord 'll take us through somehow. When the wind blows, the ship goes; when the wind drops, the ship stops; but the sea is his all the same, for He made it; and the wind is his all the same too."

He spoke in the most matter-of-fact tone, unaware of anything poetic in what he said. To him it was just common sense, and common sense only.

"I am sorry you are out of work," I said. "But my garden is sadly out of order, and I must have something done to it. You don't dislike gardening, do you?"

"Well, I beant a right good hand at garden-work," answered the old man, with some embarrassment, scratching his grey head with a troubled scratch.

There was more in this than met the ear; but what, I could not conjecture. I would press the point a little. So I took him at his own word.

"I won't ask you to do any of the more ornamental part," I said,—"only plain digging and hoeing."

"I would rather be excused, sir."

"I am afraid I made you think——"

"I thought nothing, sir. I thank you kindly, sir."

"I assure you I want the work done, and I must employ some one else if you don't undertake it."

"Well, sir, my back's bad now—no, sir, I won't tell a story about it. I would just rather not, sir."

"Now," his wife broke in, "now, old Rogers, why won't 'ee tell the parson the truth, like a man, downright? If ye won't, I'll do it for 'ee. The fact is, sir," she went on, turning to me, with a plate in her hand which she was wiping, "the fact is, that the old parson's man for that kind o' work was Simmons, t'other end of the village; and my man is so afeard o' hurtin' e'er another, that he'll turn the bread away from his own mouth and let it fall in the dirt."

"Now, now, old 'oman, don't 'ee belie me. I'm not so bad as that. You see, sir, I never was good at knowin' right from wrong like. I never was good, that is, at tellin' exackly what I ought to do. So when anything comes up, I just says to myself, 'Now, old Rogers, what do you think the Lord would best like you to do?' And as soon as I ax myself that, I know direckly what I've got to do; and then my old woman can't turn me no more than a bull. And she don't like my obstinate fits. But, you see, I daren't, sir, once I axed myself that."

"Stick to that, Rogers," I said.

"Besides, sir," he went on, "Simmons wants it more than I do. He's got a sick wife; and my old woman, thank God, is hale and hearty. And there is another thing besides, sir: he might take it hard of you, sir, and think it was turning away an old servant like; and then, sir, he wouldn't be ready to hear what you had to tell him, and might, mayhap, lose a deal o' comfort. And that I would take worst of all, sir."

"Well, well, Rogers, Simmons shall have the job."

"Thank ye, sir," said the old man.

His wife, who could not see the thing quite from her husband's point of view, was too honest to say anything; but she was none the less cordial to me. The daughter stood looking from one to the other with attentive face, which took everything, but revealed nothing.

I rose to go. As I reached the door, I remembered the tobacco in my pocket. I had not bought it for myself. I never could smoke. Nor do I conceive that smoking is essential to a clergyman in the country; though I have occasionally envied one of my brethren in London, who will sit down by the fire, and, lighting his pipe, at the same time please his host and subdue the bad smells of the place. And I never could hit his way of talking to his parishioners either. He could put them at their ease in a moment. I think he must have got the trick out of his pipe. But in reality, I seldom think about how I ought to talk to anybody I am with.

That I don't smoke myself is no reason why I should not help old Rogers to smoke. So I pulled out the tobacco.

"You smoke, don't you, Rogers?" I said.

"Well, sir, I can't deny it. It's not much I spend on baccay, anyhow. Is it, dame?"

"No, that it bean't," answered his wife.

"You don't think there's any harm in smoking a pipe, sir?"

"EVEN AS THOU WILT."

"Not the least," I answered.

"You see, sir," he went on, not giving me time to prove how far I was from thinking there was any harm in it, "You see, sir, sailors learns many ways they might be better without. I used to take my pan o' grog with the rest of them; but I give that up quite, 'cause as how I don't want it now."

"'Cause as how," interrupted his wife, "you spend the money on tea for me, instead. You wicked old man to tell stories!"

"Well, I takes my share of the tea, old woman, and I'm sure it's a deal better for me. But to tell the truth, sir, I was a little troubled in my mind about the baccay, not knowing whether I ought to have it or not. For you see, the parson that's gone didn't more than half like it, as I could tell by the turn of his hawse-holes when he come in at the door and me a-smokin'. Not as he said anything; for, ye see, I was an old man, and I daresay that kep him quiet. But I did hear him blow up a young chap i' the village he come upon promiscus with a pipe in his mouth. He did give him a thunderin' broadside! to be sure! So I was in two minds whether I ought to go on with my pipe or not."

"And how did you settle the question, Rogers?"

"Why I followed my own old chart, sir."

"Quite right. One mustn't mind too much what other people think."

"That's not exactly what I mean, sir."

"What do you mean then? I should like to know."

"Well, sir, I mean that I said to myself, 'Now, old Rogers, what do you think the Lord would say about this here baccay business?'"

"And what did you think He would say?"

"Why, sir, I thought He would say, 'Old Rogers, have yer baccay; only mind ye don't grumble when you 'aint got none.'"

Something in this—I could not at the time have told what—touched me more than I can express. No doubt it was the simple reality of the relation in which the old man stood to his Father in Heaven that made me feel as if the tears would come in spite of me.

"And this is the man," I said to myself, "whom I thought I should be able to teach! Well, the wisest learn most, and I may be useful to him after all." As I said nothing, the old man resumed:

"For you see, sir, it is not always a body feels he has a right to spend his ha'pence on baccay; and sometimes, too, he 'aint got none to spend."

"In the meantime," I said, "here is some that I bought for you as I came along. I hope you will find it good. I am no judge."

The old sailor's eyes glistened with gratitude. "Well, who'd ha' thought it!—You didn't think I was beggin' for it, sir, surely?"

"You see I had it for you in my pocket."

"Well that is good o' you, sir!"

"Why, Rogers, that'll last you a month!" exclaimed his wife, looking nearly as pleased as himself.

"Six weeks at least, wife," he answered. "And ye don't smoke yourself, sir, and yet ye bring baccay to me! Well, it's just like yer Master, sir."

I went away resolved that old Rogers should have no chance of "grumbling" for want of tobacco, if I could help it. (To be continued.)

MATT. XV. 22—28.

"Have mercy on me, Lord!"
She followed Him, and cried; and, when there came
No answer, followed, crying still the same,—
"Have mercy on me, Lord!"

"Send her away," they said—
They who should be dispensers of his grace,
Would have Him turn from her who sought his face;
"Send her away," they said.

He spoke their thought aloud—
"It is not meet to take the children's bread
And cast it to the dogs"—as if He said,
How poor ye are and proud.

"Yea, Lord! and yet the dogs Eat of the crumbs that from the children fall,"
She pleaded—"and there is enough for all,
For children and for dogs."

And He to her replied,
"Even as thou wilt, so be it unto thee.
Thy heart the measure of the grace shall be
From my rich store supplied."

She had the thing she would—
Lord! if I dip my cup into the sea
It rises full. Such cup each soul may be,
Such Ocean is Thy good!

ABOUT RICHARD BAXTER.

Of those who successfully perform the voyage of life, whilst there are some to whom it is given to float smoothly and serenely to port, with only a few hazards and easily-surmounted difficulties to interrupt their progress, there are others of not less worth and wisdom whose lot it is to sustain a constant battle with adverse gales and angry seas, and who reach their desired haven only by the most determined efforts, and through a succession of the most perilous adventures. Of this latter sort was the life of Richard Baxter. With a bodily frame that seemed every moment ready to fall in pieces; with a mind imperfectly disciplined by early culture, but which in its ardour and strength was ever soaring to the highest spheres of thought, and affronting the most difficult investigations; with a soul that was full of the most generous and kindly emotions, but whose impulses were under the control of a conscience the most scrupulous and exacting; longing for peace, and luxuriating in the contemplation of ideal scenes of rest, yet ever ready to fight to the death for the minutest point of theological belief or ecclesiastical conviction; and cast upon times of unsettlement, controversy, and persecution;—the career of this remarkable man was one almost unbroken scene of storms and struggles, of toil, conflict, suffering, and sorrow. How manfully he endured the agony,—how nobly he bore up against adversity,—how brightly that fervid soul of his shone out from amid the clouds and shadows that encompassed his path,—and how happily and usefully withal his life was spent; it will be our endeavour in this notice of him, so far as our limits will permit, to show forth.

Richard Baxter was born on the 12th of November, 1615, at Rowton, a village in Shropshire, near to High-Ercall, the seat of Lord Newport. His father, whose Christian name was also Richard, resided at Eaton-Constantine in the same county, but his mother was a native of Rowton, and it was in her father's house that her son was born. With his grandfather, whose name was Richard Adeney, the first ten years of his life were spent.

His friends were anxious to bestow on him the advantages of a liberal education; but the means of obtaining this were very imperfectly within their reach. From his sixth to his tenth year he was under four successive masters, the curates of the parish in which he resided with his grandfather; but from them he learned next to nothing; they were all incompetent men, and two of them were men of dissolute habits. His next master was the curate of the parish in which his father resided; he, too, was a man from whom nothing was to be learned—a man who had lost his situation as a lawyer's clerk through drunkenness, and had taken orders as a means of living. With his next master, whom he describes as a grave and eminent man, he spent two years, without receiving one hour's instruction, his tutor being too much occupied in declaiming against the Puritans to attend to the communicating to boys of the rudiments of learning. What knowledge of the learned languages Baxter had, he owed to the master under whom he was next placed, John Owen, master of the Free School at Worcester. By him he was prepared for the University, but instead of going thither, he was persuaded to place himself with Richard Wickstead, chaplain to the Council at Ludlow, who was allowed by the King to take one pupil. Here, again, Baxter was unfortunate. Wickstead was a place-hunter, and neglected his duty to his pupil to pay court to those in power, and but that his residence at Ludlow Castle gave him access to books, Baxter would have profited as little by his connection with this master as he had done by his connection with those who nominally superintended the earlier stages of his educational career.

In addition to the disadvantages accruing from such inadequate training, Baxter had to struggle with those arising from a diseased frame. In his earlier years he "suffered many things from physicians," and instead of being benefited, found himself the worse the more he followed their prescriptions; till at length, after having consulted not fewer than thirty-six professors of the healing art, he resolved to discard their aid, and trust rather to the recuperative force of nature than to the therapeutic power of drugs. But so shattered and broken was he, that at twenty he had, he says, in addition to disease, all the symptoms of fourscore. His life indeed was "one long disease," and while this may account for and palliate that irritability and acerbity of temper which he sometimes displayed, it cannot but enhance our admiration of the mental energy, indomitable perseverance, and high-toned resolution, which enabled him, in spite of such disadvantages, to do what he did both with voice and pen in the service of Christ and his Church.

Baxter's bodily infirmities, however, were not wholly a calamity to him; rather may they be regarded as having had much to do with the development of his higher life, and the consecration of his natural gifts to worthy and noble uses. Writing of himself to Anthony à Wood, and referring to his want of a university education, he finely says, "Weakness and pain helped me to study how to die; that set me on studying how to live; and that on studying the doctrine from which I must fetch my motives and comforts; beginning with necessities I proceeded by degrees, and now am going to see that for which I have lived and studied."* There can be no doubt that his infirm health preserved him from many temptations to which, in that dissipated age, he must otherwise have been exposed, and tended to give force and depth to those early religious impressions which the teaching and example of godly relations had made upon him. His spiritual training had happily been much better than his intellectual. At an early age he was brought under serious convictions, chiefly by his father's pious conversation; and though he did not escape the contamination of juvenile vices, his conscience was always alive, and he suffered so much from its rebukes when he transgressed, that he strove earnestly to overcome the evil tendencies by which he was misled. It was not, however, till his fifteenth year that he became the subject of a decided change of heart. The perusal of Bunny's "Resolution," a work originally written by Parsons the Jesuit, but revised, corrected, and improved by the Puritan Edmund Bunny, rector of Bolton-Percy, was the means of first awakening him to a true sense of sin, and the unspeakable importance of eternal things. He was also greatly benefited by the "Bruised Reed" of Dr. Sibbs, some of the writings of Perkins, and, at a later period, Culverwell's "Treatise on Faith." To these books, together with the conversation of some pious friends, and the solemnising influence of his own fragile health, he was indebted, under God, for that decided repentance of which he never repented, and the fruits of which were brought forth abundantly amid the trials and conflicts of his subsequent life.

Having resolved to devote himself to the work of the Christian ministry, Baxter placed himself under Francis Garbet, minister at Wroxeter, for further instruction. With him he read logic and theology; and at this time he may be regarded as having commenced that gigantic course of study which occupied more or less the whole of his remaining life on earth, and which he pursued in spite of an amount of bodily suffering and outward annoyance such as would have consumed the energies of most men. His attainments in the languages and in the mathematics never exceeded those of a tyro, if we except Latin, which he not only learned to read with ease, but even managed to write after a fashion; but in logic, metaphysics, and theology, he found a congenial field, and there he left nothing which he had not thoroughly mastered. At an early period he plunged into the ocean of scholastic theology, and he was never so happy as when grappling with the ponderous reasonings, or following out the minute distinctions, of these remarkable writers. "I have higher thoughts," he writes, "of the schoolmen than Erasmus and our other grammarians had; I much value the method and sobriety of Aquinas, the subtlety of Scotus and Ockam, the plainness of Durandus, the solidity of Ariminensis, the profundity of Bradwardine, the excellent acuteness of many of their followers." After a long list of writers of this class with whose works he was acquainted, he adds, that he should be loth to take such sauce for his food, and such recreations for his business. "The jingling," he continues, "of too much and false philosophy among them often drowns the notes of Aaron's bells." This was his judgment at an advanced period of his life. In his earlier days he would probably have expressed himself still more strongly in their favour. Certain it is, that his own mental habits were powerfully influenced by the writings of the schoolmen. His style, indeed, as a theologian may be said to have been formed on theirs; for his scientific and polemical treatises are marked by all their peculiarities, whether faults or excellences.

When about eighteen years of age, he was for a season persuaded to relinquish his purpose of entering the ministry, and try his fortune at court, where he had some interest. Here he spent a month in the house of Sir Henry Newport, master of the revels; but what he saw of court life, its meanness, insincerity, and immorality, so disgusted him, that at the expiry of that period he hastily forsook the scene, and never afterwards felt any desire to mingle in its festivities or share in its employments.

Having now finally resolved to follow out his former purpose of devoting himself to the ministry of the Gospel, he was in 1638 ordained by Bishop Thornborough, of Worcester, and accepted the office of master of a school at Dudley—a situation which afforded him the opportunity of preaching occasionally without being subjected to the responsibility of a regular charge, from which, as yet, he shrank. His first sermon was preached in the Upper Church of Dudley; and he continued to officiate in this occasional way for about a year. At the close of this period he resigned his office at Dudley and went to Bridgnorth, where he acted as assistant to Mr. William Madstard, "a grave and severe divine, very honest and conscientious; an excellent preacher, but somewhat afflicted with want of maintenance, but more with a hard-hearted unprofitable people"—troubles with which many "an excellent preacher" has had to contend, both before his time and since. In 1641 he was solicited to become preacher at Kidderminster, the vicar of which, an ignorant man and given to tippling, had, in order to prevent the town from petitioning for his removal, agreed to allow sixty pounds a year to any one whom a committee of fourteen of their number should choose to be their preacher. With this invitation Baxter complied; and thus, says he, "I was brought by the gracious providence of God to that place which had the chiefest of my labours, and yielded me the greatest fruits and comfort." The legal instrument appointing him to this situation bears date April 5th, 1641.

Though at one with the Puritan party in theological views and religious sentiment, Baxter had not, at the time of his ordination, adopted their peculiar ecclesiastical opinions. He was at this time a thorough Conformist, having formed his views from the study of the works of Downham, Sprint, and Hooker. The other side of the question he had not examined; nor was it till he was settled at Dudley that he gave the whole subject that careful examination which it required. Here he received, from some of the Nonconformists, books, by the study of which his previous views were considerably modified. He still retained his adherence to diocesan episcopacy, though deploring the want of discipline then prevailing in the English Church; he accepted forms of prayer as proper and advantageous, and thought such might in some cases be lawfully imposed, though he deemed the existing liturgy of the Church of England deficient in many important particulars; he held the lawfulness of kneeling at the eucharist; and could see no serious objection to the wearing of the surplice, or to the use of the ring in marriage. To subscription, however, he became hostile, and was inclined to deplore his own rashness in having complied with it; the use of the cross in baptism he renounced; and the giving of the Lord's Supper promiscuously to all who had not been formally excommunicated by the bishop or his chancellor, whatever their character, he denounced as a profanation of that sacred ordinance. Thus far he was a Nonconformist, and thus early did he show that disposition to strike out for himself a middle course between contending parties which characterized him through life, and involved him in innumerable controversies. As he advanced in life, his nonconformity became more extensive and pronounced, and he showed himself as ready to suffer for his conscientious convictions as those who took more extreme views; but to the last he clung to the belief that the truth was exclusively on neither side, and he kept on fighting in the hope that both parties would at length see this as he saw it, and hasten to clasp hands on that middle ground to which he invited them.

In quieter times Baxter would probably have contented himself with theorising and refining on questions of Church order, without setting himself forward in any very prominent way as a reformer of ecclesiastical abuses. But his lot was cast on times when such a course was rendered impossible by the restless jealousy and inquisitorial tyranny of those in power. Determined to secure a rigid uniformity of belief and practice, and vainly imagining that this could be accomplished by the vulgar expedients of outward force, the rulers in church and state sought, by vexatious impositions and severe penalties, to drive men to walk in those strait paths which they had marked out for them. The result was, that many things which were really matters of indifference, grew to be matters of conscience, and burdens were laid on the consciences of earnest and sincere men which they could not endure; so that multitudes who were in no wise previously inclined to revolt, were constrained to rise up against the tyranny to which they were subjected, and the measures which were designed to secure uniformity served only to provoke dissent and fan the flames of discord and conflict. Baxter was among the number of those who were thus forced into open nonconformity. The first thing which startled him from his quietude was the publication of the et cetera oath as it was called. This, which formed part of certain canons enacted by Convocation in 1640, was ordered to be taken by all ecclesiastical persons on pain of suspension and deprivation; and it derived its name from the most offensive part of it, that in which it was specified that the juror should never "give his consent to alter the government of the Church by archbishops, bishops, deans, and archdeacons, et cetera, as it stands now established." The imposition upon men of such an oath, under whose vague "et cetera" might come to be included no man could tell what, Baxter and his friends felt to be an alarming stretch of spiritual despotism. At a meeting of the ministers of Shropshire, the subject was fully discussed; on which occasion Baxter urged the objections against the oath, and carried with him the convictions of the majority. For himself, he not only resolved never to submit to it; but he was led by the occurrence to investigate the whole subject of church government more closely than he had hitherto done. With characteristic energy and sincerity, he set himself to the study of all the books of any weight that had appeared on the questions at issue between Episcopalians and their opponents; nor did he rest until he had mastered and weighed all that had been advanced on both sides. The result was, as he himself tells us in his treatise on Episcopacy, that he was forced into the belief that the primitive episcopacy was a very different thing from that which existed in the English Church; and that to the latter were to be attributed most of the evils under which the Church had suffered. To this conviction he adhered to the end of his life.

Whatever anxiety the consideration of such questions might occasion to himself, he did not suffer them to affect his labours as a Christian pastor. He had accepted the invitation to Kidderminster with a profound desire to be useful to the souls of its inhabitants, and he came amongst them with his heart stirred up "to speak to sinners with some compassion, as a dying man to dying men." He found the people in a state which demanded the utmost exertion of his best powers to promote their spiritual interests. They were ignorant, coarse, and of loose manners; superstitious, sensual, and easily roused to deeds of violence and brutal outrage. Of only a small portion of them could it be said, that they were under the influence of genuine religion. In these, however, Baxter found steadfast friends and zealous helpers in his work; and though from the mass he could expect only derision, opposition, and dislike, there can be no doubt that in due time these hostile feelings would have given way before his faithful and zealous labours for their welfare. He was destined, however, to be driven from his post before he had been long enough in it to reap the fruits of his fidelity. The war between the Royalists and the Parliamentarians had already begun to agitate and devastate the country. Baxter sided wholly with neither party, but inclined rather to the side of the Parliament than to that of the King. This produced unkindly feeling towards him in the minds of many of his parishioners, who were chiefly of the Royalist party; and an order having been issued by the Parliament for the defacing of images in churches and the removing of crucifixes, to which Baxter was supposed to be favourable, occasion was taken by the excited mob to make a violent attack upon him, by which his life was endangered. His friends, alarmed at this, counselled his leaving Kidderminster, which he accordingly did, and retired for a season to Gloucester. After the battle of Edgehill he removed to Coventry, and there he was induced to minister for a year to the soldiers, but without holding a chaplain's commission or receiving any remuneration for his labours except board and lodging in the governor's house. Here, he says, "I followed my studies as quietly as in a time of peace." After a short visit of two months to Shropshire, he returned to Coventry, where he spent another year. Ultimately he was induced to become chaplain to one of the regiments in Cromwell's army, and he has left some most instructive details as to the condition and operations of the Republican forces, with some graphic sketches of the leading men of that party. Through this episode of his life we cannot follow him minutely. His main inducement to join the army was a disinterested desire to counteract the progress of republican opinions and sectarian divisions among the soldiers. Though a Parliamentarian, Baxter was not a Republican; on the contrary, he abhorred republicanism, and considered the Parliament as worthy of being supported, chiefly because its policy tended to preserve the rights and secure the stability of the throne. Though a Nonconformist, he had no toleration for the sectaries, of whom he always speaks in the bitterest terms. He saw with grief and shame that the views to which he was thus opposed were rapidly spreading among the soldiers; and as he attributed this to there being no regular ministers with the army, he felt impelled to throw himself into the breach and do what he could to roll back the invading foe. It was no enviable post which he had thus selected. To a man of his studious habits the bustle and constant changes of camp and garrison life must have been unspeakably distressing; and as he had fallen amongst men to whom theological discussion was as familiar as military exercise, and who could split hairs as nicely in argument as they could hit heavy blows in battle, his time and energies were consumed in constant debate, often upon points not worth serious discussion. "I was almost always," he says, "disputing with one or other of them; sometimes for our civil government, and sometimes for church order and government; sometimes for infant baptism, and often against Antinomianism and the contrary extreme." He was also involved in controversy with Quakers, Seekers, Levellers, Fifth Monarchy men, and other of the numberless varieties of opinionists who, in that "year of sects and schisms," as Milton calls it, sprang up in the soil of anarchy like mushrooms in a hot-bed. One regrets to find that this multiplicity of sects betrayed him into a position hostile to liberty; for one of the heresies against which he inveighs, and the prevalence of which among the soldiers led him into his "most frequent and vehement disputes," was the opinion that "the civil magistrate has nothing to do to determine anything in matters of religion by constraint or restraint, but every man may not only hold, but preach and do in matters of religion what he pleases." It is strange that so acute a reasoner did not perceive that if the magistrate has anything to do "by constraint and restraint" in the matter of religion, he must have everything to do; and that, consequently, he was as much in the way of his duty when he imposed the et cetera oath on the Nonconformists, or put Baxter and his friends under "constraint" in the matters at which they scrupled, as when he imprisoned Anabaptists and Seekers, or cropt the ears of Leighton and Prynne.

It is not surprising that under the constant excitement, irritation, and toil of such a life Baxter's health should have given way, and that he should have been brought by sickness to the brink of the grave. But it is marvellous that amid all this turmoil, unsettlement, discussion, and suffering, he should have been able to write two such works as his "Aphorisms of Justification" and his "Saints' Everlasting Rest,"—the former not indeed one of his most able works, yet characterised by acuteness, and containing the germ of his peculiar theological views; the latter a work which, for elevation of thought, breadth of view, rich experimental piety, sublime devotion, and sustained vigour of composition, stands unsurpassed in the department of literature to which it belongs. If the one of these works gives us an idea of how he disputed with the sectaries, the other shows us where his true life was—in communion with God, and in vivid realisation of heavenly things.

The civil war being at an end, and Baxter's health being somewhat recruited, he returned to his former sphere of labour at Kidderminster. The people wished him to accept the living, which had been sequestrated by parliamentary commission, and the revenues of which had been entrusted to the parishioners to be bestowed by them on any one whom they might choose to be their minister. This, however, he declined; he would accept only the 60*l.* a-year secured to him by the former incumbent, with such addition as might be obtained by means of an augmentation for a chapel in the parish. In all he never received more than from eighty to ninety pounds a-year, with the rent "of a few rooms at the top of another man's house." Having thus showed that he desired not theirs but them, he resumed his place among his former parishioners, determined to do his utmost for their spiritual welfare. During the Commonwealth he enjoyed uninterrupted opportunity of carrying out his plans and operations for this end—a privilege for which he had too much candour and good sense not to be thankful to the remarkable man who then ruled the nation; but it went against both his principles and his prejudices to regard this in any other light than as one of those special interpositions of Providence by which the sins of men were made to contribute to the service of God's cause. "How strange," he exclaims, writing after he had tasted the bitter fruits of the Restoration, "that in times of usurpation I had all this mercy and happy freedom. . . . How mysterious that God should make days of licentiousness and disorder under an usurper so great a mercy to me and many a thousand more, who, under the lawful governor whom they desired, and in the days when order is said to be restored, do sit in obscurity and unprofitable silence, or lie in prison." "For my part," he says again, "I bless God who gave me, even under an usurper whom I opposed, such liberty and advantage to preach the Gospel with success, as I cannot have under a king to whom I have sworn and performed true subjection and obedience; yea, such as no age, since the Gospel came into this land, did before possess, so far as I can learn from history." For fourteen years this halcyon season lasted, and during that time Baxter laboured with unwearied activity in his cherished vocation, preaching, exhorting, visiting, catechising, debating, and administering not only to the spiritual necessities but also to the bodily ailments of his people: for there being no physician within reach, he was "forced for five or six years, by the people's necessity, to practise physic." All this, however, he says, was but his "recreation, and as it were the work of his spare hours." His chief labour was in his study, and in the writing of books; "which yet," he complains, "went the more slowly on, that I never even have had an amanuensis to dictate to, and especially because my weakness took up so much of my time." How he found time for this kind of work at all will be matter of wonder to many; but when we look at the result, and find that during these fourteen years he wrote and published nearly sixty volumes, some of them solid quartos, very few of them of small size, and all displaying extensive reading and painstaking thought, we seem to be contemplating a work like those masses of Cyclopean masonry, which suggest the agency of a strength almost superhuman. It is impossible to find language strong enough to express our admiration of the indefatigable industry, weariless zeal, and gigantic power of the man. If, as he complains, his infirmities and official duties left him "but little time for study," he must have possessed a faculty of concentrating his energies upon his subject, and moving along his path of thought and utterance with a momentum such as is rarely enjoyed even by the more highly gifted of our species.

The published works of Baxter remain to speak for themselves. It is pleasing to be able to record that his ministerial labours among the people at Kidderminster were followed by blessed and permanent results. After the first feeling of hostility was overcome, he found them "tractable and unprejudiced," and his preaching met with attentive auditories. A great change for the better was gradually wrought on the manners and habits of the people. The Lord's Day was religiously observed; family worship was generally practised; as one passed along the street on a Sabbath, one "might hear a hundred families singing psalms and repeating sermons," he tells us. Many were savingly converted to the Lord; and though great strictness was observed in the admission of persons to the Communion, he had six hundred communicants, of whom there were not twelve, he says, that he had not good hope of as to their sincerity. A real and wide-spread religious reformation, in short, was effected in the place through his instrumentality, the fruits of which continued long after he was called to his rest. Dr. Fawcett, one of his successors at Kidderminster, writing in 1759, says, "the religious spirit thus happily introduced by Baxter is yet to be traced in the town and neighbourhood in some degree."

Here we for the present pause. Scenes of a very different kind from that last contemplated have to be described, in which the fine gold of Baxter's character was tried as in the fire of a furnace heated seven times. The "usurper" has yielded up the sceptre, and his dynasty is at an end. The legitimate monarch is about to show his subjects with what fatherly interest he cares for their spiritual welfare.

THE STORY OF BEUGGEN CASTLE.

I.—THE TWO FRIENDS.

In the territory of the Grand Duke of Baden, near the frontier of Switzerland, and only ten miles distant from the venerable town of Basle, stands the Castle of Beuggen. It occupies a charming spot on the right bank of the Rhine, where that magnificent stream flows with a sharp curve, between Säckingen and Rheinfelden, two places well known to those who have studied the history of the great Thirty Years' struggle. It is the centre of a quiet little valley, below the turnpike-road which winds up to Constanz, and under the shadow of a verdant vine-hill. On passing one of the two bridges which span the moat surrounding the Castle, you walk through a gate of mediæval structure into a spacious yard or square, where stands a clump of ten thickly-foliaged chestnut-trees casting their cool shade over a large circular basin of water. To the right you observe the half-decayed ruins of the old building, erected probably in the days of the Hapsburgs, and contrasting romantically with the more recent architecture of the new one, which dates from the commencement of the Seven Years' War.

This Castle has been selected for a work which evinces the wonderful power of charity. Its thirty-two apartments, large and small, are occupied by upwards of a hundred individuals, adults and children. It is worth while to ascend the clean oak-steps that lead up to the spacious school-rooms and dwelling-rooms on the first floor, and to the bedrooms on the second. You will enjoy the roomy landing-places and wide passages, the lofty ceilings of the apartments, the stream of light and fresh air that pours in through the strong-framed windows, and the cheerful aspect of the ensemble, where the privileges of ancient princely magnificence are so happily turned to the profit of the needy, the neglected, and the outcast. And when, after a little panting and perspiring, you have reached the top of this grand building, you will find your trouble fully repaid by an enchanting view of the Rhine-valley, encircled on the south by the ever-green Jura Mountains, and on the north by the Black Forest.

But delightful as a visit now is to this place, it must have been very dismal immediately after the War of Liberation. At that period the Castle of Beuggen presented an aspect of misery and desolation. For three years, from 1814 till 1817, it was a hospital for the wounded soldiers of the Austrian army. At the close of the war it was abandoned by its numerous inmates, who left eight thousand of their comrades buried in the fields around the Castle-moat. It was left as it stood on the last day it was occupied, uncleaned and unswept, showing everywhere the disgusting marks of the misery which thousands of wretched creatures had suffered under the scalpel of the surgeon and amid the agonies of death. In this state of filthiness and desolation it continued for years, avoided by everybody; or, if visited at all, only at night by thieves, who carried off whatever booty they could find. Its sole inhabitants were the owl and the bat, who could here rear their young in peace. And in this state the once attractive spot might have continued till now, had it not become the abode of Christian love, which, wherever it comes, turns death into life, casts out everything unclean, and calls up a fountain of pure living water for the weary and the thirsty.

It will be interesting to learn the origin of this remarkable change, with which a still more important change, in the soul and life of many a lost human being, is connected.

One autumn afternoon of the year 1816 two men were walking up and down the spacious square, which, planted with rows of beautiful trees, graces the rear of the Münster-Kirche at Basle. They were evidently engaged in a conversation that engrossed their whole heart and soul. Was it the somewhat melancholy aspect of the withering creation around, the crackling of the yellow leaves carpeting the path on which they trod, and the chilly autumnal blasts moving the tops of the trees to and fro, and moaning through the leafless branches, that cast a gloom over their minds and caused the serious expression of their countenances? Perhaps it was to some extent. But the chief cause of the concern which so deeply filled their souls was the thought pressing upon them of a decay far more awful and alarming than that of withering leaves and drooping flowers. Their conversation ran on the dreadful state of neglect and misery in which the greater portion of Christendom was left by the recent wars. The condition of the lower classes, and especially of the children, was distressing beyond description. "I visited a small district the other day," one of the two friends said, "where I found upwards of a hundred children who were destitute of any instruction whatever; and, upon entering the huts in which they dwelt, I almost sickened at the spectacle of misery and wretchedness I witnessed. One-sixth of the children of our country are without shelter or support, rambling about in perfect vagabondism. Twice I saw some of these homeless creatures, driven from one canton to another, starving on the public road. Two little boys were found crouching by the dead body of their mother. What is to be done to stop this fearful evil, which gnaws like a cancer at the very root of our national existence? If Christianity is a power unto salvation, is it not here that it ought to show itself?"

The gentleman who gave this sad description of the condition of the children of the lower class was Mr. Christian Heinrich Zeller, then school director at Zofingen, a pretty town in the canton of Aargau. He was little aware at that moment that this conversation with his friend Mr. Spittler, the celebrated founder of the Basle Mission House, was the first step towards a work which would one day give to his name a European celebrity, and serve as a monument of grateful love in the hearts of all Christian philanthropists, as well as in those of thousands of rescued children. The two friends had just returned from a visit to the Mission House, and thought with pleasure of the resolute young men whom they saw there preparing themselves to carry the Gospel to the heathen world. Far below their feet, at the bottom of the high wall from which they enjoyed the view that stretched out before their eyes, old Father Rhine was rolling along, bending with a graceful curve round the old town, and preparing to take leave of his native land, to carry his fertilising blessings to France, Germany, and the Netherlands. "Alas!" said Mr. Zeller, "it seems to me as if the blessed Gospel-river is also preparing to leave our poor fatherland, to pour its costly treasures over the fields of far distant countries. I cordially wish the poor heathen to drink its quickening waters: but why should our own people, who are in no better condition than the blind heathen of Asia, be deprived of these life-giving draughts? We have just been visiting a school for training teachers of the Gospel for the inhabitants of Hindostan and Africa. What a blessing this Institution would be, if, at the same time, it were a school for training Christian school teachers for the poor people of Switzerland and Germany! For they are the class of persons whom our sadly-neglected communities are fearfully in need of. You know how completely destitute of any Christian school-teaching our poorer districts are, because no teacher can be found willing to bury himself in such abodes of neglect and destitution. If Christian charity deems it necessary to train up young men for work among the heathen, surely it cannot but desire that young men should likewise be summoned, in the name of Christ, to devote themselves with self-denying love to the rescue of the perishing children of our own nation. And if the Mission House, while fulfilling one part of its duty, does not wish to leave the other undone, it must, it appears to me, be thrown open to every Christian young man who wishes to become a schoolmaster to the poor."

Mr. Zeller here took leave of Mr. Spittler, and repaired to his home, where he soon forgot all about their conversation in the bustle of his schools and the numerous occupations of his directorship. But his words kindled a fire in the heart of the noble founder of the Mission House, which nothing could quench. The winter passed on without Mr. Zeller hearing anything about the matter; but no sooner had the spring returned to the valleys of the Alps than he received a letter from Mr. Spittler, requesting him to write down his thoughts on the institution of a Missionary Schoolmaster Establishment. This invitation was as unexpected by Mr. Zeller as the voice must have been by young Samuel which called his name at midnight. He felt quite unprepared for it, and, burdened with school business and examinations as he was, he could hardly find one moment to give his mind to the subject. But it was with him as with his friend some months ago. Mr. Spittler had now, in his turn, thrown a spark into Mr. Zeller's bosom, which, in spite of all his occupations, set his whole soul on fire. The idea followed him into his school, and came out with him again. It went with him to bed, and awoke with him in the morning. One evening the whole plan stood as clearly before his mind as if he saw the proposed Establishment rising out of the ground, and working in all the branches of its organisation. He took his pen, and wrote down an elaborate paper at one sitting. Mr. Spittler read it with enthusiasm, and caused it to be circulated among the friends of the Mission. Among these, too, the plan met with unanimous approbation. Letters were received from different quarters promising every assistance that could be afforded. The only objection which was felt by any regarded the union of the Establishment with the Mission House. This part of the scheme was dropped in consequence, and it was resolved to found a "Voluntary School for Training Schoolmasters for the Poor." The main features of the plan were these :—

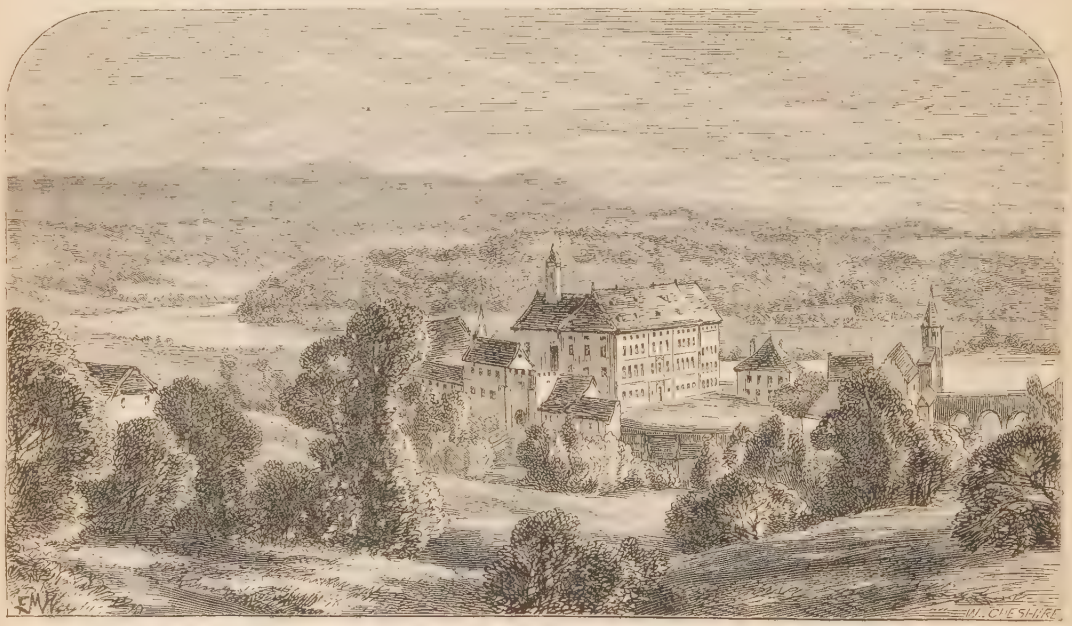
"A number of poor, fatherless, and neglected children should be taken into a spacious, well-appointed building, situated in the country, and not too far from Basle, where they should be instructed in the most important branches of elementary education, in gardening and domestic labour, and in various kinds of handicrafts. In connexion with this a band of Christian young men should be trained as teachers of poor children."

The idea was warmly taken up by many Christian friends, and enthusiastically discussed in various circles. On the evening of the 31st of September, 1817, twelve individuals met at Basle, and committed the matter in prayer to God. They took one another by the hand, and solemnly pledged themselves in the presence of God to do whatever might be in their power, in order to carry their heart's desire into effect. They then united themselves into a "Society for Training Voluntary Schoolmasters for the Poor."



Beuggen Castle.

II.—A HOUSE OF DEATH AND DESOLATION IS CHANGED INTO AN ABODE OF LIFE AND JOY.

No sooner was this union of Christian friends made public, than encouraging letters and gifts came flowing in, in continuous succession, and from different quarters. Among these was a promise from the British and Foreign School Society, London, of 100*l.*, payable on the day when the establishment would be opened. The first thing required now was permission from the Government to build a house on the Basle territory. The Government, however, kept the matter so long under consideration, that the whole of the year 1818 passed without any result ; and as the price asked by the owner of the desired site was extravagant, the society resolved to leave Basle, and try its fortune in the adjacent Grand Duchy of Baden. In the spring of 1819, a friend, who had thrown her whole heart into the undertaking, the widow of Professor Fäsch, and who had some influence in high circles, advised the society to apply to the Baden Government for the use of the Castle of Beuggen. But it was in vain : the Baden Government declined the request at once. The friends, however, were not discouraged, and after many delays and difficulties, and a journey to Karlsruhe, where they had a personal interview with the Grand Duke, they attained their object.

It was on Friday, the 22nd of October, 1819, exactly the same day on which, three years before, the two friends for the first time discussed the matter behind the Basle Münster-Kirche, that they received the required documents from the Baden authorities. They at once set out for Basle, where they arrived on Sunday afternoon. On the same evening a meeting of the society was called, at which Mr. Zeller gave an account of their journey, and their conversation with the Duke. The whole company were delighted with their success. The President, who, in spite of indisposition, had come to the meeting, felt quite restored by the glad news, and engaged in prayer, thanking God for this unexpected result. Mr. Zeller was then appointed to examine the Castle, and to report as to what would be required to put it in a state of repair.

He found it in a most miserable condition. There was not one unbroken window in the whole building. The fine brass locks, which used to adorn the doors, were all stolen, and so were the large iron stoves, without which no German parlour is comfortable. Heaps of straw were scattered through the rooms and saloons: everywhere there was dirt, and blood and rubbish. The paper was torn from the walls; and even the iron hooks and bolts, which had fastened the frame-work of the roof, were carried off. Still the building could be repaired, though not without considerable expense.

The apartments on the ground floor were designed for workshops, dining-room and kitchen; the large saloon, on the first floor, for a schoolroom and a place for family worship; the other rooms on that floor were partly assigned as a dwelling for the house-mother, partly as bedrooms for the girls. There was also a large apartment for a store-room, and another for an infirmary. The director was to have his dwelling on the second floor, where there was also plenty of accommodation for the female teachers. The rooms on the third floor were appropriated as dormitories for the boys and for the young men who were to be trained as schoolmasters. A numerous band of workpeople was then engaged to put the building in order, according to this plan; and on the first of November, 1819, Mr. Zeller received a letter from the Society, in which he was entreated to take the directorship of the new establishment.

III.—MR. ZELLER MAKES MANY RICH BY MAKING HIMSELF POOR.

Now, a better man than Zeller could not have been chosen. He was a born pedagogue. In his youth his father designed him for the law, and sent him to the university; but no position in society, however splendid, could, in his judgment, outshine that of a good schoolmaster. It was therefore with joy that he sacrificed the prospect of becoming a Hofrath for the humble situation of tutor in a private family. Here his talents as a teacher gained him such reputation that a number of respectable citizens of St. Gallen requested him to take charge of a private school, which they had established in order to provide their children with better training and instruction than could be obtained at the public schools of that town. Such was the effect of his admirable labours here that the town-council of Zofingen called him, in 1809, to be director of their public school, while the magistrates of the canton of Aargau appointed him inspector of the schools of the district. At Zofingen, which is one of the most charming spots in Switzerland, he passed a happy life, in which the comforts of affluence were combined with the privileges of intelligent intercourse and the blessings of a useful sphere of labour. He was the centre and soul of the lively and spirited educational life of the district. In addition to his directorship of the town school and his inspectorship of the district schools he was head teacher at the Latin school, and catechist of the Church Vor dem Wald. He also conducted an evening class for female teachers, at which he became acquainted with Miss Sophie Siegfried. She became his wife; but being, like her husband, a thorough teacher, she continued her labours at the school, even when, as a house-mother, she had to care for a family of fourteen children, five of whom were her own, and the others boarders.

Now the situation of director of a Poor-school at Beuggen, supported only by voluntary contributions, secluded almost entirely from society, and confined within the narrow sphere of a family of neglected children and uneducated young men, when contrasted with Mr. Zeller's position at Zofingen, must have appeared most absurd and ridiculous in the eyes of mere worldly men.

But he accepted the call, and he did it in the firm conviction that it came, not from man, but from God. People who weigh everything in the scale of profit and loss, cannot understand how such a decision could proceed from a wise and prudent man. Nor is it intelligible even to those, who, though taking higher ground than that of mere financial calculation, yet know no other gauge for their duty than what appears to them to be the most expedient for the moment. His first question in the matter was, not what might appear to be most useful to himself or to his friends, but what was most conformable to the pattern of self-sacrificing love, which the divine Redeemer, by whose blood he himself had been saved, had set before him.

His conduct in this matter had a close connection with his inward life,—with his soul's relation to the person of Christ. During his stay at Zofingen a great change had taken place in his heart. Before that period he had always felt a certain emptiness in his bosom, a want of peace and satisfaction which he could not account for. In his childhood he had been privileged with a religious education, which had taught him to accept the narratives of the Bible with all the simplicity of a child's faith. Even as early as his fifth year, when lying one morning on his back on the green flowery carpet of a hill side, and looking up to the bright blue sky, he received impressions of the greatness and omnipotence of God, which he remembered even in his old age. Two grandmothers, whose piety must have been exemplary, contributed greatly towards planting the first feelings of love and gratitude towards Christ in the child's heart. Even when an octogenarian he would recall, with a feeling of holy emotion, how his grandmother at Felbach used to put him to bed, and pray with him till he fell asleep; and how his grandmother at Böblingen used to tell him about the love of Jesus, the Saviour of the world. And in the last year of his life one could hear the grey-headed man often say to himself, as in benediction:—

"O Grandmother of Böblingen!
O Grandmother of Felbach!"

But these tender impressions of piety and love were buried under the rubbish of rationalistic theories and infidel doctrines, which he acquired when a student at the University of Tübingen. The light conversation which then prevailed among the students had a sad effect upon his mind. It is true, his strongly-developed moral character prevented him from lapsing far into sin; but his childlike faith was all but torn to shreds, and scarcely anything left but the thought: "Still I am a creature of God, and God pitieth all his works, from the beginning of the creation." And God did pity the poor wandering sheep. Through the instrumentality of some good friends, such as Handel and Blumhardt, he was brought again to the way of truth. But he still continued to experience something of the deadening, paralysing effect which infidel error leaves behind, even after it has been abandoned. In this state of mind he came to Zofingen. There he was a regular attendant on public worship, and a faithful observer of family worship; he was looked upon as a decidedly Christian man; he was himself a teacher of the orthodox doctrines of the Gospel; he was the centre and soul of an extensive sphere of usefulness, and the means of the conversion of many an erring fellow-sinner. Yet, notwithstanding all these things, he felt inwardly unhappy and unsatisfied. He felt he lacked something; but what that was he was unable to tell. In this state of mind he fell in with a poor man, a mechanic, a man who could neither read nor write, but in whom he observed a profound knowledge of the truths of God, a purity of heart, an amiable simplicity of faith, and a constant joy in Christ, such as far surpassed his conceptions, with all his learning. An intimate friendship sprang up between him and this good man. He soon perceived the cause of the difference between them. Mr. Zeller at that time knew Christ, and loved his doctrine; but his humble friend knew the doctrine, and loved Christ. After this the unlearned joiner would often be found in Zeller's study, engaged in studying the Scriptures, and in prayer. The unlearned man was the teacher, and the learned one his pupil. Nor was this instruction in vain. Mr. Zeller learnt that true Christianity does not consist in the knowledge of a thing, but in the love of the heart for a living Person, namely, Jesus the Son of God.

Now, this truth, so simple yet so rarely understood, and still more rarely practised, no sooner sunk into Zeller's heart than it made him perceive that Christ is glorified most when love goes out to seek and to save the lost, and bring them to Him. It is true he saw plenty of lost people at Zofingen; but he saw plenty of able and right-minded teachers too, who were prepared to take his place, if he left his situation. But who was willing and prepared to go to the thousands of lost children that crowded the hamlets of Switzerland, the back streets of the towns, and the dens of the begging vagabonds? Even the opposition which his call to Beuggen met with on the part of everybody proved that nobody wanted to go there; and where nobody would go, there he felt he must go. This, he was convinced, was the course which Jesus would take, if in his place—"He who, though he was rich, yet for our sakes became poor, that we through his poverty might be rich." With this pattern of self-sacrificing love before him he could not take up the scales to ascertain which course would be the most profitable to himself. He now saw clearly that his conversation with his friend Spittler behind the Münster-Kirche was no mere accident. He also realised how his divine Master had since then gently led him on, step by step, in a way scarcely noticeable by himself, to this arduous but noble and important task. And now that, without the slightest effort on his part, the call came straight to him, and to nobody else, he could not but discover the voice of the Lord whispering into his soul: "Arise and go to that place; for there I have a work for thee to do. Be strong and of good courage; for I will not fail thee, nor forsake thee."

So he accepted the call with a joyful heart; and when asked by his friends what the capital was with which the Institution was to be founded, he pointed them to four Texts of Scripture, which he called his school-fund. They were:—

1 Timothy ii. 4. God will have all men to be saved, and to come unto the knowledge of the truth.

Mark xvi. 15, and Matt. xxviii. 20. Go ye into all the world, and preach the Gospel to every creature; and lo, I am with you alway, even unto the end of the world.

Luke xviii. 16. Suffer little children to come unto Me, and forbid them not; for of such is the kingdom of God.

Matthew xviii. 5. Whoso shall receive one such little child in My name receiveth Me.

He never repented the step. When an old man he wrote: "Of the fifty-seven years which I have lived as a teacher, the thirty-seven which I have spent at Beuggen have been the happiest.

IV.—"THE LORD DOTH GREAT THINGS, WHEREOF WE ARE GLAD."

Thus the house-father for the new establishment was found. And so also was the house-mother; for the professor's widow, already-mentioned, Mrs. Fäsch, resolved to devote all her life and strength to this work,—to descend from her high station in society, and take her humble place as a mother among the children of the poor. Nor was she a novice in this kind of labour. For some time past she had been accustomed to assemble a number of poor children at her country seat, to train them for a useful life on earth, and a happy one in heaven. On the 1st of April, 1820, she left her beautiful grounds at Riehen never to return again, and entered the solitary castle of Beuggen, which had now been made habitable. Seventeen days after, Mr. Zeller arrived with his family. Their first night was spent in a room where the plague had raged most. Here he threw himself on his knees by the side of his wife, thanked God with tears for his faithful and wonderful leading, and prayed that He might turn this place, once the abode of misery and death, into a house of life, peace, and joy, to many lost and wandering souls.

The society resolved to commence operations with ten young men, and from twenty to thirty children, all of whom were already chosen. School instruction was begun on the 15th of May. The pupils were of all ages, from the young man of thirty to the child of six; and of all descriptions—able and stupid, kind and cross, cheerful and desponding, well instructed and altogether ignorant, clean and dirty, grateful and insensible. It took some time to examine them so as to be able to classify them. They were then divided into two schools, the upper one for the pupil-teachers and the elder boys, and the lower one for the children. Meanwhile Mrs. Fäsch had taken measures lest her numerous and increasing household should be destitute of furniture. She had opened a large room in her house at Basle for storing gifts that might be sent in, especially for articles of furniture. Gradually a good collection was gathered, but numerous articles were still wanting. Then Mr. Spittler stepped in with his inventive genius. He made a little book of blank leaves, with headings written on the top of each page, such as Parlour furniture, Kitchen utensils, Earthenware, &c. He sent this little beggar from house to house, and each person wrote down the name of the article which he was willing to give. Thus every subscriber could see what had been given already, and what was still wanting, and many a one was thus reminded of gifts which perhaps he would never otherwise have thought of. In many houses the little book was sought for a second time, and thus the good house-mother of Beuggen Castle found herself in due time provided with all the implements that were required for carrying on her extensive household. Nor was Mr. Zeller overlooked in his capacity of schoolmaster. There was a page in the book set apart for school articles, and it was soon sufficiently filled to meet the wants of that important department.

So the ark, with its various inhabitants, both clean and unclean, was launched. And at the close of the first year it still floated along as prosperous as ever. "Twelve months ago," Mr. Zeller wrote in his first annual report, "we had nothing but this house with its empty rooms. It is now inhabited by seventy persons, forty-seven of whom are children, and thirteen pupil-teachers. We have hired twelve jucharten (about sixty acres) of land. One part of it is in grass, a second is in potatoes, and the third is an orchard. Thus we eat what the hands of our pupil-teachers and elder children have cultivated, and what God has blessed. We have now three horned-cattle in the cowhouse, and three beehives in the garden. Sixteen sheep, watched and cared for by one of our children, wander about on heath and meadow. Their wool clothes the brethren and the children. The younger boys spin; some of the brethren and the older boys weave the wool, and our tailors make coats of it. Some of the brethren are our shoemakers, others our joiners. Thus we labour together as one family. As to corn, leather, flax, thread, linen, and timber, we must buy them. But the expenses have been comparatively little, for the Lord helped us in a wonderful and glorious way, so that all could be covered by the voluntary gifts of our friends. He has not for one week allowed our box to be empty. In short, we, the seventy inmates of this house, may in truth say: 'The Lord hath done great things for us, whereof we are glad.'"

These lines give an interesting view of the method of training and teaching which Mr. Zeller adopted for the pupil-teachers. They received their school-instruction in the forenoon, and their afternoon was spent in farming, gardening, and handicrafts; while the children who had spent their forenoon in labours of the same kind were taught at school. Mr. Zeller wanted the young men to accustom themselves to the most humble employments, and sometimes even to hard work. They were thus ever reminded that they were destined to be schoolmasters of poor children, perhaps in the most miserable hamlets of remote districts, where they were to be poor with the poor, living upon small salaries, and obliged to earn part of their livelihood with their own hands; and where, perhaps, they might have to thatch the roofs of their cottages, repair their furniture, dig their potatoes, and mend their coats. Thus at the outset they were inspired with a spirit of humility. And this was in perfect harmony with an article of the Beuggen programme, which was as follows:—"Young men who from bodily or financial needs seek for a place of refuge, or such as want to escape from toil through the medium of a schoolmaster's situation, or such as only want to obtain so-called accomplishments in order to try their fortune as schoolmasters in the world, are not fit for our establishment."

The principle expressed in these words was maintained by Mr. Zeller with iron perseverance during his whole career. "We give them," he says, "such simple teaching that no rich community shall, by alluring offers, call them away from poor communities." This method of training kept the little band clear of unfit members. Their number seldom surpassed fifteen. They came mostly from the farm or the workshop. Mr. Zeller at first hoped that Christian young men of the middle classes, and even of still higher ranks, might come and devote their lives to this humble but useful labour in the vineyard of God. He soon gave up that hope, as he found that rich young men preferred admiration of his self-denying example to imitation of it. So he was left with young men of the peasant and operative classes. Now among these there were not many who at once proved fit for the purpose. It took a good deal of trouble to ascertain whether they ever would be fit at all. Some came with hearts glowing with the love of Christ, but destitute of any talent whatever for teaching. Others came possessed of everything required for a good schoolmaster except a warm loving heart. Mr. Zeller soon found it necessary to introduce a strict system of probation, sometimes for an indefinite time, as he had fallen into the mistake of accepting young men too quickly. His motto was, "Better no schoolmaster at all than a bad one." For providing the poor people with bad teachers no establishment was required. But if he could only bless a few hamlets with well-trained, able, and truly Christian schoolmasters, he thought it would be worth all the trouble and sacrifice he was willing to undergo.

The working of the establishment, as organised by

Mr. Zeller, was characterised by activity, order, and a thoroughly Christian spirit. And what, above all, strikes the present visitor, is the humble simplicity that pervades the whole organisation. There is not the slightest attempt at show. Nothing but what poor children should learn to aim at is put before them. Their education is confined to what they will need in the humble sphere of life which Providence has destined them for. Perhaps, in the opinion of some, a little more time might be allowed for play. But it is questionable whether it would be wise to accustom children who will have to work hard in later life to much recreation, especially as it certainly is not required for health's sake, since they have plenty of bodily exercise in their garden and field labour. Their blooming countenances, and happy, merry looks, tell that their day's work is itself their pastime.

V.—CONFIDENCE IN GOD IS NOT PUT TO SHAME.

The second year at Beuggen, though gratifying as to its results, was marred by a sad loss: the death of the excellent house-mother, Mrs. Fäsch. "How could I be silent," Zeller writes, "about our dear, venerable house-mother, who, from love to Jesus, notwithstanding her great age and her weak body, would sit all day on a humble bench, teaching a band of little children to work? She has now left us to go to her happy home above. For some days her love to the poor boys, and her uncommon faithfulness to her duty, kept up a strife with her increasing illness. At length pain and weakness forced her to a sickbed, which soon became her deathbed. But what a deathbed! Such quiet patience; such gratitude for every trifling service of love; such bright joyful faith; such divine peace in the reconciled heart; such participation of the love of Jesus; such home-sickness for the heavenly fatherland I never witnessed before in a dying saint. I have now seen that it is worth our while to serve the Saviour faithfully, to give up our hearts to Him in faith and love, and to spend all our strength in his service."

The place of this good and noble servant of the divine Master was taken by Mr. Zeller's wife, who henceforth extended her maternal care, hitherto bestowed exclusively on her own family, to the whole household, and during a period of thirty-two years proved a worthy successor to that rare pattern of self-denying Christian love.

Though, on the whole, the forty years during which Mr. Zeller conducted the establishment were years of prosperity and happiness, yet he had his share of this life's thistles and briars, and sometimes it was a hard task to drink the cup that was put before him. The permanency of the Institution, occupying as it did a building which might any moment be claimed by the authorities, was very uncertain. "We are like birds sitting in the branches," Zeller used to say. Indeed, as early as the third year, a report was spread that the Castle was about to be sold. It is hardly possible to describe the anxiety that this rumour, which on examination proved too well founded, caused to the poor friends of Beuggen. They did not know where to go with the eighty souls who were about to be deprived of shelter and food. "Our perplexity was very great," Zeller writes; "but the Lord heard the cries of the poor." Owing to the kind intervention of a princely benefactress the sale was put off, without Zeller knowing anything about it. Nor had he made any effort to obtain that lady's interference. He experienced that his stay in the house was entirely dependent upon the faithful watchfulness of his heavenly Father; and each time when a similar rumour was repeated, it only reminded him that every day he had, as it were, to take the Castle afresh from the hand of God. His childlike confidence was never put to shame. Up to his last moment he saw the establishment stand firm on the foundation he had planted it upon; and it stands there still, after a period of forty-four years, as a memorial of the power of faith and of the blessing of love.

Sometimes the purse of the establishment was all but empty; and it seemed as if the dark picture of Mr. Zeller's future lot which his friends at Zofingen had put before him were about to be realised. One year the number of individuals who paid the board of children was so small that more than half of them were unpaid for; and out of the twenty-two pupil-teachers who were in the house, only two were paid for. Thus nearly two-thirds of this numerous household were entirely on the funds of the establishment. Now, Mr. Zeller never went out to collect money; nor did he send anybody in his place. In the forty annual reports which he wrote there is not even one line in which he asks the public for gifts. Such a thing as a list of regular annual subscribers he had not. A capital fund at the credit of the establishment was not to be found in any bank. It is true the Basle Committee greatly contributed towards keeping up the sympathy of Christian friends; but not one of its members had pledged himself to pay a deficit; and that there would be a tremendous deficit this year, was, humanly speaking, all but certain. "We, too," Mr. Zeller writes on this occasion, "were for some time in anxiety. Misgivings about God's careful love would darken our hearts. But we were served aright, and put to shame; for unexpected gifts, contributions in kind, large and small donations, poured in so abundantly, that we closed the year without owing anything to anybody, except love and gratitude. Among these gifts of love were the mites of the widows, the weekly savings of Christian industry, and the farthings of the sympathising poor, as well as the greater donations of liberal wealth. One benefactress sent us quite unexpectedly 1000 francs; a female friend left her gold chain in our box; and another benefactor presented us with two superb milch cows."

Besides financial difficulties, there were trials of other kinds, which reminded Mr. Zeller of the truth that to love is to suffer; but they were fully compensated for by the heart-rejoicing experiences of the blessed effect of his good work. During the long period of his directorship the establishment always contained from 105 to 115 individuals, of whom there were many who, under his truly paternal and tender, yet firm and serious, guidance, found the way from death to life; and there were none, so far as is known, who did not at least become better members of society, if not of the Church. Zeller does not say much in his reports about the results of his labours on the hearts and conduct of his pupils. Still grateful joy impels him now and then to tell his readers that some of the boys who are sent out are raised to higher situations, owing to their good conduct; that one of the girls had been appointed house-mother to an establishment for the poor; that other girls have married respectable husbands; that others, who, after they left the house, had taken to a disgraceful life, unexpectedly wrote him to express their grief and contrition, and to ask his pardon. The tone of contentment, of enjoyment, of gratitude, in which he from the first to the last page of his forty reports speaks of his work and pupils, the undaunted enthusiasm with which he, from year to year, continues to carry on his arduous labours, and the urgency with which he on every occasion presses the establishment of as many institutions for poor children as can be founded,—all this, together with the unanimous eulogy of the whole band of German and Swiss Christian philanthropists, shows that his labours must have been crowned with unquestionable success. This may, at least, be said of his work among the pupil-teachers: that they were spread through the whole of the German population of Europe, from Cologne to the Crimea, where, on the shores of the Black Sea, many a poor German and Swiss colony was living in ignorance and misery.

At a later period some of them went to the German colonies in America and Asiatic Russia. To many of those poor emigrants the Beuggen schoolmaster combined in his own person the offices of teacher, minister, burgomaster, notary, and physician. And while he was thus as a fountain of light and life among them, he shared with them the privations and trials of their desert-life, contenting himself with a piece of dry coarse bread, and a draught of cold water, which was the only reward he could obtain for his self-sacrificing love. "As to the children," Zeller writes, "which have left our house and are scattered through the world, I find that, on the whole, only the grateful turn out well. Of course, I am not able to say how they are getting on, nor whether some of them get on at all; but still I find, with joy and gratitude, that by far the greater number of them walk in the ways of usefulness, chastity, and honesty. It is true they may not yet have entered on the way of eternal life; for mere civil honesty and morality are not the righteousness which is of God. But still it is a matter of paternal joy to compare the present condition of these children with the state of utter neglect, ignorance, and misery they were in when they entered our establishment. God be praised for every improvement, for every change for the better, and for every good influence and stimulus. A successful education cannot be brought about by mere human wisdom and skill; and perhaps no phrase is more incorrect than 'the art of training' (Erziehungskunst). Every one who has experienced in the case of his own children how the success of their education is owing to innumerable impressions which are independent of parental, yea, of human, influence in general, will admit that success in the education of children who are not one's own, is much more the work of Divine grace, and of the Holy Spirit. We receive from time to time written and oral communications from those of our children who are now adults, and engaged in the bustle of life. They unanimously declare that they often remember the warnings and exhortations which they received at the Bible class. Some urgently entreat us never to stop our biblical instruction, since they can assure us from their own experience that it will not be fruitless, though we may not be able to see the fruits at once. One of them writes, that, being on the brink of despair, he was about to commit suicide, when he was kept back by recollecting what he had learnt from the Bible at Beuggen, though at the time he disliked it, and tried as much as possible to stay away when it was read. Another writes that the Bible, which he always looked upon with aversion at Beuggen, afterwards became a sting in his bosom, which left him no peace when committing sin, and drove him at length to the Saviour. Almost all of them agree that the 'third seven years' of their life have been the worst and most dangerous."

VI.—THE CHRISTIAN TEACHER.

An establishment conducted in this spirit could not but obtain the protection, assistance, and guidance of Him, for whose honour it was founded. But so to conduct it required a man like Mr. Zeller.

One of the main features in Zeller's character was his sincere piety, marked by a rare degree of humility, and a deep sense of his own defectiveness and utter dependence upon God. One need only read his reports to be struck with the really touching frankness and simplicity of heart with which he every now and then speaks of his own faults and failures; and those who came into close contact with him assure us that as he appears in his writings, so he was in real life. "My friends," he would write, "all human works are defective, and marred by stumbling. I, alas! have to reproach myself with many faults and mistakes. Always we have to learn the true thing, i.e., the meaning and will of the Lord, by doing our work better to-day than we did it yesterday; and by ourselves becoming better than we were before. When we are inspired by the desire of learning, and by the wish to mortify our own selves more and more, and honestly to serve the best, kindest, and most gracious of Masters, we always receive from his good hand more good than we, unworthy creatures as we are, are able to return to Him. But if we only come to Him with repentance, we are already received. The Lord resisteth the proud, but He giveth grace to the humble; yes, to the humble and contrite spirit. Oh, how often have I experienced that! May it strengthen and encourage my fellow-labourers! For we should have to wait too long were we to postpone serving the Lord till we commit no more sins. I could fill a whole annual report with a list of faults and failures. Nor will I promise that I shall never tell them. An honest account of our defects and mistakes might, perhaps, be the most instructive part of a report. But this time we will rejoice and be glad, for we too have obtained mercy," &c.

"I therefore bow down before the holy God,—who is adored with the greatest reverence by those who stand nearest to his throne, before whose face they cover their faces,—and I confess that I have nothing to boast of in myself. For He sought and found me, a sinful man, who was sunk in the infidelity and pride of our times, and lost in the vanity of this world. He sent me among the poor youth, and has, with a Father's love, kindly supported, protected, and pardoned me and this great household for so many years. And if I look at our natural darkness, at the power and extent of our inward corruption, great God! I cannot but acknowledge and confess that it is only through thy great, all-exceeding grace that we still exist; that this house, notwithstanding all its great defects, still may be called a working-place of the Holy Spirit; that it still is a house of peace, and not a hell," &c.

Now professions of humility are simply disgusting, if they serve only as cloaks for want of energy and skill. But Beuggen could, and up to the present moment can, be quoted as a pattern of activity and able school-training. Nor did Zeller fear to point to his work, when he was attacked on account of his piety and religious spirit. These attacks were not few, nor did they always come from indifferent quarters. "Everything at Beuggen," it was said by a certain party, "is sacrificed to Mr. Zeller's hobby, viz., biblical instruction. Secular teaching is very scanty there. If matters continue in this way, the daily conversation at Beuggen will be composed entirely of texts of Scripture. The children will be able to tell everything about Cain and Abel, Jerusalem and Jericho, but nothing about Gessner and Tell, Basle and Bern. The Beuggen thermometer stands far too high above the freezing-point. Mr. Zeller and his friends are a set of pietists, fanatics, mystical people, and methodists."

Mr. Zeller used to bear up under these invectives with the greatest tranquillity. When called a fanatic or a pietist, he would say with a smile, "It is not at all uncommon in botany to see plants wrongly classified." He even acknowledged the good intentions of some of his antagonists. For them he had always an answer ready. "Is it possible to be too pious? Is it possible to be too faithful to God and his Word? I think not. In this respect we have not to regret that we are doing too much, but too little. After the most accurate examination, I cannot see that there is too much of biblical teaching amongst us. For we know in what condition and from what quarters our children come to us; but we cannot possibly know whither they will be scattered abroad after having left our institution. As to scientific instruction, if some should think that there is too little of it amongst us, I pray them to remember that we never promised, nor do we promise now, that we shall train up scientific men. This was never the object of our simple institution. We would rather leave people without science at all, than give them half-learning and half-knowledge. Half-learned men are the worst of all, and do the greatest mischief in the world."

To whatever cause this estimate of the value of learning and science may be ascribed, it could not be ascribed to want of learning and science in himself. He was an excellent Greek and Latin scholar, and his knowledge of history, both ancient and modern, was as profound as it was extensive. But this certainly makes his judgment about the excellency, the indispensability, and the educational power of the Bible all the more valuable.

Mr. Zeller's high estimation of the Bible and its influence upon the school proceeded from relevant causes. First, his experience of the insufficiency of Pestalozzi's principle caused him to look to the Bible as the only satisfactory corrective. Undoubtedly Pestalozzi's system of teaching and training was a great step between the unsubstantial and flippant teaching of the eighteenth century and the more solid, reasonable, and humane school-teaching of the present time. The great love for the people, "the poor people," which characterised Pestalozzi's life and all his undertakings, however unsuccessful, could not but deeply impress such a heart as Zeller's, nor could he fail to admire the genius which knew so well how to open up the Book of Creation to children, in order to impress them with true ideas of the real nature of things. But a genius like Zeller's could not fail to discover the defect that lay at the bottom of Pestalozzi's system. Education by the mere contemplation of God's work in creation, even though conducted in the most tender and loving spirit, and by the clearest understanding, will never suffice to bring a man to peace with God, with himself, or with mankind, so long as the fearful and fatal disease of sin dwells and rules in his nature. It will always prove insufficient to produce the desired effect, just as the placing of the most excellent and best-tuned organ before a performer whose hands are paralysed, or whose ear is untrue, will fail to bring forth harmonious sounds. Mr. Zeller perceived that a power was required mighty enough to enlighten man's eyes and to purify his heart, so as to enable him to look at creation in the true light, and to understand the invisible things of God by the things that are visible. This power he could only find in the Gospel of the crucified, sin-atoning, and risen Son of God. Thus, as Pestalozzi wanted the children, as it were, continuously to bathe in the rivers of creation, Zeller wanted them at the same time to bathe in the ocean of divine truth—the Scriptures. Nor was Pestalozzi opposed to this; he only lacked the required simplicity of sight to perceive how it could be effected. But he saw it realised at Beuggen, and he marvelled at it with joyful surprise. It was in July, 1826, that the patriarch visited Zeller's Establishment. Upon entering the house, his way on both sides was lined by a row of children and pupil-teachers, who welcomed him with a hymn. Moved to tears the venerable grey-headed man walked up the broad flight of stairs to the large school-room, and took his place at the teacher's desk. An oak-wreath was presented to him, but he put it on the head of Zeller's little son, saying, in a voice almost stifled with tears, "Not to me! Not to me! This wreath becomes innocence!" He stayed four days at the establishment, and inquired minutely into its organisation and the spirit in which it was conducted. And what was the impression made upon his mind? When walking through the house he constantly said to himself, as overwhelmed with surprise, "What a power! What a power!" It is also asserted that, after having seen Zeller's work, he said, "I wish I could begin my labours over again."

This judgment of the grey-headed veteran in the noble army of educational philanthropists, whose whole life had been devoted to trying to reform society, was undoubtedly the highest panegyric that could be pronounced upon Zeller's work. It contained a plain declaration by the best qualified authority, that Zeller had found the true principle, the right motive-power of real reform. Nor was Zeller himself unconscious of this fact. "My friends," he wrote, after having described the seven causes to which he ascribed the increase of pauperism in Christendom, "this sevenfold corruption gnaws at the moral and social well-being of millions of our fellow-creatures. As long as it continues untouched, no reform whatever will bring better times. Make better men, and you will have better times. Three hundred years ago the cry was for Church reform. Nowadays everybody wants State reform. Very well. But what about heart-and-life reform? Would to God there were as many life reformers at present as there are political reformers! Various means for improving the condition of society are proposed. I expect greater results than all these plans will produce, from the faithful imitation of that beautiful example depicted in a picture on the right-hand side of the main entrance to the Town-hall of Basle. It is the example of Jehoshaphat, under whose government 'they taught in Judah, and had the book of the law of the Lord with them, and went about throughout all the cities of Judah, and taught the people.'"

Very touching is the humble confession with which Zeller introduces his appeal to his fellow-labourers among the poor people, not to suffer the Bible to be taken away from the schools: "I must admit that sometimes, in moments of despondency, I have been tempted to exclude Biblical instruction from our system. I confess this weakness with shame, hoping that many of my fellow-labourers will be encouraged to read and explain the Word of God to the children, even should no fruit be perceptible. Perhaps this despondency would not have pressed so heavily upon me, had I not often, confident in my supposed dexterity in teaching, neglected to prepare myself for the Bible class by secret prayer to the Saviour, who is the door of his sheep. Consequently, the door-keeper, the Holy Spirit, did not open the door, and I fell into unmeaning verbiage and mere words, by which no impression was made upon the heart, and the sheep did not know the strange voice. The Word of God is far too good and holy for such barren expositions. But it is as a refreshing draught from the everlasting fountain when it is administered pure and clear, with a believing heart, sanctified and strengthened by prayer. Deeply convinced of this truth, I hereby declare that I know no substitute for biblical instruction; that I consider the withdrawal of the Bible from the schools as a sin, and that I look upon any school where such robbery has been committed as stricken with the judgment of God."

Of course the man who preached such doctrine was called a fanatic by men clothed in soft raiment. But where the world at large, and the schools for youth in particular, are in such an unchristian state, surely a man who unfolds the banner of the cross as the only safeguard, and holds up the Bible as the only true weapon against imminent danger, must be looked upon as a noble hero, whose "fanaticism" is a blessing to his country. No wonder, indeed, that Mr. Zeller, after having himself set the example, left no opportunity untried to incite his friends to found Christian schools, and, above all, such establishments for poor children as his own. And it is calculated that not less than between forty and fifty establishments for the poor have been erected in Switzerland and Germany, on the model of the Beuggen School, in consequence of Zeller's incessant exhortations and appeals.

Still the system was neither his hobby nor his idol. If the poor children could have been rescued without the aid of establishments, none would have rejoiced more than Zeller. "I thank God," he wrote in 1829, "that so many refuges have been opened from the Baltic to the Lake of Geneva. But, dear friends, the establishments are not sufficient, and but for God's gracious care they might even turn hot-beds of corruption. I therefore beseech you not to rely on them, and least of all on the large ones. To strike at the root of the evil, the rescuing of neglected children must become a concern of the Christian family, and their education must be carried on in the Christian family circle. If in each community only two or three of the poorest children were trained by a Christian schoolmaster, or some other head of a family, something good would be effected. A married couple could easily, and without much expense, take two or three children; for their support would not cost so much as the indulgence of a besetting sin. Only a few voluntary subscribers would be required to enable a poor head of a family to share his bread with the miserable. Thus gradually all existing establishments for training poor children would be superseded. What is the reason there are no children from Steinthal in our establishment? Because so long as the Spirit ruled in Steinthal, through that man of God, Oberlin, no child was neglected in the community. And how was it that there were no neglected children at Steinthal? Because there were always some married couples there who voluntarily took the orphans of their deceased neighbours."

These and similar hints were not without their effect. Some time after this last appeal a Christian family, not far from Zürich, requested Mr. Zeller to send them a child. One of the most wretched children, a fatherless and homeless girl, was selected from the Beuggen family, and transferred with joy to her new home. "Would to God," Mr. Zeller wrote on this occasion, "that fifty other families would do the same! The expense of a whole establishment would be saved, and the work be, perhaps, better done."

Such was the work and such the spirit of a man whose name is only known in the comparatively small circle of Christian philanthropists, but who, had he only served some earthly king on the field of battle, would have earned a celebrity equal to that of the greatest heroes. Nor did he limit his labours within the narrow sphere of Beuggen. It sounds almost incredible, yet it is a fact, that this man, who had upon his shoulders such a laborious work, could yet find time to issue various works on education and school-training, which are highly appreciated by teachers of all classes and countries. His excellent little book, "Lessons of Experience for Christian Teachers of the Poor," has been since 1854 recommended by the Prussian Government in its regulations for the organisation of evangelical seminaries. But among all his writings his excellent Monatsblatt von Beuggen ("Monthly Journal of Beuggen") undoubtedly ranks foremost. This paper consists of eight quarto pages. Various religious subjects, both doctrinal and practical, are discussed in it in a popular style. Mr. Zeller conducted it for thirty-two years, chiefly with the intention of making it serve as a medium of correspondence between the establishment and the brethren who were labouring in various parts of the world. It is still continued by his excellent son and successor, Mr. Reinhardt Zeller. Perhaps there never was a periodical published in the German tongue which had such an extensive and beneficial influence upon school and family life. Wherever there is a Christian philanthropic establishment, or a Christian school, or even a Christian family taking interest in philanthropic pursuits in the south of Germany, Zeller's "Monatsblatt" is to be found in the library, in the study, or on the book-shelf of the parlour.

Christian Heinrich Zeller. (From a Photograph.)

Mr. Zeller's excellent wife was about ten years younger than him, yet he survived her two years. She died in 1858, at the age of sixty-seven. She had five children when, with joyful confidence in God, she followed her husband to Beuggen. Here she gave birth to other six. But the care of this large family did not make her shrink from taking the superintendence of a household of about a hundred and twenty persons. "During thirty-eight years," Zeller wrote after her funeral, "she fulfilled her arduous task with such faithfulness and activity, that she was the soul of the economical department of our establishment. But she was more than that. She also assisted in the education of five hundred and seventy-two poor children, and two hundred and forty poor pupil-teachers. She attended them both in health and sickness, and stood by the death-beds of many of them. Such was her self-sacrificing love, that I may point her out as a blessed pattern of a Christian mother."

"Repent ye therefore, and be converted, that your sins may be blotted out. This commandment of God is chiefly . . . . . ." Thus ends a portion of an article on Acts iii. 19—21, in the June part of the "Monatsblatt" of 1860. They were the last words that came from the pen of the venerable patriarch. It ever was his prayer that God might spare him the misery of a decrepit old age, and permit him to die in harness. This desire was vouchsafed to him. On the 11th of May, 1860, he conducted the morning prayers of the whole establishment, and the Bible-class of the pupil-teachers. This was his last work. Inflammation of the lungs laid him on his dying-bed. He was aware of his condition, but no fear or doubt troubled the happy calmness of his soul. During seven days he lay quiet and still as a child on the bosom of its mother. But on his last night he seemed to be inspired with a spirit from on high. With extraordinary bodily exertion he spoke, both consciously and unconsciously, words of spirit and power, which made an undying impression on the bystanders. "Do you know Jesus still?" some one asked. "How can you ask that?" was the reply. "I stand in a personal relation to Him, which has lasted for years, and has never been interrupted. Jesus Christ is the only true foundation. Whoever lays another foundation cannot stand — he is condemned." He spoke a few words to the pupil-teachers. He blessed the children. Once more he opened his kind eyes. Then they were shut never to be opened again. He died on the 18th of May, 1860, at the age of eighty-one.

It must have been a touching sight when, on the 20th of May, seventy children and fifty pupil-teachers, together with a band of more than a hundred friends, gathered round his grave to bid the last farewell to their beloved father and friend. The late Professor Auberlen, of Basle, the intimate friend and admirer of the deceased, pronounced his funeral oration. Among other things he said, "Zeller's greatness consisted in his keeping himself so humble. . . . With the most simple means he accomplished great things. . . . Zeller reminded one of such men as Boos and Flattich. He had many features in common with both. In theology he was a man of Bengel's school, especially in this, that to him the prophetic word was essential to the right understanding of Scripture. He liked to speak very much about the magnalia Dei (the glories of God), and often in his own characteristic way he would change the word into '*hab*alia,' adding, 'Have, have, we must have it!'"

VII.—BEUGGEN TO-DAY.

The Rev. Reinhardt Zeller continues the work in the same spirit in which it was carried on by his godly and venerable father. He is assisted by his brother, Mr. Nathaniel Zeller. Mr. Reinhardt Zeller is about thirty years of age, and if he and his consort are permitted to equal their predecessors in length of days, as they resemble them in love and zeal, Beuggen has still many a happy year in prospect. Travellers, who may happen to be at Basle or its neighbourhood, should, by all means, try to spend a Sunday at Beuggen. If the Lord's day is kept in a Christian spirit anywhere, it is at this quiet, hallowed spot, where a little church of Christ, secluded from the bustle of the world, and living in all the charming simplicity of a patriarchial household, stands as a marvellous monument of the power of the Gospel, as a protest against sin, and as a refuge from misery. I shall never forget the impression which the sight of that little congregation made upon me when I entered at half-past nine a.m. the large school-room, where seventy children were seated on benches before the desk at which Mr. Zeller stood. Sixteen pupil-teachers, together with the other adult members of the household, sat behind them. The hymn, sung in four parts with remarkable correctness, seemed almost to transport the soul to the fields of Bethlehem on Christmas eve. The prayers, short and pithy, were simple enough to be the vehicles of children's thoughts, and sublime enough to carry the minds of all the audience up to the greatest heights. The sermon, from Rom. xiii. 11—14, was as telling upon the heart as it was quaintly divided. Each of its three parts was headed by a preposition thus: Up! (ver. 11, Awake out of sleep); Off! (ver. 12, Cast off the works of darkness); On! (verses 12 and 14, Put on the armour of light; put on the Lord Jesus Christ). After the close of the service, the whole congregation rose, and remained standing. Mr. Zeller, leaving his desk, took the two youngest girls by the hand and walked out of the room, followed in orderly procession by the other children, to the singing of a hymn. This was a sight which it was impossible to witness without being deeply moved. Half an hour later I found the whole household assembled at dinner. More than a hundred individuals were seated at four long tables, with an order and quietness which could only be expected in a well-trained family of ordinary size. The Grace was sung to a tune, which by its sweet melody and correct harmony prepared us thankfully to accept the bountiful gifts of a merciful Giver. There is a special table-hymn for each day of the week, but I think the Sunday one excels them all, both in the beauty of its tune and the homeliness of its words. I cannot refrain from writing them down, hoping that those of my readers who are fond of music will thank me for this. What my translation may want in elegance of language, will I hope be made up for by correctness.

I am not able to give statistics of the income and expenditure of the Beuggen establishment. It is, so far as I know, the only charitable institution in the world supported by voluntary contributions which publishes no list of subscribers or balance-sheet. Nor has a balance-sheet ever been asked for during all the years of its existence. Mr. Zeller himself, and the twelve worthy and venerable Basle gentlemen who formed his committee, were the balance-sheet. And so the establishment continues to this day, cordially supported by voluntary gifts from all quarters, while only a few know how much comes in or how much is wanted.

And I could find only one table of statistics in Mr. Zeller's reports showing the condition of the children both in and out of the house at a certain period. It is in the report of 1843, when the institution had entered the twenty-fourth year of its existence. The total number of children admitted from the beginning of the establishment was at that time 335. Out of these there were :—

Married	40
Master Tradesmen, and supporting themselves honestly	54
Servants and apprentices	77
Behaving badly	23
Dead	23
Little or nothing known of	52
Still in the house	66

Now, leaving out those still in the house, and those who had died, we find that 171 were known as having been successfully redeemed for human society. On the other hand, only 23 had turned out failures. This really shows a favourable proportion, which few establishments can boast of.

And here ends, for the present, the story of Beuggen Castle. And how can it better end than with Zeller's own words, written in 1853, at the close of his statistical review of the 212 pupil-teachers and 488 children, whom he had been permitted to train up :—

"Such a tree, with its numerous branches and twigs, has that little sprig become which was planted at Beuggen thirty-three years ago, and has lived through a series of fertile and of barren vicissitudes. These thirty-three years are the most beautiful and blessed period of my life. When looking back upon them from this my seventy-fifth year, I cannot but fall prostrate, full of gratitude and adoration, at the feet of the Lord, who is a father of the fatherless, a judge of the widows, and a refuge for the poor. We began here in April, 1820, without house or field, or even funds of our own, and we have continued to live till this moment in a hired establishment. But our heavenly Father has during these many years provided for us, and preserved us ; He mightily protected us at a time when we had no Government protection ; and He has so helped us through, that we never lacked what we needed, were always able to pay our rent and taxes, and were never compelled to run into debt. Keeping in mind that we have always had a household of about 108 persons, this is marvellous in our eyes, and is to me an experience which I shall never be able sufficiently to praise my God for."

JOHN DE LIEFDE.

JUDAS ISCARIOT.

THE sceptical tendency which from various causes has of late years acquired considerable strength, and eaten into the faith of many earnest and generous minds, has found it no difficult task to shake the credit of large portions of Scripture, by applying to them inapplicable tests and plunging the unlearned into questions which it requires some research to solve. But the Gospel History has proved "a burdensome stone" to it ; and, if we may judge from the success of the most recent and subtle attempts to destroy its credibility, is likely to fulfil that prediction of Him who is its glorious subject, "Whosoever shall fall on this stone shall be broken, but on whomsoever it shall fall it will grind him to powder." At present there is no disposition to deny the history in toto. Just now, even the most sceptical are ready to admit that there did exist some such person as the Gospel History describes, that he was a Jewish reformer, and that by his hostility to the reigning system of religion and the success with which he propagated his views he brought upon himself the deadly enmity of the rulers, and was put to death as an impostor under Pontius Pilate. But how much of the history contained in the Gospels is strictly historical, to what extent the story of Christ's life is faithfully told there, and how much of the teaching ascribed to him actually came from his lips—the sceptical tendency of our time considers an open question. On this question the views of the sceptically disposed are as various as are their own moral principles and tone of mind. While the men of purity, simplicity, and candour are prepared to read the whole history as genuine, save in so far as it runs counter to what they regard as fundamental principles—in contradiction to which nothing is to be received—the men of undevout mind and lax moral principles, if they read it at all, regard the Gospel History as merely a refined exhibition of religious morality, on an historical basis and a Jewish foundation, which the advanced condition of humanity and the altered state of society has in a great measure superannuated ; though they are ready to admit that a large residuum of truth, for which the world is indebted to Christianity, is destined to enduring life and efficacy among men. Widely, however, as these two classes differ from each other, there is one thing in which they emphatically agree : they reject in common the supernatural element in the Gospel History. To read what the best of them write, one would think the line of demarcation between them and orthodox believers in the Gospel of Christ so exceedingly narrow, that to class such with the sceptical rejecters of Christianty would seem harsh and narrow-minded. But the best and the worst have in reality far more in common than what divides them. He who believes that Jesus of Nazareth had in no other sense a Divine Mission than any other man whom Providence raises up from time to time to redress the wrongs of society, and benefit his kind—he who believes that He uttered nothing, wrought nothing, and suffered nothing but what can be accounted for on natural principles—is as really an unbeliever, however lofty may be his admiration and even love of his character, as the man whose scepticism permits him to deny the heroism, impugn the wisdom, and assail the moral character of Christ. For, to believe in Jesus is not to admit his historical existence and think well of Him as a teacher and benefactor of men, even though we should do this in no ordinary degree. Men are not called believers in Socrates, or in Luther, merely because they give credence to what history records of them, and have formed a high opinion of their services to society. To believe in Jesus, or to be a Christian in the lowest admissible sense of the phrase, is to take the view of Him given in the Gospel History—as supernaturally born into the world, supernaturally commissioned to the work which He did, supernaturally attesting that commission as one directly from heaven, and supernaturally declared to be the Son of God by his resurrection from the dead, his ascension into heaven, and the descent of the Spirit supernaturally thereafter. He who does not believe this is no more a Christian, in any proper sense of the term, than he who sits loose to the entire History.

It is not the purpose of this paper to re-open the question of the truth of the Gospel History; but, taking one of the most remarkable of its subordinate features—what relates to Judas Iscariot,—to examine it in detail, partly as one of the severest tests by which to try whether it be possible to receive the History without taking it entire; but partly also for its own sake, as perhaps the most deeply instructive portion of the History next to what relates to Christ Himself.

In every tragic story, some provision must be made for securing that the final catastrophe shall be brought about naturally. The mere existence of a traitor, then, among the more immediate followers of Jesus, by whom He should be eventually betrayed into the hands of his enemies, would be no startling feature in a concerted story of his death. But the entire history of the traitor, as we find it in the four Gospels, presents details so minute and diversified, and when viewed as a whole stands out in such marvellous unity and consistency, as we venture to pronounce unattainable by art and only conceivable as actual history.

The first notice which we have of this man is in the lists of the Twelve whom Jesus chose as his most intimate associates, to be the recipients of his whole teaching, and the first propagators of his doctrine—whom therefore He named Apostles. We have three such lists—one in each of the first three Gospels—all containing the same names, all beginning with Peter, and all ending with Judas. There is another list of them in the opening chapter of the Acts, also containing the same names and beginning with Peter; but as they are there named only as part of the hundred and twenty who assembled in the upper room after the ascension of their Master, the name of Judas, who had by that time "gone to his own place," is of course excluded.

He is surnamed "Iscariot," that is, "Judas of Kerioth," a town in the territory of Judah (Josh. xv. 25), to distinguish him from "Judas the brother of James," another of the Apostles (Luke vi. 16). By what motive was Jesus influenced in choosing this man to be an Apostle? It will not do to answer, that it was on purpose to provide a traitor in his person. There are those who have not scrupled to say and write this, as an adequate explanation of the choice in question. But it is no explanation at all. That he did betray his Master is no evidence that he was chosen for that purpose, and to say so seems to border on a fatalistic position. Christ says He will eventually condemn the unbelieving world; but He expressly says He did not come for this purpose, but, on the contrary, that the world through Him might be saved. That Judas, in the spontaneous development of his own character, would betray his Lord, was doubtless foreseen and as certainly provided for. But when this is conceded, we have still to inquire by what consideration Jesus was probably influenced in the choice of this man as one of the Twelve.

The question may, perhaps, be answered by applying it to the choice of the rest; and as no reasons are given for the selection of any of them, we are thrown back upon such general considerations as the following. As the ministry of Christ had lasted some time before the choice of the Twelve, during which time He was followed by large numbers partially, and by a few from the first without ever leaving Him, there can be no reasonable doubt that in selecting twelve of these for such a purpose as we have mentioned, He would fix upon those who had either made the greatest progress in the apprehension of his views, or who showed the greatest aptitude to take them in. And as we know of some of them that they had been John's disciples before they attached themselves to Christ, and as such must have made considerable progress in the knowledge of some of the principles of Christ's kingdom, it is not unlikely that all the Twelve (save perhaps Matthew) had been disciples of John, and become constant followers of Jesus just in consequence of John's teaching. At all events, it appears to us next to certain, either that Judas had been one of these—drafted out of the Baptist's ranks into those of Christ—or that he had shown such steadiness in following Jesus, such interest in his ministry, and such aptitude to take in what He taught, as to be on a level in all these respects with the rest of the Twelve. Certain it is, that no trace of the contrary can be discovered in any of the Gospels, and but for the concluding scenes of the History, no reader of it would gather that one of the Twelve differed in character from all his fellows. If there was a radical defect in the moral and religious character of Judas, it certainly remained undeveloped, even to his constant associates, up to the fatal night when they all met for the last time together.

In one thing, at least, some superiority to his fellows must have been seen in Judas. From the time when Jesus chose the Twelve, "that they might be with Him," up to the time when "they all forsook Him and fled," they made up one family. They travelled together, took their meals together, and must have had but one purse—unless on such exceptional occasions as when those blessed women "who had been healed by Jesus of evil spirits and infirmities," went up and down with Him in one of his Galilean tours, and "ministered to them of their substance." Well, for this family a purse-bearer was required; and of all the Twelve Judas was the one selected for that office. Here again, it is easy to say that this was with the view of furnishing his covetous heart with the required facilities for discovering its detestable character. But this is a poor, not to say unworthy, account of the matter. As well might we say that the innocent occasions of every atrocity done under the sun are divinely furnished for no other end than to develop the wickedness of man. In the present case, we have no doubt that Judas had shown a capacity above his fellows for this particular post—a certain shrewd, ready, wide-awake aptitude for taking the management of the small property of this travelling family—and that in a degree to justify to the rest the choice made of him, and keep him to the last in possession of their good opinion. One circumstance regarding him—mentioned in the only place where we are informed of his holding this post at all—may help to confirm this. "He was a thief (says the fourth Evangelist), and had the bag,* and bare what was put therein" (John xii. 6).† Now though it requires no cleverness to purloin, to purloin from a treasury which at no time could be large, and which we know to have been sometimes low indeed, and do this often enough to justify the charge of his being "a thief," without ever being discovered or even suspected up to the last by any of his fellows, though in daily and hourly communication with him,—this must have demanded no ordinary adroitness; a faculty only evil when ill-employed, and capable of being turned to the best ends.

How early that covetous disposition which lay at the root of his thievishness, and ultimately proved the ruin of Judas, began to put itself forth in the way of meddling with the bag, it is impossible to tell. But one allusion to his reprobate character, the meaning of which none of the rest appear to have apprehended, would seem to show that not many months had elapsed before he began to put forth his hand to the sacred property. It was during some time in the second year of our Lord's ministry, as we take it, that the Twelve were chosen. Before the Passover of the following year Jesus had risen to the zenith of his reputation in Galilee; the crowning manifestation of which was that, having fed five thousand besides women and children on a few loaves and fishes, they could hardly be restrained from taking Him by force and making Him a king. That night He crossed the sea of Galilee, "walking on the water;" and the next day, in the synagogue of Capernaum, He spoke that wonderful discourse about "the bread of life," which by the harshness of its phraseology seemed intended to drive all but determined believers away from Him. This accordingly was the result with "many of his disciples," who "from that time went back and walked no more with Him." Even the Twelve seem to have been staggered; for it is added, "Then said Jesus, will ye also go away?" to which Peter made that noble reply, "Lord, to whom shall we go? Thou hast the words of eternal life; and we believe and are sure that thou art the Christ, the Son of the living God." It was this that brought out that startling announcement, "Have not I chosen you twelve, and one of you is a devil?" (John vi. 70.) Possibly this meant nothing more than that the diabolical character who was destined to betray Him was already within the small circle of the Twelve, and the explanatory remark of the Evangelist (v. 71) may perhaps confirm this. But to us it would seem to imply further, that the passion which was to come out at length in so diabolical a form had already been fed by the charge of the bag, and that petty appropriations of its contents had already been begun to be practised.

Still we think there is evidence not only that not the least suspicion attached to Judas, but that he exercised considerable influence over the rest of the Twelve. As this may seem a strange position, we must here state on what we ground it. Look, then, first, at the memorable scene of the Anointing at Bethany, only six days before His death. When Mary expended her alabaster box of very precious ointment on the person of her Lord, it is said by Matthew (who must have been himself present) that "when his disciples saw it, they had indignation, saying, To what purpose is this waste" (Matt. xxvi. 8, 9), &c. It is true that Mark limits this remark to "some" of them (Mark xiv. 4, 5). But though it evidently came from the lips of one, the statement of both of these Evangelists clearly implies that it was echoed, or at least found a silent response, in the minds of some of the others, if not of them all. Now John explicitly tells us that it came from Judas Iscariot (John xii. 4, &c.), and his language conveys the impression that it was an unworthy and ungenerous speech—such a speech as only such a man might be expected to make. How, then, came it to be echoed by the rest? To us it seems that not the plausibility of the speech itself—its apparent piety or philanthropy—so much as the influence which Judas exercised among his brethren, led them all too thoughtlessly to second his regret at such profuse expenditure. Now apply this thought to some other scenes, and see if it will not throw light upon certain things not otherwise easily explained.

Shortly after the feeding of the four thousand, Jesus had directed the Twelve to cross with Him to the other side of the lake; and seizing the opportunity of his being alone with them on the passage, He began to warn them against "the leaven of the Pharisees and the leaven of Herod" (Mark viii. 13, &c.). What did they think He was speaking of under the name of "leaven"? No one could possibly guess it, but for the following explanation of it given by the Evangelist: "Now the disciples had forgotten to take (a supply of) bread, neither had they in the ship with them more than one loaf. And they reasoned among themselves, saying, It is because we have no bread." This misunderstanding was so childish, that one is fain to inquire how such a thing could have occurred to them. Now there was one man among them, whose business it was, as the purveyor of the party, to see that their wants were properly attended to; and Judas, on the word "leaven" being uttered in the form of a warning, remembering probably for the first time his neglect of duty, would at once connect the two things together, and whispering to those nearest to him the emptiness of the bag, would suggest this as the likely cause of the mysterious warning; while they, knowing nothing probably about this want of provisions until informed of it by Judas, and quite at a loss to know what Jesus was referring to, might be disposed for a moment to defer to Judas, and take in the explanation which he had suggested. Only in this way does it seem possible to account for so preposterous a misunderstanding being taken up by any number of the Twelve; and if there be anything in it, it shows, not only that the real character of Judas was at this date quite unsuspected, but that his opinion carried some weight with his fellow Apostles. The effect which this gross misconception of his meaning had upon the mind of Christ is one of the finest strokes of real history—which no art would ever have dreamt of—to be found in all the Gospels. The nine questions, following each other in rapid succession, show how deeply He was hurt at this want of spiritual apprehension, and worse still, at their low thoughts of Himself—as if He would utter so solemn a warning on so petty a subject. It will be seen, too, from the very form of their conjecture—"It is because we have no bread"—and his astonishment that they should not by that time have known better what He took up his attention with, that He was accustomed to leave the whole care of his temporal wants to the Twelve (whose servant in such matters Judas was); that, finding they were now reduced to their last loaf, they felt as if unworthy of such a trust, and could not but think that the same thought was passing through their Lord's mind; but that in this they were so far wrong, that it hurt his feelings—sharp in proportion to his love—that such a thought of Him should have entered their minds. Whether we are right in thinking that Judas was at the bottom of this little incident or no, one thing must be clear to every impartial and thoughtful reader of the narrative, that it must have been fact before it became history, that no such triviality would ever have occurred, and certainly would never have been so conceived, by any writer of unreal history, or the mere embellisher of a few leading facts with incidents which never happened.

* Τὸ γλωσσόκομον, the scrip, or treasure-chest.

† There is no necessity for taking the expression, "bare what was put therein," in the sense of "bare it off" or "purloined" it. Theophylact, Meyer, De Wette—in his translation, but not in his commentary—and Archbishop Trench, so understand it. But the Vulgate, Luther, Beza, Luthardt, Alford, &c., take the word (ἐβάσταζεν) in its strict sense, of being simply the bearer of the little family treasure—as our version, we think, rightly does—giving, of course, his thievish propensity the occasions it sought.

Again, the strifes which after this occurred among the Twelve, who should be the greatest in the expected kingdom, receive some light from the position of influence which we have supposed that Judas occupied among them. Human nature being what it is, it would have been surprising if the marked distinction bestowed upon three of them, on more than one important occasion, had not stirred up in the breasts of the rest a measure of jealousy. It will be remembered that Peter, and James, and John, were alone permitted to witness the Healing of Peter's mother-in-law, the Resuscitation of Jairus' daughter, and the Transfiguration. But even of these three, one had been early singled out as destined to occupy a peculiar place in the coming kingdom, and, by his warmth of attachment and readiness to speak and act on all occasions for his Master, had given evidence of his fitness for any post of honour. Still, these three men were as yet but ill able to bear the honour that was put upon them. As for Peter, he was so lifted off his feet by the benediction pronounced upon him, and the distinction promised him in the kingdom which was soon to be set up upon earth, that he ventured to take his Master to task for announcing to them his bloody death as an event which would precede the erection of his kingdom; and the other two, not very long after, put up their mother to solicit from Jesus that the one of them should sit on his right hand, and the other on his left, in the coming kingdom. The "indignation" which this presumption kindled in "the ten" is nothing more than we should have expected. But what adds point to this is, that it seems to have been but the crisis of a number of exasperating dissensions on the same miserable subject. One of these had occurred on their way back from their long journey to Cæsarea Philippi, whither He appears to have taken them with no other view than to break to them for the first time—aside from all their wonted haunts—the tidings of his approaching death. He had repeated this announcement ere they returned to Capernaum; and having there left them to travel by themselves, they fell to disputing which of them should be greatest in the coming kingdom—as if the sad tidings which had greeted their ears had only whetted their confidence in its near approach, and revived all their old jealousies at the preference shown for some of them above the rest. Scarcely had they got home to Capernaum, when Jesus startled and confounded them by inquiring what they had been disputing about by the way. Put to the blush by this unexpected home-thrust, they held their peace. Whereupon Jesus, taking a little child and placing it in the midst, read them that lesson of humility with which our very children are familiar (Mark viii. 27, ix. 37). But this was not the end of it. For when we find Him going on from this subject to warn them at great length, and in the most awful terms, against placing stumbling-blocks in the way of others, to the danger of their souls, and Peter, in the midst of this, eagerly inquiring how oft his brother was to sin against him and be forgiven—"till seven times?"—we cannot resist the impression that some one of the Twelve was that "brother;" that in the recent hot dispute he had been putting His forbearance to the utmost test; and that this provocation had been but a repetition of similar treatment on former occasions from the same person. And if there was one of the Twelve to whom Peter had been an object of special envy, and his forwardness in always answering for the rest had been cast up to him by this person, can there be a doubt who that would be? And if done with that kind of address which an adroit but dark-minded person would know how to use, it would find a response in the unsuspecting minds of the rest, and this would only render it harder to endure. Jesus, however, though He answered Peter's question, made no allusion to the quarter whence the trial probably came, and so the matter was hushed up for the time. But only for a time; for it broke out afresh on an occasion of all others the least likely, one should think, to reopen it. It is the third Evangelist only who mentions it. Immediately after the institution of the Supper, our Lord (he says) added these words, "But behold the hand of him that betrayeth me is with me on the table," &c. And after saying that this led to an inquiry among themselves who the wretch could be, he adds these words, "And there was [or, there had been] a strife among them which of them should be accounted the greatest" (Luke xxii. 24). This occurred probably just before sitting down to the paschal supper, and perhaps it arose from seeing the whole paschal arrangements committed to two of the Twelve—as if this were designed to prepare the rest for the precedency of those two in that kingdom which they seemed to think on the very eve of being set up.

Our object in referring to these incidents has been to put before our readers the following impressions regarding Judas: that, since there were little jealousies among the Twelve on the subject of precedency in the expected kingdom, which seemed ready to be kindled afresh whenever any distinction was put upon one or two of them, and particularly when Peter stepped forward in speech or action before the rest; and since these jealousies were not likely to be felt by all alike, and to break forth simultaneously from every one of them, it is all but certain that some one took the lead in giving utterance to those hurt feelings—and in that case it would surely be the one most given to suspicion, the one to whom unworthy motives would most naturally occur, the one who could least keep such impressions of his brethren within his own breast, yet one who had sufficient address to convey his thoughts in a plausible form, so as to carry the rest along with him. If there be anything in this, there can be no doubt who that would be. And if Judas, after being chosen out of all the Twelve to "have the bag and bear what was put therein," and flattering himself from this that he was high in the confidence of his Master, found that others were entrusted with what was more important, and were manifestly preferred to him, it is easy to see how in a mind like his all that was unworthy would brood and gain strength, and how, if at all adroit, he might work upon the natural infirmities of his unsuspecting fellows and stir up ever and anon unwholesome suspicions and misunderstandings. Still, it is not to be forgotten that up to the very last he maintained his character with the rest, and was never suspected by them till the moment when, believing himself exposed, he went suddenly out from the supper-table to do the deed of darkness.

One other startling fact regarding Judas, before we come to speak of his treason, must not be overlooked. He was sent forth by Jesus, as one of the Twelve, to preach the Gospel of the kingdom and accredit his mission by "healing the sick, cleansing the lepers, and casting out devils." There being twelve of them, all of whom were sent out two and two, there can be no doubt of Judas having had the same commission as all the rest. This is certainly staggering. That a hypocrite should preach as soundly and as eloquently as the most sincere follower of the Lord Jesus, is not so difficult to understand. But that he should be sent by Him to whom all hearts were open, is what one would not so readily imagine. But so it was in the case of Judas; and to us it is clear that our Lord had just such cases as his in view, when He said that many should come to Him in the great day and say, "Lord, Lord, have we not prophesied in Thy name, and in Thy name have cast out devils, and in Thy name done many wonderful works?" And the answer which He is to give—"And then will I profess [or protest] unto them, I never knew you; depart from me, ye that work iniquity" (Matt. vii. 22, 23)—seems expressly designed as a solemn intimation that such a ministry, though in one sense Divine, and carrying with it the apparent signature of Heaven, was no evidence of personal approval, and might be found to consist with a reprobate heart.

But we must now hasten to the treason. The more immediate occasion of it seems to have been what passed at Bethany in the house of Simon the leper, six days before the last Passover; but this only brought to a head what must have been meditated once and again. As every passion grows by exercise, so the theftuous disposition of Judas would gather strength by every undetected appropriation of the sacred property. At length, "the devil, walking about seeking whom he might devour," and seeing this door standing wide open, determined to enter by it, but cautiously (2 Cor. ii. 11) at first; merely "putting it into his heart to betray" his Master (John xiii. 2), or whispering the thought whether by such a step he might not enrich himself, while He who had wrought so many miracles for the benefit of others would surely, when the danger became extreme, miraculously extricate himself. The next stage would be the conversion of that thought into a settled purpose to do it; but to this he would be loath to come till something occurred to fix it, and that something seems to have been the manner in which his indignation at Mary's wasteful expenditure of precious money on a mere perfume was received by Jesus. His remark had been caught up by others in the company; and coming, as it did, from him who had the care both of the economics and of the charity of the sacred family, he would expect it to elicit general approval for its good sense and piety. Instead of this, to have it rebuked by the Master, and held up as unseasonable, ungenerous, and wanting in that supreme devotion to Himself which was expected—if not indeed hypocritical—this could hardly fail to gall to the quick the man who, up to this time, had stood so well; and if along with this there was the feeling of disappointment at the large sum expended on the ointment being lost to himself, we can easily conceive that the chagrin with which he withdrew from this supper would suffice to crystallize into a diabolical purpose what had till then been but a floating speculation. Three or four days, however, might easily elapse before he was able to brace himself up to the necessary steps; nor indeed did the opportunity occur until "two days before the Passover" (Mark xiv. 1), when the chief priests and scribes were seeking how they might contrive to get hold of Him when He came up to the feast, without raising a tumult in the crowded city. Just at this time Judas made his appearance among them, and to their great delight showed them how the thing could be done without any noise. So a bargain was struck up between them; and for thirty pieces of silver—the fine paid for man or maid-servant accidentally killed (Exod. xx. 32), and amounting to less than five pounds sterling—did this wretched man engage to betray his Lord into the hands of those who were thirsting for his blood.

Still he had two days to reconsider his bargain, and a last opportunity of retracing his steps was afforded him at the paschal and eucharistic Supper in the upper room. But instead of quailing, he appears to have sat down with the rest, eaten the Passover, and even allowed Jesus to wash his feet—as He did to all the rest—unmoved. The Master could with difficulty endure this, and in the midst of the operation said enough to make the most unsuspecting among them feel that all was not as it should be. "He that is washed needeth not save to wash his feet, but is clean every whit: and ye are clean, but not all. For He knew who should betray him; therefore said He, Ye are not all clean. . . . . If ye know these things, happy are ye if ye do them. I speak not of you all: I know whom I have chosen: but that the Scripture may be fulfilled, He that eateth bread with me hath lifted up his heel against me. Now I tell you before it come to pass, that when it is come to pass ye may believe that I am He." Still this was not plain enough; and as the time was hastening on, and He had much to say to the Eleven which it would have been incongruous, and hardly possible, to utter while the traitor was with them, He felt it was necessary to be plainer still, and precipitate the exit of the false-hearted one. So "when Jesus had thus said, He was troubled in spirit, and testified, and said, Verily, verily, I say unto you, that one of you shall betray me." Horror-stricken, the simple-minded disciples first looked one on another, and then each one turning his thoughts inwards upon himself, asked his Lord if he was the wretch that was to do such a deed—until Judas himself was forced to do the same. Peter, impatient to know the truth, gets the beloved disciple, who lay next to Him, to find it out, and by a concerted sign this was accordingly done. Meantime, Jesus, proceeding with his discourse, says, "And truly the Son of Man goeth as it was determined; but woe unto that man by whom He is betrayed." On this, it would appear, "Jesus when He had dipped the sop, gave it to Judas Iscariot, the son of Simon." It was a piece of bread soaked either in the wine, or the sauce of a dish; and the giving of this at a meal by one to another, was an ancient expression of regard. This act then, while it sufficed to point out the traitor quietly to the inquirers, was an affecting expression—and the last—of the Saviour's wounded love; and the words of the Psalm which Jesus quoted give us a glimpse of the feeling with which He regarded it: "He that eateth bread with me, hath lifted up his heel against me." Still, Judas is not quite ripe for the deed of darkness; he has yet to be steeled against all compunction; but the time for that has now come. In what a way is it done? "And after the sop Satan entered into him." There is something appalling in the successive stages by which he reached the climax of his guilt. First, "the devil (simply) put it into his heart to betray" Him. But many a struggle may he have endured ere he could nerve himself for the deed. Even with the thirty pieces of silver in his hand, he probably still quailed at the thought of such an act, and for such a sum—the price of the lowest slave! When Jesus stooped to wash his feet, the last struggle may have been only reaching its crisis. But that word, about one that did eat of His bread lifting his heel against Him; the still more explicit announcement that a traitor was at the table; the inquiry which was forced out of him, after it had come from all the rest, "Master, is it I?" and above all, the answer (certainly not audible to the rest), "Thou hast said it" (Matt. xxvi. 24)—would make the feeling irresistible, "I am detected, it is now too late to draw back." And the sop given, and Satan now seated in his breast, he says to himself, with hell in his bosom, "The die is cast—now let me go through with it—Fear, begone!" Jesus, having His eye full upon all this, can endure the man's presence no longer. "Then said Jesus, That thou doest, do quickly." Still, so far were the other disciples from knowing what this meant, that they took it to be some hint to him about future arrangements as treasurer of the family—some supposing it meant something he was to buy for the feast, and others, that he was to give something to the poor. Dear, unsuspecting, happy souls! To you such treason is inconceivable, and the traitor himself, up to this last moment, unimagined. But the mask shall now be torn off, and by himself—"He then having received the sop, went immediately out (thus severing himself for ever from that holy society with which he never had any spiritual sympathy); and it was night"—but far blacker night in the soul of Judas than in the sky over his head.

What does Judas go out to do? To await the exit of the party he has left. But they are not in such haste as he is. For Jesus now, for the first time since Judas entered the sacred circle, felt Himself entirely free with them. Up to this moment there had been more or less restraint, and at the Last Supper, such expressions as "I speak not of you all," "Ye are not all clean," &c., show how painful this restraint had at length become. But the embankment which kept in the volume of living waters having broken down, they burst out, the moment that Judas departed, in a torrent which only ceased on His leaving the supper-room and entering on the next scene of His work—the Agony in the garden. Judas must wait for all that. Those exalted strains in which the Redeemer is now free to address his dear disciples, must have leave to utter themselves all forth; and those still higher strains in which He pours out his heart into his Father's ear must be permitted to wind up the never-to-be-forgotten scene in the paschal chamber. Nor is all ready for thee yet, Judas. They have indeed issued forth, and Jesus has "gone forth with his disciples over the brook Kedron, where was a garden into the which He entered and his disciples." But matters are not yet ready. Judas knows the place, and expects his Master there, "for Jesus ofttimes resorted thither with his disciples." But "the band of men and officers from the chief priests and Pharisees, with their lanterns and torches and weapons" had not arrived. So Judas can do no business yet. Nor, even if they had arrived, should he have had permission; for the mysterious scene of the Agony has yet to be gone through. But what did that mean? Let us see. The view of all that awaited Him came full upon Him. As He felt it coming on, He retired from all but three of the Eleven—His chosen Three—and beginning to be sorrowful and very heavy, He bid them stay together, and watch with Him. The whole bitterness of the cup seemed all at once to rush upon Him, and weigh Him down, even there, to the dust of death. He fell on his face and prayed that if it were possible it might pass from Him. The oppression waxing more intolerable, He could abide the presence even of those Three no longer: so, withdrawing from them about a stone's cast, and having strength for still further endurance supernaturally supplied to Him, He agonized at the sight of the cup which he had to drink, until his sweat was as it were clots of blood* falling down to the ground. But at length the horrors of the cup all disappeared in the glory of an absolute surrender to his Father's will. "The cup which my Father hath given me, shall I not drink it?" The bitterness of death is past. The final conflict, full in view, has been anticipated and rehearsed. The victory has been already won on the theatre of an invincible will to "give his life a ranson for many;" and it only remains to win it on the arena of the Cross. For that He is now all ready. So, coming to his disciples, whom he finds sleeping, He says, "Rise, let us be going: behold, he is at hand that doth betray me." While He yet spake the traitor was advancing, having along with him a great multitude with lanterns and torches, swords and staves. For what purpose? It was full moon, but in case He should have secreted Himself somewhere in the dark ravine, they bring the means of exploring its hiding-places—little knowing Whom they had to do with. "Now he that betrayed Him had given them a sign, saying, whomsoever I shall kiss, that same is he—hold him fast" (Matt. xxvi. 48)—a speech whose cold-bloodedness was only exceeded by the deed itself. "And Judas went before them, and said, Hail, Master, and kissed him."† The last remains of compunction must have been got rid of ere this act, and the speech that accompanied it, could become possible. "And Jesus said unto him, Friend, wherefore art thou come?‡ Betrayest thou the Son of Man with a kiss?"—imprinting on the foulest of all acts the mark of tenderest affection. Such wounded susceptibility—common to all generous and beautiful natures—had been partially shown before, but never with such intensity as here.

The wages of iniquity have been well earned; Jesus is a prisoner in the hands of his enemies; all his disciples have forsaken Him and fled; Judas alone walks secure, and is four or five pounds richer than before. What will he do now? Perhaps he was scarcely prepared for the unresisting submission of the betrayed One to be led as a lamb to the slaughter, and he will wait to see what happens. But as he follows the crowd to the palace of the High Priest, the horrors of his crime rise up before him, and with each piece of intelligence as to what is passing within, which he eagerly picks up, the blackness of his deed thickens around him. At length, the trial being over, sentence of death passed, and the mockeries concluded, the judges issue forth and hand over the condemned One to the Roman governor for execution. At the sight of this, it should seem, the courage of Judas broke down; and, remorse taking possession of him, he hasted to rid himself, first of the burning bribe, and then of life itself. "Then Judas which had betrayed Him (says the first Evangelist), when he saw that he was condemned, repented himself, and brought again the thirty pieces of silver to the chief priests and elders." How characteristic is this of the power of a stinging conscience! A short time before, the promise of this sordid pelf was temptation enough to his covetous heart to outweigh the most overwhelming obligations of truth, duty, and love; now the possession of it so lashes him that he cannot use it—cannot even keep it! But the speech with which he reappeared to those hard-visaged ecclesiastics, with whom he had so lately struck his bargain, is still more remarkable: "I have sinned, in that I have betrayed the innocent blood."* Observe the inexpressible force of this testimony from such lips. For three years had Judas been with Jesus in all circumstances: in public and in private, journeying and resting, at and after meals, his post as treasurer and purveyor (John xiii. 29) for the whole party gave him peculiar opportunity of watching the spirit, disposition, habits, and designs of his Master; while his covetous nature, thievish practices, and quick apprehensions, would incline him to put dark and suspicious, rather than frank and generous, interpretations on all that He said and did. If then he could have fastened on one crooked or questionable feature in all that he had so long witnessed, we may be very sure that no such speech would ever have come from his lips, nor would he have found any difficulty in keeping the money and surviving his crime. How then did the dark ecclesiastics receive this remarkable confession? In a way which we will venture to say must have been uttered first, in order to be written: "What is that to us? See thou to that." "Innocent blood, did you say?

* ὡσεὶ θρόμβοι αἵματος, Luke xxii. 44.

† Contrast 1 Sam. xx. 41, with Prov. xxvii. 6.

‡ The word here rendered "friend" ['Εταῖρε], signifies rather 'companionship,' as in mere social intercourse, and is used on other occasions of remonstrance or rebuke (Matt. xx. 13, xxii. 12). Very different is the endearing term properly rendered "friend" [φίλε], by which Jesus would have addressed a genuine disciple (Luke xii. 4; John xv. 13—15).

* More emphatically, 'I sinned in delivering up innocent blood'—Ἥμαρτον παραδοὺς αἷμα ἀθῷον.

That is your look-out: but we have him now—begone!' Hellish as the speech was, none who know what sacerdotal hypocrisy is capable of will think it, in the circumstances, unnatural from their lips. "And he cast down the pieces of silver in the temple"*—his remorse being deepened, probably, into an agony of despair by the sarcastic, diabolical reply which he had got, in place of the sympathy which he would expect, and the arrest which possibly he hoped that it would lay upon the execution—"and departed, and went and hanged himself." What a crowning testimony to the innocence of his Master, and the unsupportable baseness of his own act!

But what is to be done with the money? "It is not lawful for us (they said) to put it into the treasury, because it is the price of blood." The consciences of those holy hypocrites would have been hurt by such a disposal of it: it must be put to some pious use. So, after consultation, it is resolved to buy with it a field called the Potter's Field, to bury strangers in: thus unconsciously fulfilling a prediction five centuries old (Zech. xi. 12, 13).

Such is the story of Judas Iscariot, as given in the Gospel History. And now let us go back upon it in thought, and see what it suggests to the intelligent and earnest reader.

1. Viewing it as a whole, from first to last, what unsophisticated reader will refuse to own that it bears the marks of unvarnished truth—not only of truth in the main, but of truth in all its details? In particular, that part of the traitor's story which begins with the supper at Bethany, six days before the last Passover, carries upon its face so many small marks of truth, that we venture to affirm the most practised pen would have found it hard to invent them, and harder still to give them the consistent and harmonious setting which they have in the Evangelical History. But we have this from four independent writers—three of them, at least, all unpractised in any kind of literature, and most certainly in the literature of fiction. Also in the brief dialogue between Judas and those to whom he sold his Master, we have a touch of nature which no art was likely to think of, revealing the workings of very different natures on the same events, both of them lost to all good, but the one in a way not in the least resembling the other. "I have sinned," exclaims the one: "Who cares for that?" reply the others. "I have betrayed innocent blood," rejoins he: "That is none of our business," answer they. The innocence of the Son of God was equally disregarded, and trodden under foot by both parties; but the one, knowing and feeling it, sacrificed and sold it for filthy lucre; while the others, steeling themselves against all evidence of the claims of Jesus, and determined to have Him put to death as an impious blasphemer, gloated over their success through the treason of Judas; and, far from being staggered at his repentance and appalled at his testimony to the innocence of Jesus, they only snapped their fingers, and turned their backs upon him. One and the same deed was regarded with horror by the one party, and by the other (who were "past feeling") with a cool satisfaction from which one shrinks almost more than from the desperation which drove the traitor so quickly to "his own place." Can this be fiction? But if not, then none of it can be fiction, for the different stages of his history so hang together that they cannot be torn asunder without destroying the whole: each presupposes, and would hardly be intelligible without the other. And since the tale of Judas covers almost the whole public life of Christ, as given in the Gospel History, if you admit the truth of what relates to him you virtually acknowledge the fidelity of the whole. Thus does the Gospel History approve itself from the consistency of even its subordinate features, and the harmony of its episodes with the main story.

2. Taking the story of Judas then, as we find it in the Gospel History, to be a record of facts, the next question is, by what motive was he chiefly influenced in betraying his Master? This will seem a useless question to those who never imagined and never heard of any other motive than that which stands out on the face of the narrative—the love of money. But the impression which the condemnation of Christ produced upon the traitor, and his inability thereafter to keep the bribe and endure life any longer, have led certain expositors to conclude that there must have been more in it than covetousness; that as the condemnation seems to have taken him by surprise, he must have expected a different issue; that in all probability his object was a good one, arising out of the views current among the Apostles themselves as to the nature and nearness of their Master's coming kingdom; and in short, that, cherishing a confident expectation of a high place in it, and impatient of delays, his object was to force on a crisis, and to hasten its manifestation. In this case they conclude that Judas must have expected that the betrayal would not issue in the actual seizure of Christ,—that it would be resisted,—or, at least, that matters would not be allowed to come to extremities; and that it was the failure of all these calculations, and the certainty that his Master's death was to be the issue of his treason, that appalled and horrified Judas, and precipitated his self-destruction. To this hypothesis it is enough to reply, that as not the most distant hint of it is given in any of the Gospels, so it is totally at variance with the character there given of him. The brand put on him is so black—without one ray of favourable light to relieve it—that before we can accept this theory we must set aside all that we read of him in the Gospel History; and since it is from this only that we know anything of him, we must reject it entirely as a groundless speculation, and a speculation not of the most wholesome kind. We have admitted, indeed, one feature of this theory—that Judas's view of what he had done appears to have undergone an entire change "when he saw that Jesus was condemned." It would not, indeed, necessarily follow from this, that he confidently calculated on His not permitting matters to come to this pass. For deeds of darkness are usually done with little thought of their consequences, and even of their nature; and it only requires some event which shall make these stand out in all their nakedness to bring the perpetrators of them horribly to their senses. For aught we know, this may have been just such a case. But when we think how many miracles Judas had seen Jesus work—some of them quite as wonderful as his eluding the grasp of his captors on this occasion—when we consider how, once and again, He did actually escape the hands of those who sought to take Him, it is perfectly possible that the traitor might secretly cherish the hope that Jesus, whom He knew to be innocent, would not allow Himself to suffer the death of an impostor, and that while he himself earned the wages of iniquity, the deed might somehow or other not be done. This length we have gone; and we are inclined to think that, while quite consistent with all that the History says of Judas, it gives the most natural explanation of the horror with which the condemnation of the betrayed One seemed immediately to fill him. But there is no resemblance whatever between this supposition and the modern theory of a good intention on the part of Judas in betraying his Lord—a theory which we take the liberty of pronouncing not only baseless, but of mischievous tendency. The disposition to soften the hard features of evil, and to smooth the rough passages in the Gospel History—to represent the Lord of Glory as all mildness, the truths which He taught us all love, and the enemies of his Person and Mission as less the enemies of God and men than they are there said to be—is a disposition which, however attractive to some, is to be eschewed as inimical to faith, which will have brought into captivity every thought to the obedience of Christ.

* ἐν τῷ ναῷ—the temple proper, commonly called "the sanctuary," or "the holy place;" into which none but priests might enter,—and Judas was not a priest. How is this to be explained? It is possible that he flung the money in after them.

3. How awfully consistent with all that we otherwise know of human nature is the fatal influence of one master-passion, uncontrolled, in overthrowing sooner or later the entire character! Even this is a mark of truth in the History which should not be overlooked, and which on some reflecting minds will make a deeper impression than almost any other. But the fact has a dread importance in itself, independent of its apologetic value.

4. Critics have tried to show that the prediction which the Evangelist quotes, as fulfilled in the use made of the thirty pieces of silver, has nothing to do with the events to which it is applied. Into the validity of their criticisms we have no intention of going here. Indeed it would be out of place. But when we look at the person valued, the parties valuing him, and the sum at which he was valued, exactly thirty pieces of silver; the contemptible character of this sum, satirically expressed in the prophecy; and the use made of this sum of money to buy the Potter's Field—when we put all these things together, and then read over again the prediction, which (mean what it may) was certainly penned some centuries before the death of Christ, the conviction forces itself upon us, that the prediction and the history relate to the same events, that the Prophet, personating Messiah thus long before his birth, bids "them of the children of Israel" give Him his price if they thought good, and if not to forbear; whereupon they weigh Him for his price the exact sum agreed on between Judas and the chief priests for the sale of Jesus—thirty pieces of silver: then the Lord bids him cast this to the potter—adding, with sublime satire, "A goodly price that I was prized at of them!" whereupon he takes the thirty pieces of silver, and casts them "to the potter in the house of the Lord" (Zech. xi. 12, 13). Now each of these acts was so unessential to the main business, that they might have been quite different from what they were, without in the least affecting it. Jesus could have been identified and apprehended without being betrayed by one of his Apostles. Indeed the plan was first suggested to the authorities by Judas offering to do it for a consideration. And when agreed to, the price offered and accepted might have been more, or might have been less, than what was mutually agreed on. But so it was, that of their own accord both parties arranged that it should be done for precisely the predicted sum of thirty pieces of silver. Nor was this all. For as it would have hurt the tender consciences of those pious ecclesiastics to put the price of blood into the treasury, they resolve to put it to some charitable use; and of all the possible dispositions of it, they fix upon the purchase of the Potter's field as a burial-ground for strangers—thus realising, all unconsciously, yet to the letter, this singularly minute prediction; and he who can believe that such a prediction and the events which in point of fact fulfilled it had no pre-determined relation to each other, must have a strange faith in fortuitous coincidences.

5. In such a case as this, as compared with that of Peter, one sees that the true character of repentance is determined, neither by its sincerity, nor by its bitterness, but by the views under which it is wrought. Judas, who betrayed, and Peter who thrice denied, his Master, both repented, it should seem, with equal sincerity, and both with equal pungency, of what they had done. But while the one "went and hanged himself," the other "went out and wept bitterly." Whence this difference? The, one under a sense of his guilt, had nothing to fall back upon; and, deeming pardon for such a wretch utterly hopeless, and unable to live without it, he hastened to terminate with his own hand a life of insupportable misery. The other, having done a deed which might well have made him incapable of ever again looking his Lord in the face, nevertheless turned towards Him his guilty eyes, when lo! the eye of his wounded Lord glancing from the hall of judgment full down upon himself, with a grief and a tenderness that told their own tale, shot right into his heart, and brought from it a flood of penitential tears! In the one case we have natural principles working themselves out to deadly effect; in the other we see supernatural principles working repentance unto salvation not to be repented of. Is not this truth at once historical and moral—shining in its own light?

"COFFEE-POT SAM."

BY A VOLUNTEER MISSIONARY.

I DARE say, my reader, you have often got out of temper when, coming up Cheapside or the Strand, or any other of those crowded thoroughfares which you pass ten or twenty times a-week on your way to and from your office, you find that a large hoarding has been erected, occupying the whole of the pavement at one of the narrowest points. Your irritation, of course, is by no means relieved when you notice further that an auxiliary wooden foot-path—very narrow, very dirty, and very uncomfortable—has been laid down, over which, during the three or four ensuing months, you will every day have to puff and struggle, running the gloomy risk of losing your train, or of reaching home squeezed to the consistency of a lemon, or perhaps striped like a zebra. However, you must submit: and reflecting that your own respectable self is not exempt from the necessity of repair, as proved by many a little doctor's bill, or even by more agreeable recollections of trips taken to the sea-side or the Alps, you try to meet this necessary evil with some cheerfulness of spirit. Week after week passes on, and you do not murmur, being only too well aware that neither frown nor smile will help you a single inch. And sometimes, at the moment you are passing, the door in the hoarding may happen to be open, and you cannot help stopping, just to satisfy your curiosity as to why the work is proceeding so slowly, and what prospect there is of the street being early cleared. A strange view presents itself. The eye meets a wide area of desolation, sufficient to suggest the idea of Macaulay's New Zealander, and to excite a faint image of what he is expected to witness when looking down from London Bridge upon the ruins of London. It is a sort of wild Alpine scene, made up of stones and rubbish. There are hills and glens, and ravines and bridges, very picturesque and very dangerous looking. Large, thick beams lie scattered in wild confusion across the precipices, like sturdy oaks struck down by lightning. Two sinewy athletes, broad and muscular, and with gin-tinctured faces, make an effort to relieve the dusty parchedness of the scene by an attempt at a cascade, a pump-handle being wrought up and down with restless regularity. You gratefully hear the rush of water, and fancy yourself near Schaffhausen. At a distance, a score of other labourers, with either pick-axe or spade in hand, labour in some dark cavern, aided by the fantastic glare of a furnace, upon which a pot filled with some awful-looking liquid is boiling. Half a dozen others, on the top of one of the dust-hills, give you the idea of an avalanche, by throwing basketfuls of rubbish down an inclined plane. Clouds of dust on a sudden wrap the whole scene in a haze, like what tourists tell us they witness from the top of the Righi or of the Jungfrau. Soon, however, the evanescent veil passes away, and you are permitted to enjoy the panorama with all the riches of its manifold peculiarities.

While thus looking and dreaming, in the winking sun heat, it may be you are on a sudden awakened by a push from behind, and the cry, "Mind there!" You turn round and find your shoulder under the frothy mouth of a cart-horse, which alone was wanted to complete the picturesqueness of the scenery. But to you it is a messenger, reminding you that the Bank closes at three, and that what you have been gazing at is but rubbish. So you resume your walk, and looking at the matter in the light of reality, you cannot help feeling thankful for not having been compelled to take your place among the men of whose life you just now got a glimpse: for, despite the poetical suggestions which a minute ago visited you, you feel that no life could well be more prosaic, monotonous, and depressing than that which from dawn till dusk is spent in handling matter in its coarsest possible form, and in seeing nothing the whole day but rubbish and desolation. You think how the spirit and life in those poor people must at length be totally buried under those awful mountains of dirt and dust; and, sad as the thought is, you really cannot wonder that they go to the public-house every now and then to obtain a little exciting stimulus, and having got that, bruise each other's faces, for what they call "a bit of fun."

But you would be sadly mistaken, if you supposed that there were no exceptions to this sort of life among these men. Man's spirit cannot be altogether buried and if sometimes by rude violence it is thrust into the grave, it will rise again on the third day. It is not born of matter, and it cannot die through the power of matter either. If the man you put into the magnificently carved pulpit of some splendid cathedral has brought no true spirit with him, he certainly will not get it there, even though the building be a masterpiece of architecture, the pillars patterns of elegance, and the stained-glass windows marvels of painting. Again, if you put a man down on a heap of rubbish, pick-axe in hand, and looking for all the world like a walking pillar of lime, and if he has got an eye for the invisible things of God, and a heart to feel his all-including love, his words will be true music, and his deeds true poetry, though the dust should often choke his utterance, a worm-eaten bench be his chair, and a broken stone his table.

The truth of this was proved a few years ago by Samuel Brown, a common operative, who worked with a score of others of his class at an extensive "job" in Oxford Street. Samuel was a good fellow, not the sharpest or quickest of the band perhaps, but steady and zealous in his work, of a strong robust constitution, and "true as gold." In his speech there was something dry and curt, something extraordinarily phlegmatic, as indeed there was in the whole of his appearance. But if you had chanced to speak a couple of minutes to him, you would have discovered that he had a warm heart, and that a great deal of true good humour shone through those dullish eyes, and played through the features of that stern-looking face, beautifully softening it at times. That he was a man of character, with the courage to think for himself, and to stand out against public opinion where he deemed it wrong, could not be doubted. He was the only one of the band who never drank ale or spirits. While his comrades spent their leisure time at the public-house, Samuel took his little tin kettle from the corner where he put it every morning, with his jacket over it. In the one pocket of his jacket were two thick pieces of bread, with a slice of ham between them, and in the other a little Bible and a few tracts wrapt in a checkered handkerchief. He would boil his tea or coffee in the kettle, and taking out his big sandwich, sit down where he liked best—sure that nobody would dispute his place with him. For this his comrades nicknamed him "Coffee-pot Sam." But he felt not a straw the less happy for all that when drinking his steaming coffee, and reading a passage of the Gospel, or glancing over a newspaper.

"You are the queerest chap I ever saw in my life," said one of his comrades, who went by the name of "Rough Dick," one day, while preparing to go to the public-house, where the rest of the band had already gone. Now Rough Dick was not exactly a bad fellow, although rather boisterous and quarrelsome, owing to the gin, of which he was never wholly free. Being a strong muscular fellow, and besides a first-rate pugilist, he was generally dreaded by the gang. Samuel was then sitting on a plank, engaged in reading. "You are the queerest sort of chap I ever saw in my life," said Dick, pulling the paper roughly out of Samuel's hand. "What in all the world are you stuffing your brains with every day?"

Samuel looked up quite calmly, but made no effort to get the paper back. Dick read the heading of a tract—"Are you prepared to die?"

"Bah!" he said, flinging down the leaf. "That's only fit for old wives."

"Of course it is," said Samuel drily, "for old wives will die soon at any rate. But it is also for you and me, my lad. Death is a whimsical fellow, you know. He may pass old wives to take the like o' us first. I think it would be as well for you to take this little piece of paper back again, and read it at home, if you don't want to read it now.

"What? Me?" cried Dick, laughing loudly. "Do you want me to read that —— humbug?"

"You had better not curse it before you have read it," Samuel said in a serious tone. "It simply puts a question, as you see, which concerns you and me very closely. Or are you already prepared to die?"

"I'll tell you what I am prepared for," Dick said, imitating the movement of drinking with his hand. "I will take one this time that will make the whole of London dance before my eyes."

"And suppose death came to you at that moment," said Samuel: "I am afraid your dancing would not be of a very merry sort. Moreover, Dick," he added, in a gentle tone, "you have a wife and children to care for."

"Mind your own business," said Dick, now getting angry. "You are in want of a black eye, I think."

"Not very particularly," answered Samuel.

"You're the only fellow of the gang who has never had one from me," cried Dick loudly.

"Don't know," answered Samuel calmly, and taking up the tract which Dick had flung down.

"Well, then, I'll give you one now," said Dick, clenching his fists and taking position. "Get up, I say, and behave like a man."

"I won't fight," said Samuel, looking into the tract.

"You must," roared Dick, with a horrid oath.

Before Samuel could rise up Dick's fist had visited his left eye with such force that he felt as if it had been turned into a fiery coal. But, quick almost as lightning, he caught hold of Dick's legs, and before a second blow could be dealt, the ruffian was grovelling in the rubbish, where, of course, he had not come down gently by any means. He rose up with a groan, and looking at Samuel with an expression of amazement, he skulked off, muttering something between his teeth, which Samuel did not care either to hear or to understand.

When the work-people returned, Dick was not with them. Samuel became anxious. He was afraid Dick's tumble might have been too much for him, half drunk as he then was.

"Where's Rough Dick?" he asked of one of his comrades.

"At the public house, and snoring like a dog," was the answer; "we could not get him awake."

Dick's work was the boiling of the pitch. There was nobody now looking after it, and considerable damage was sure to ensue, which Dick would, of course, have to pay for. So Samuel went from time to time to see to it, despite his now having only one eye at his disposal.

Two hours elapsed before Dick came back. He walked up to the spot rather hurriedly, and to his astonishment found the furnace all right, and Samuel stirring the pitch.

"Here," said Samuel drily, handing him the stick; "don't be so long another time."

He was off before Dick could say a single word, but Dick felt very much as though the whole furnace had been poured upon his head.

"I'll take care not give him another black eye, at all events," he muttered to himself. Debased as he was, he now felt that there was something genuine in "Coffee-pot Sam." Ever after, Samuel had a surprising power over Rough Dick; so much so, indeed, that frequently when he was quite unmanageable, and the others scarcely dared to approach him, Samuel was called to put him to rights. On such occasions Samuel used simply to take Dick's ear between his finger and thumb, and leading him off like a lamb, put him down on a bench, saying, "Be quiet, sir; don't stir, I tell you!" And those who saw it would think: "After all there's more power in Sam's coffee-pot than in all the pewter pots in London!"

Still, to tease Samuel by playing all sorts of tricks upon him was the amusement of some, especially the younger members of the band. Kind-hearted and harmless as he was, he often gave them painful re-proofs, simply by not behaving as they behaved, and sometimes too by plainly telling them truths which they did not like to hear. One would suppose that nothing in the world could be looked upon as less harmful than to sit down and take a cup of coffee, eat a piece of bread, and glance over a page or two of print. Yet it was owing simply to this that Samuel was actually a thorn in the flesh to many of them. And no wonder. Though he spoke but little, and never preached at his companions, he was nevertheless an ever-present witness against their intemperance, filthy talk, and coarse habits. He was a living proof that it was possible to be strong without strong drink, eloquent without swearing, and cheerful without the aid of bad songs. Nor was this logic of life and action altogether lost upon those who witnessed it, as was demonstrated by the case of William Morgan, who went among the band by the name of "Jolly Bill."

One day Jolly Bill came up to Samuel, who was reading as usual.

"Coffee-pot," said he, with an ironical expression in his face, and holding up his pocket-handkerchief, in which something was evidently wrapped up, "I've something for you. Guess what it is!"

Samuel cast a curious glance at the concealed object. It looked rather bulky.

"How can I know?" he said.

"Guess!"

"Is it something to eat?"

"No, it ain't that."

"Is it a book?"

"No, nor that neither."

Samuel looked again, this time more carefully.

"It's something living," he said; "a kitten, perhaps."

"No, it isn't."

"A puppy, then?"

"Yes," said Bill, uncovering the little creature and dropping it on Samuel's knee. It was an exceedingly ugly little beast, of a dirty yellowish hue. It had a plump bull-head, scarcely a body at all, and no tail to speak of.

"Poor little thing!" said Samuel, taking the shivering animal in his hands. "What do you want me to do with it?"

"Why, don't you see?" said Bill. "Give it a training, to be sure, and you'll have a dog to lead you when you get blind."

"I don't want to be blind," said Samuel, holding the puppy against his cheek.

"I daresay not," was the reply; "but you will be blind soon, depend upon it. You'll soon have your eyes destroyed with all that reading o' yours, as my own mother did, who used to read books and tracts day and night till she got as blind as a mole."

"Is your mother blind?" said Samuel in a compassionate tone. "What's her age?"

"Fifty-two, or thereabout, I think," answered Bill, in a more serious voice. "Poor body! it's hard for her. It's now two years since she lost the sight of her right eye, and six months later her left eye was useless too."

"Did you see the doctor about it!"

"Of course we did. She was a month in the hospital; but it was no use."

"That's very sad. Is she living with you?"

"Yes, in course. She's my housekeeper, you know."

"So you are unmarried?"

"I am."

"Then is she quite alone in the house while you are at work?"

"Of course she is; but she manages things wonderfully well. You could hardly believe it, if you saw her cutting bread and making tea, or dusting the room. You would scarcely take her for a blind person if you did not know it. Of course she can't cook very well, nor can she walk out to the shops; but she often gets her dinner with a neighbour. They all pity her, and are fond of her, and there's always a girl about willing to run an errand for her."

"She must feel lonely," said Samuel. "And then it's always a dangerous thing to leave a blind person alone in a house. Could you not get a little girl to help her?"

"Can't afford it," said Bill gravely, shaking his head and contracting his brow.

"Why, you earn as much as I do," said Samuel; "and I support a wife and six children."

Bill was silent.

"Billy, Billy!" said Samuel, lifting up his forefinger, "you could afford to give her two servants if you only left the public-house alone."

"All very well for you, who have a wife and family," said Bill doggedly; "but where am I to go in the evenings? You can't expect me to sit down with a blind person the whole night after a hard day's labour."

"Why not?" asked Samuel. "Couldn't you read something to her? You said she was fond o' readin', and—she's your mother."

"Pshaw! you want me to get blind too, do you? That's too bad. One blind person's enough in a family, I should think. Besides, when I take up a book, I dose before I read ten words."

"Of course you do," said Samuel, in a soft, but serious tone; "of course you do, after having been drinking ale all the day."

"You're a —— coffee-pot," answered Bill, striding off. Having walked a few yards, he stopped, and, turning round, cried: "I say, Coffee, mind the dog. You'll want it soon."

Samuel took the puppy home. Upon entering his room, he found his wife and children as usual waiting him for supper. A fine girl of fourteen, a boy of twelve, and two girls of eight and six, were sitting round the table, while two little boys were already in bed.

"There's father!" was the unanimous expression. "Now, mother, now for the dumplings!"

Samuel gave his wife a kiss.

"Stop a minute," he said, "I have brought you a guest."

He put the puppy on the table, and the whole party broke into laughter when they saw the queer little animal sprawling about.

"What an ugly little thing," cried Jane, the eldest girl, spreading out both her hands.

"Ha, ha!" laughed Fred; "it's lost its tail: how funny."

At this juncture little Mary got frightened, and began crying.

"Don't cry," Samuel said, taking her up kindly on his knee, "it won't do you any harm. It is a nice little creature."

Thereupon he put the puppy before her, and soon prevailed upon her to stroke it gently with her little hand.

"But where did you get it, dear?" asked his wife, meanwhile putting down the dish with the dumplings.

Samuel told his story.

"And now," he said to Jane, "I'll entrust the puppy to you. It is not a pretty thing, but it belongs to a very sagacious and docile race: you can teach it almost anything. Try and train it well, make it tidy and obedient, and when you have done that I'll tell you what to do then."

The very next evening Samuel, on taking up his jacket and little kettle to go home, found himself in an awkward predicament. The sleeves of his jacket were sewn up from the very shoulders to the cuffs; so also were the pockets. Fortunately he had a knife, but as it was dark, and every caution had to be taken not to cut the material, it took him fully half an hour before he could put the jacket on. This caused considerable disappointment and concern to his family, and his good wife was only too happy to find that a trick, and no accident, was the cause of his delay, and that the shot had this time been aimed at his jacket sleeves, and not his eyes. Jane took her mother's scissors, and cut up the pockets. The little Bible and the tracts were gone, and in their stead Jane pulled out of one pocket a mass of pebbles, potato skins, and old corks, and from the other a bundle of printed papers. John at once took some of the papers, and began reading aloud:—

"'The merry life of Jolly Johnnie, a new song to be sung by all the jolly Johnnies——'"

"Give those papers to me," said Samuel, before John could look at another.

John obeyed, though reluctantly. He was curious to know the contents of the other papers. They seemed to him so funny!

Samuel examined the bundle minutely. The papers were all of the same stamp. Among them was a bit of a shoemaker's bill, upon which was written the name of William Morgan.

"I thought Bill was at the bottom of it," said Samuel to himself. "I shall not read his papers, but I hope he will yet read mine."

The next morning he found his little Bible and the tracts safe in his own corner. Samuel met Bill several times that day, Bill casting waggish looks at him, Samuel taking no notice of what had been done.

"Jane," he said to his daughter that evening, "put on your bonnet. We'll call on Bill's blind mother."

They entered a dark room.

"Who's there?" inquired a female voice.

"Are you Mrs. Morgan?" asked Samuel.

"That's my name, sir."

"Is your son in?"

"He is not, sir."

"Will he be long?"

"Can't tell. It may be midnight or later; not much earlier, at any rate. Could you not tell me what you want?"

"Well, yes. My name is Samuel Brown. Bill and I work together in Oxford Street. I've got a parcel which belongs to him."

"One minute, please, and I'll light a candle. I'm blind, you know."

A stirring was heard in the corner, and soon the sound of a press opening, then the scratch of a lucifer match over a rough object. A tall figure became faintly visible. She was trying to light a candle which she held in her left hand. Samuel stepped forward, but before he could give her any assistance, the candle burned brightly. It was wonderful to see how cleverly the blind creature managed it all, and how cautiously she threw the match into the fire-place. Still Samuel could not help seeing that it was very dangerous for her to be so lonely.

The little room had evidently seen better days, but now bore signs of poverty and neglect. It was not very dirty, it is true; but the cobwebs hanging from the ceiling and down the walls at several spots, showed clearly it was kept in order more by the touch than by the sight.

Having seated themselves at the good woman's request, Samuel expressed his compassion for her in her sore affliction. Mrs. Morgan then told him very simply her whole story. Expressions occurred in the course of her narrative proving that she was no stranger to the Gospel.

"What Bill told you about reading being the cause of my blindness is all nonsense," she said. "Much to my grief he got into the habit of coming home very late, often after midnight, and as I never could go to bed before he was safe home, I often passed the long hours in reading; and of course he used to find me doing so when he came home. But the loss of my eyes was owing to erysipelas, as I have told you; I am thankful I was able to read so much, as it is a source of great comfort to me in these dreary, lonely days."

"What a blessing that the eyes of your mind were opened before those of your body were shut!" Samuel observed. "If you cannot see men on earth, you can at least see One seated in Heaven."

At these words the good woman's face brightened all over with joy.

"Ay, sir, that's it," she said; "I shall not be blind for ever. He who in his good mercy opened the eyes of my soul, will also one day give me new eyes to behold his glory in heaven.

"Just so," said Samuel; "some have eyes, and yet are blind; and others have no eyes, and yet see. Blind Bartimeus could see the Son of David, whom the sharp Pharisees saw not. The man who was blind from his birth, and whose vision the Lord restored by anointing his eyes with the clay spittle, obtained the outward eyesight because his inner eye was clear."

"Oh, I often, often think of that!" said the woman. "I asked Bill to read it to me, but he never did it."

"Well, perhaps you will let me read it to you," said Samuel: "or maybe Jane, my daughter, will read it for us. Now, Jane," he added, handing her his little Bible, "read as clearly and distinctly as you can."

Jane turned up the 9th of John, and read it. No minister could have done so better or more touchingly. She knew it by heart.

"Delightful! What a treat!" cried the blind woman; "How nicely she reads!"

"She might have done even better than that," said Samuel: "but she is a little shy, you know. If you would like to hear her read, and if you can understand her, she might often come and read a chapter to you. We don't live far from this—only about five minutes' walk; and I will sometimes come myself and see you as well."

Mrs. Morgan could scarcely find words to express her thanks. Samuel now gently led her on to speak of her present experiences and her hopes; and then took his leave.

It was beyond midnight before Bill came home. His mother gave him the parcel, and told all about the pleasant visit from Samuel.

"Ah, Coffee-pot!" he exclaimed in astonishment.

"Coffee!" said his mother. "You know, Bill, I have no coffee for you now—it is so very late!"

"Well, never mind," he muttered; and away he went to bed, very likely to sleep off the effects of gin.

It soon became a nice change to Jane to spend a couple of hours twice a week with Mrs. Morgan, reading to her and helping her. Sometimes, too, Samuel would go and have a chat with the blind old woman. And it would be wrong not to tell that one morning Jane entered Mrs. Morgan's room fully prepared to wage war with the cobwebs on the roof and on the walls; and that in the evening of the same day her father brought long steps and a brush, and a pot full of paste, and put all the paper right upon the worn walls.

"Will you be at our house to-night?" Bill asked of Samuel one day.

"Yes, I think I will," was the reply.

Samuel, rather to his surprise, found Bill at home that evening. An interesting conversation took place between Samuel and the poor mother, to which Bill listened with marked attention. Though he scarce ventured a word himself, yet he seemed interested in it. Jane also read, and he noticed the intense pleasure it gave his mother. When Samuel and Jane left, he observed that they were good people indeed, and that he had spent a very pleasant evening. As it was already half-past nine, he said he would not go out of doors again that night. So, after having taken a little bit of supper, and quietly smoked a pipe, he went to bed. This was the first time for many, many months that blind Mrs. Morgan had locked the door at such an early hour.

The two following evenings Bill was late as usual. Habit was strong; and the door of the public-house, like the drunken mouths it admitted, were constantly open; but on the third night Jane was there, and read to his mother, and he was present again. The next evening he thought he had better go home at once, and not wander to The Fountain, where he was not wanted at all. The reflection that his poor mother was quite alone strengthened the good resolve. And though he was not a great scholar, and could not read so well as little Jane, yet he would try. He now felt ashamed that other people had come into his house to do what he saw he ought to have done himself. Mrs. Morgan for a time thought she was dreaming, when soon after dusk Bill regularly came home, and after having taken his supper, took the Bible, and said: "Now, mother, if you have no objection I will read a chapter to you." But the good woman, to her unspeakable joy, soon found that she was not dreaming, though things were changed for the better in such a manner as she had hardly hoped, or even dreamt.

The purse is a good metronome: it tells pretty correctly how time is measured or divided by a working man, or indeed any man. Bill soon experienced a change in his purse, too. He found that he could easily afford to pay a girl a shilling a week and her meals to make things comfortable at home. He spoke about this to Samuel. After some talk, during which they had wandered away a little from the theme they started with, Morgan at length relieved himself by saying that he knew no better girl than Jane. Samuel understood him: and as he could not fancy a better mistress for Jane than Mrs. Morgan would be, the thing was soon settled.

On an early evening Samuel and his wife accompanied Jane to Mrs. Morgan's, to introduce her to her new situation. Bill and his mother were already waiting them, with coffee and cake on the table. The guests having been seated, Bill, who was sharp in his own way, noticed that Jane had brought something under her cloak.

"What have you got there?" he asked.

"Guess," said Jane, smiling.

"How can I know?" he replied. "Perhaps a pair of shoes?"

"No, it isn't that," she said, with a waggish shake of the head.

"A book?"

"No," she replied, trying this time to look grave.

"A doll, then?"

"A doll!" Jane repeated, in a tone of affected displeasure.

Just at this moment a sound from under Jane's cloak solved the problem.

"What! a dog?" cried Bill.

Out jumped poor puppy, as ugly as ever, it is true, but now grown much larger. Exceedingly kind and cheerful, he sprang up on everybody, and licked everybody's hands. The party was delighted.

Mrs. Morgan begged they would let her touch the little creature. And so she took puppy on her knee, and stroked it kindly all over, while it, by way of grateful return, licked the old wrinkled face, which did not by any means lack expression.

"Just so," said Samuel; "that's exactly what you brought it for, is it not, Jane? Bill gave it to me six months ago to get trained for a blind person. It hasn't completed its education yet; but Jane will carefully finish it off here, I daresay."

Bill looked a little grave; and, after a pause, he said—

"Mother, didn't we read the other day words like these: 'Ye thought evil against me, but God meant it unto you for good'?"

"Ay, lad; it was in the story of Joseph."

"I've been thinking about these words of late," said Bill.

Very probably something glistened in Bill's eyes as he said this, but nobody chanced to notice it, and a minute after he turned round to pat puppy, which was quietly lying in his mother's lap.

Henceforward Bill was Samuel's staunch friend. He very soon lost the epithet of "Jolly" which had been attached to him; and he also cast off the ill habit of which it was the sign, as the serpent casts its encumbering skin. His behaviour, now proper and temperate, made the epithet, of course, quite unsuitable any longer. Nor had Samuel few friends among the band. Such manifestations of his noble character as Rough Dick and Bill had witnessed, did not fail to gain the esteem and kind feeling of those rough fellows, who will yield to the logic of a kind act when nothing else will impress them. Indeed, there were few who did not like "Sam."

Evidence of this was conclusively shown one day, when a worthless lad, who went by the name of "Red Bob," tried to indulge his propensity for low malicious jokes at the expense of "Coffee-pot Sam." Bob killed a mouse; and, stealing to the corner where Samuel's jacket lay, took out the customary sandwich, and put the dead animal between the slices of bread. No sooner, however, had he done this, than a very rough fellow, "Pickled Jam," who had noticed his doings, came up, seized him by the collar, and boxed his ears most unmercifully. The lad's screams brought half a dozen of the work-people to the spot. When "Jam" told them what "Red Bob" had done, and showed them the dead mouse in Samuel's sandwich, they with one consent pounced upon Bob, and actually kicked him off the works. The case was soon known to the whole band, and there was not one who did not say: "Well done, Jammie, you served him right. We'll take care he shan't come back again."

Now Bob was a nephew of the overseer, to whom he told his own version of what had happened, and asked him to go along with him to the work, as he had not the courage to return alone. But, notwithstanding all this, and the natural wish to try to stand well with the overseer, no sooner had uncle and nephew made their appearance, than "Rough Dick," who happened to be nearest the entrance, ran up to his companions to tell them who were coming. The whole band moved together to meet the overseer and the lad.

"Beg your pardon, sir," said Dick, "but that lad can't be admitted."

"Who are you?" said the overseer, imperiously. "Are you the master of this place, pray?"

"No, sir!" cried several voices; "but Bob must go."

"And I say he shall not!" cried the overseer in return. I see this is just a riot got up among you."

"Very well, then I shall go," answered Dick, throwing down his spade.

"And I! And I!" cried several voices.

Samuel here stepped forward to speak a word in favour of the boy, but Dick pushed him back.

"Don't speak a word," he said; "you have nothing to say here. Sir," he continued, addressing the overseer "would you like to eat a dead mouse? Had Bob done what he did to myself, I should merely have given him a box on the ear, and done with him; but he did it to 'Coffee-pot,' and——"

"Hip, hip, hurrah!" cried the band simultaneously, and in a moment Samuel was lifted up off the ground and placed upon the shoulders of two of them.

"Ay, sir, what d'ye say to that?" said Dick, pointing to Samuel, who in vain struggled to get down.

The overseer could not help laughing heartily.

"All right, lads," he said; "it's of no use fighting against such a king as yours!"

And off he walked with his nephew.

When they were outside the gate, he said, "Bob, I see you have offended the king of the place. I never knew till now there was such power in 'Coffee-pot Sam.'"

PRAISE GOD UPON THE EARTH!

"Great and marvellous are thy works."

Praise God! Upon the earth
His praise is sounding;
On every ocean shore
Voices of many waters are resounding
His praise for evermore.

Praise God upon the earth!
To Him untrodden, snow-clad, star-crowned mountains
Lift up their altars hoar,
To Him, from far off undiscovered fountains
Unsullied rivers pour.

Praise God upon the earth!
Him in dense forests, yet unpenetrated,
The great trees bow before;
To Him unhunted herds look up unsated,
And savage creatures roar.
Praise God upon the earth!

In the dread repose
Of the silent snows,
In the upper zone,
Whose paths are known
To the stars alone,

Drawn by J. Wolf. Engraved by Swain.

"GREAT AND MARVELLOUS ARE THY WORKS."

The mountain has lost its voice—lies mute
Praising God at his white throne's foot.

From its snow-fed source,
On its glorious course
The river is streaming;
Gushing and gleaming,
Gathering and growing,
Flashing and flowing,
Forest-fringed, miles on miles,
Studded with isles on isles,
Dashing down thund'rous,
Rainbow'd and wond'rous,
Over the mighty rocks
Leaping with lightning shocks,
With a great rushing voice
Crying aloud, "Rejoice!"
And through the valleys of virginal sod,
Through plains unpeopled, awaiting new nations,
Unseen, unsullied by man's habitations,
One great drink-offering pouring to God.

In the cool, green shade,
By the branches made,
In the noontide heat,
The strong and the fleet
At the waters meet:
The reeds are shaken,
They crash and quiver;
The beast has taken
A plunge in his river:
The herd is rushing,
With snort and pant,
Trampling and crushing
The herb and plant.
Mild-eyed and bearing meek heads aloft,
Where the trumpet-blossoms hang thick and soft,
Great gentle creatures start in their fear,
While quick bright eyes from the branches peer.

Praise God upon the earth!
Above the mountains
The High and Lofty One,
The source of good beyond the hidden fountains
From whence the rivers run.

Praise God upon the earth!
The bounteous Bringer
Of life to all that lives:
Praise God upon the earth,
O man, the singer,
To whom the whole He gives.

STRAIGHTWAY.

There are many beginnings in this world which stand alone, or which shine out in mocking contrast with all that comes after. Many a rosy morning becomes a cloudy noon, precursor of a stormy night! Many a blossom is nipped by frost! Many a green-leaved tree withers! Many a man who starts in life well, swerves and wavers as he goes on. In civil society, in mercantile life, one often hears the question, "How is he standing?" "How is he doing?" The divine life in the soul has, humanly speaking, the same uncertainties about it. You cannot predicate absolute safety of a beginner. God can do so, who knoweth all, but we cannot. However bright and clear the spiritual change may be, however favourable the conditions and auspices, we cannot say in any one case, "Here is everlasting salvation achieved." We must wait for the proving, the growing, the fruits, the "patient continuance in well-doing," the "endurance unto the end."

Therefore, some men are apt to say, "No matter how men begin, if only they do. If clearly, like the mountain spring which gushes into life, well; if uncertainly and invisibly, like the waters which come trickling from a mossy soil,—still, it is well. It will be the same with both in a little while. It will certainly be the same in the end." Not so. No doubt there are some elements of life common to all beginnings which are true, and there is a common glorious ending in "the everlasting kingdom." But also, there are differences at the outset which continue to make differences all through the progress, and which will leave shades of difference still, through eternal days. It is well to turn into the way of life, however haltingly; but surely it is better, if that may be, to have the saliency of life from the first. I plead in this paper for clear, bright beginnings, as far as they can be had; for promptitude and instancy in the action, corresponding with the inward feeling. There is a certain force in the spiritual, as in every other kind of life which makes itself known by impulse and pressure. Let such impulse and pressure have "free course." Restrain the restraining hand. Turn it to other uses. Lift away the hindrance. Open the door of circumstance. Grasp the handle of opportunity. Be ready for every good work—"Straightway."

When the fiery destruction was about to descend on the doomed cities of olden time, it was no uncertain note of warning that fell upon the ear of Lot—no step of wavering hesitancy sufficed for the emergency. "Up, get you out of this place. Escape for thy life, look not behind thee, neither stay thou in all the plain. Escape to the mountains, lest thou be consumed."

When the last day of the long Egyptian bondage had closed over Israel, and family by family they were gathered to their homes to partake of that mysterious supper—"Thus shall ye eat it, with your loins girded, your shoes on your feet, and your staff in your hand"—ready for the march to freedom—for instant departure, now that God's time has come.

Simon and Andrew "straightway left their nets

and followed Jesus." James and John, the sons of Zebedee, "immediately left the ship and their father, and followed him." Matthew, sitting at the receipt of custom, heard but two words from the Master, "Follow me." "And he arose and followed him." "Zaccheus made haste and came down, and received Him joyfully." Our Lord refused to accept the allegiance of him who said, "Suffer me first to go and bury my father;" of him who pleaded, "first to go bid them farewell, who are at home in my house." When Paul and Silas spake to the Philippian jailor "the word of the Lord, and to all that were in his house," "he took them, the same hour of the night, and washed their stripes, and was baptized, he and all his, straightway."

A more notable instance still of the promptitude we are commending, occurs at the grand turning point in the life of Saul of Tarsus, when "straightway he preached Christ in the synagogue of Damascus that he is the Son of God." "What wilt thou have me to do?" had been his anxious question, a few days before, when he was arrested on the way. "Do this," is the answer, not audibly spoken indeed, but elicited with authority from his renewed consciousness, "Preach. Preach me. You know me now—who I am, what I have been to you;—as earnestly as you have hitherto persecuted, you must now preach."—"And straightway he preached Christ."

"Well, but what else could he do in the circumstances? It seems the most natural thing in the world that he should have done just what he did." So, great things always seem the most natural after they are done. And a noble career the easiest. It is the easiest when men have the heart to it, when they take "straightway" out of the conscience and put it into the life. But it is evident that Paul, at this juncture, had the usual struggle between promptitude and caution, between saliency and reservation; for, in giving the history of the matter, long after, he is careful to put emphasis on the immediacy of his action—"when it pleased God, who separated me from my mother's womb, and called me by his grace, to reveal his Son in me that I might preach him among the heathen, immediately I conferred not with flesh and blood." That is what he might have done. He might have "conferred with flesh and blood," he might have taken advice from friends, from fellow-Christians, from those who were Apostles before him—Peter, James, John, at Jerusalem. If he had so "conferred" it is quite certain that his whole course would have been different. Some would have said, "Stay awhile—keep in quietness until the memory of your career as a persecutor has somewhat died away." Others, "Be cautious. Do not commit yourself so early. You may repent it in a while, if you do; your present convictions may be only transient; what seems a deep life-purpose may be no more than a momentary impulse. It can do no harm to wait." Suppose he had sent or gone to Jerusalem to consult with the Apostles—what would Peter have said? We know that about this time he said to the Master, "Not so, Lord." He would have been quite as ready to say, "Not so," to the servant. Not Peter alone, but all the Apostles, would have said "Come up hither, and wait on us awhile. Let your Apostleship be proved. Let your faith be stronger. Do not preach yet, and especially not away in Damascus; wait to see the effect of our preaching here in Jerusalem." In short, there is not the least likelihood that a consultation with flesh and blood would have put into Paul's history that one word which stands so conspicuously at the beginning of it, "Immediately!" But it was all-important that that word should be there—representative of the promptitude which it expresses. That promptitude saved him from many difficulties, which else would have beset his course. It raised his conversion above suspicion. It confirmed his faith. It enlarged his knowledge. It opened his way. It gave him an advantage against any who might be his enemies. It put him in possession of the ground. It made retreat more difficult. It made him a fit and profitable example for all who are beginning the Christian course, to the end of time.

That word "straightway" will be needed, will be applicable as long as there are beginnings in the Christian life; I commend it to all who are beginning, to all who have just begun. The first sign of a rectified conviction is the prayer "what wilt thou have me to do?" The next sign is to do it "straightway."

The thing to be done will of course be very different in different cases. Comparatively few are required to devote their lives to the preaching of the Gospel; but every one who receives it must live according to its laws, must breathe its spirit, and must seek its extension in every possible way. In a sense, there is to every one a preaching of the Gospel when it is received—something to be done, which is as much, in relation to the past life and present circumstances of that individual, as preaching Christ in the synagogues of Damascus was, in relation to the character and career of Saul of Tarsus. Nothing less than preaching would have done for him—open, fearless, earnest preaching of Christ. Why? Because he had been open, and fearless, and earnest in preaching and striving against Christ. He felt that he must undo and unsay all that, in so far as he could, and that it could only be undone and unsaid by as much openness and publicity on the right side as formerly he had shown on the wrong. Anyone now, speaking against Christ, writing against the Christian cause, on coming to a better mind, would require to do just as the Apostle did—to stand out and say, "I am for Christ now;" or to write and say, "I am for the Christian cause amongst men;" and to do this "immediately."

There are some who seem to hold another view; who favour rather the doctrine of reserve in regard to religious feeling and conviction. It is thought to be right that a man—even a man who assumes the position of a literary teacher, who is accustomed to think and to express his thoughts—that such a man should keep comparative silence through his whole life on the question of personal religion. He may have reverence and godly fear, and the love of Christ, and the faith of his Gospel, and never at all give full and frank expression to them. The theory is, that these things ought to be felt more than expressed. That is not the theory of the Bible. "We believe, and therefore speak." "We cannot but speak the things which we have seen and heard." "That which we have seen and heard declare we unto you." "I said I will not make mention of Him, nor speak any more in his name; but—his word was as a fire shut up in my bones, and I was weary with forbearing, and I could not stay." "Ye shall be witnesses," not silent witnesses surely, "unto me, both in Jerusalem, and in all Judea, and in Samaria, and unto the uttermost part of the earth." Such was the original law. Is it changed? When? How? Why? Why is religion to be a thing of reserve? Why are the men who can speak best to speak least? Why are the men who are always writing never to write the thing they consider truest (supposing them to be Christians); never to speak out the things that are holier, dearer, more important than all other things in their esteem? There is no reason. Because some others say too much, must they say too little? Does one extreme not only breed but justify another? Because thoughtless people sometimes talk not wisely and not well on religion, must thoughtful people seal their tongues in silence, and keep all dark till the day of death? Let there be no expression of what is not believed, and not felt. But, oh! if the scales have fallen! if the light has come! if the spiritual baptism has filled, and purified, and freshened the soul; if there is an open path heavenward, and if hope travels along that path with joy, surely there ought not to be a life-long silence, or even a habit of stopping suddenly in the expression of religious truth or emotion. A far nobler habit is that of which we have the example in those who "straightway" preached, wrought, went on their way.

Now, if that be the right principle, then it is applicable all down the scale; not to great men only, but to every man. Each one ought, in his own measure and in his own way, to do the like. For a quiet man to speak in conversation, is as much as for a public man to write. To one man a prayer in a house would be more than, to another, a sermon in a pulpit. Or a change of habit and life might be, with some, the most expressive thing they could say or do. Every one who reflects, must see that the question of measure, degree, the question as to the form which the duty of the new state shall take, is a question which one can never settle for another. But the principle is this, that there is to every one something to be done—by book or speech, by action or habit something to be done for Christ as soon as you believe in Him, and that that something ought to be done promptly and without delay."

"Straightway!" do what thy hand findeth to do! It may be less or more. It may be in public or private. It may be a thing or a course that will be commented on, or passed over in silence by others. No matter! when the light comes it is to be followed. When the sense of duty is produced, it is as sacred to the soul as the Bible itself—the sense of duty is the Bible of the soul! it is produced only to be obeyed.

"Straightway!" and your new consciousness will become brighter and clearer than it ever will do by abstinence and repression. Doubts gather over the inactive mind, over the slumbering reluctant will, as mists and exhalations above the stagnant pool. Work in spite of them, work through them on to duty, and they are gone, or only hang about the mind, thin and luminous, like vapours that are vanishing away.

"Straightway!" and the outer difficulties, which gather like the inner doubts, will, like them, be dispersed and you will see them no more; or, better still, seeing them, you will not fear nor regard them. He who begins on the yielding system is very likely, ere long, to give up the whole; strife for these outward difficulties that hinder the soul's first alacrity, will hinder it more and more. There are some animals which will not molest you if you face them, but they will follow you if you flee. One might almost suppose that these providential difficulties that beset beginners especially, have a kind of brute instinct in them, to attack the fearful and the wavering; while just as certainly they will dissolve and flee before the face of alacrity and determination. Be driven with the wind and tossed, like the helpless wave, and the wind will drive and toss you—the four winds will make you their sport. But trim your sails for progress, and hold on your course, by chart and compass, and the winds will blow to help you, and the tides will roll you on to the haven where you would be.

"Straightway!" and you will be giving to your soul one of the first and one of the most indispensable of all the conditions of growth. Children would not grow if they were laid all day on couches—they would sicken and die. A man might be born, organically, a Samson, but if he never used his muscles, if he never "went out and shook himself," any Delilah could bind him, any Philistine could lead him away. Work and grow. Struggle and grow strong. "But Saul increased the more in strength."

"Straightway!" and you will have laid the first stones in the great edifice of habit. We are, in a large measure, the creatures of habit. Does that make us less noble? Would it be better if we were all impulse and emotion? Not so well. It is no small part of our greatness that we can build our life into strength as well as beauty by the stones of habit. Every year may be a pillar; every day for even every duty, may be a stone of the living house. A man may thus build up what he himself cannot easily destroy. He may build himself up into safety. He may build himself up to heaven. This is the true tower with the heaven-reaching top, the tower of a man's own life, and on the very first stones of that tower that are laid, you see written, "Immediately."

"Straightway!" and you will have ended no small part of the lesser misery of life. For indeed, not a little of that misery is the result of duty undone. A word unspoken, an action postponed, a visit unmade, a letter unwritten, a sacrifice declined,—how do such things as these shadow our days sometimes! How do they drink up our joys, or hinder them from ever flowing! We never can have a viewpoint pretty clear, even for a day: there is always something to observe, something to make us thankful—with the thankfulness in her own bosom. But "straightway" will make that misery as little as it well can be. It will put a man in the way of clear, good, happy living. It will fill him, as much as anything else can, with the "joy of the Lord," which is his strength.

"Straightway" and the enemies of our souls—of the gospel of Christ—are taken at advantage, are discomfited, are driven back. All their names are false, all their plans are broken, all their perplexities of evil are set at nought, by the very simple yet sublime plan of going right in without delay to duty and endeavour. Try it to be wise that they in worldly wisdom, more prudent, more cunning—you all know the answer—you will find the Lord before the Philistines or the Syrians, when she had forsaken God. But be simple, true, quick in the duty of the time, and they fall back and away from before you, as though you rode in the chariot of the clouds, with wheels of whirlwind, and axletree of flame.

"Straightway" and gladness, thankfulness, the blessedness of the believing heart, as it were a new inspiration. Spiritual strength to live and grow from day to day. The knowledge of a God to delight in, a Saviour to love, a Spirit to help, a work to accomplish, a life to live—changing our souls with the celestial fire—until they, too, glow and burn with love to Christ. We shall never know how much of spiritual power passes thus from one to another. Sometimes simple presence in a place will communicate the strength that is needed—sometimes in this way, even the strong in Christ Jesus in their hours of weakness, receive strength from the simplest and weakest upon their thoughts. Long after one, after many years of separation, will know the glory to God, a deep presence, and many of the Christian lives, looking for the eternal home, and as most else. The regulation of the true relationship

I have seen strong men vanquished willingly by the simplest thus. I have seen wise men led by one who, in comparison to themselves, was a little child. I have seen old men looking up with wonder and thankfulness to the young face, yes, and even [illegible] men "almost persuaded to be Christians." But again we say, you do not need to preach in order to possess [illegible] reach, but to bring those who may have serious thoughts to decide for Christ. In both respects the promoters of these meetings believe that they have been useful, although there may have been not a few cases in which the appearance of emotion for the moment has not been followed by a good and holy life.

Industrial Exhibitions of various kinds—at Birmingham, Wakefield, and Reading—have given some of our public men an opportunity of dwelling on the state of the labouring classes, and the desirableness of welding together the various sections of society in brotherly and Christian sympathy. Lord Lyttelton, in opening the Industrial Exhibition at Birmingham; Lord Houghton, on a similar occasion at Wakefield; and the Bishop of Oxford, in opening an exhibition at Reading, have all more or less directly spoken on this subject. The hopeful tone of all these eminent men, in their anticipations of the future, is striking, and no doubt there are individual instances that seem to justify the belief which most of them express, that much progress has been made in the direction indicated; but those who are most familiar with the state of feeling in the great centres of British industry, are unable to speak in quite so confident a tone. The chief benefit of these Exhibitions seems to be, that by giving to those who show their work in them a special object of interest, apart from their ordinary daily toil, they serve to relieve that terrible monotony of labour which tends to crush all elasticity of body and mind and to excite the craving for sensual excitement. Their influence may not be very great in elevating the vast mass of people whose condition demands improvement, but in union with other agencies of a more powerful kind, they may be productive of a modicum of good.

Considerable attention has been directed to an article written by Lord Amberley, in a recent number of the Fortnightly Review, on the relation of the two great political parties, the Liberals and the Conservatives, to the Church of England. The importance attached to this paper may be due as much to its being the production of the son of Lord Russell, as to its contents. The writer is very severe against those who support the Church on any other ground than as a means of good, not merely to its own members, but to the country at large. The paper is a pleading for religious liberty, as Lord Amberley conceives it should be. His own sympathies in theology are seen to be with the most extreme section of the Broad Church; beauty of character seems his chief standard of truth; and where this is to be found, the rejection of what are commonly regarded as the most vital doctrines of the Bible is simply "outgrowing the limits of orthodox theology."

The case of Bishop Colenso is entering on a new phase. The last portion of his book has fallen dead-born, proving that it was not so much the intrinsic ability of the arguments, as the novelty of the writer's position, that drew attention to the earlier volumes. He himself is now on his way to Natal, where the clergy and laity have been holding meetings to consider what course they are to follow. While much perplexed as to the steps they should take in endeavouring to procure another Bishop, and as to the relation in which such a step would place them to the Church of England, they seem to be nearly of one mind in declining the authority of Dr. Colenso. Meetings have been held in the principal towns of the Colony, but so far as we have observed, no voice has been raised in favour of the Bishop.

The progress of the truth in the kingdom of Italy continues to be indicated by the bitter opposition of the priests and their friends to the agents of the evangelical movement. Any open or serious infringement of religious liberty is not of course allowed by law; but this does not prevent the friends of the Gospel from being lampooned in clerical journals; or meetings for worship being disturbed by interruptions; or shopkeepers, who do not shut their shops while a procession is passing, from being maltreated; or colporteurs from having portions of their stock burned before their eyes. The dispute, whether there ought to be a reconciliation between the Italian court and the Roman see, goes on with vigour. The propriety of allowing processions out of church is also a subject of keen discussion. Suspicions are entertained in some quarters that the King of Italy himself is secretly more in favour of reconciliation with Rome than the friends of his country desire. The life he has led, it is whispered, makes him feel uneasy, —leads him to resort to the daily services of religion, and to feel that only the blessings of the Pope can make the head easy that wears the crown. If the rumour has any truth that ascribes to him this state of mind, it bodes as little good to the country generally as to the monarch in particular. He seems to be in that very crisis in which a bright revelation of Christian truth would effect a revolution in his own mind, and lead, perhaps, to the most vital changes in the country.

The China Mail of July 6th has brought intelligence of the death of a devoted lady, at the age of thirty-six, Miss Harriet Baxter, who some years ago determined to dedicate her life to missionary labour among the Chinese. Enjoying the comforts of a superior social position, she resolved to forsake all for the sake of the perishing heathen, and solely at her own expense she proceeded to Hong Kong, where she laboured with great zeal and assiduity for five years. On her way to China, she was shipwrecked in Galle Harbour, losing nearly all her personal effects, including a number of valuable presents that had been given her by her friends. This she regarded as a salutary discipline, calling on her to give herself with more simplicity and thoroughness to the work of the Lord. On setting to work in China, she found that the establishment of schools was the most feasible way of promoting her object, and besides a boys' and a girls' school, she established what seems to have been a sort of ragged school for the poorer class of Chinese girls. Many of the pupils were clothed and fed, besides being taught. The funds for this purpose were provided by herself and her friends; but recently the last-named school, where nearly everything had to be provided for the pupils, was handed over to the Church Missionary Society. Her labours among the wives of the English soldiers were most benevolent and unwearied. Besides this, adds the China Mail, "she might often have been seen in the houses of the Chinese in some of the worst parts of Victoria, speaking, in the strange tongue of our Chinese neighbours, of some of the sublime doctrines and holy precepts of the Christian religion, with an earnestness that would only be felt where the heart is concerned." Her health beginning to fail, her friends urged her to return home, but she could not make up her mind to leave, and died at her post.

Writing from Pekin, under date 31st March last, the Rev. Joseph Edkins gives an interesting instance of an application, on the part of natives, for Christian instruction. A countryman living at a town 150 miles distant (Tang-feng-tsun) had come and stated that more than a hundred persons in that neighbourhood were desirous of Christian instruction. They had read the books given away at the Church Mission at Pekin. A schoolmaster was sent to ascertain how matters stood, who returned with the information that he had met with eight persons who might be relied on as sincerely desiring instruction, one of whom accompanied him. They earnestly desired a missionary to go among them, and the matter had been laid before the Rev. W. C. Burns, in the hope that he might be induced to go and instruct them in Christian truth.

Mr. Consul Pakenham, of Madagascar, has published a report to Government, in the course of which he gives a favourable view of the state of the native Christians in the capital of the island. Five thousand profess Christianity in Antananarivo, of whom the greater portion are Protestants ; and should the present Hova Government continue tolerant, there is every prospect of Christianity spreading. Education is making progress among all classes. Besides a large school opened by the Queen for the instruction of the officers of her household, and confided to a native teacher, there are at the capital seven schools belonging to the English Protestant, and three to the French Roman Catholic, missionaries, all well attended.

"The members of the present Hova Government, who, with one or two exceptions, belong to the old heathen Conservative party, are opposed to an extended intercourse with Europeans, and to the spread of Christianity in Madagascar. If left to the bent of their natural inclinations, they would gladly revert to the old system in force during the reign of Queen Ranavalona. The fear of complications with the British and French Governments alone prevents their doing so. The limited views of the majority embrace the present only, without concern for the future ; and to secure that present, as regards their own position and influence, is their aim and ambition. The regenerating effects of civilisation, and the progressive moral advancement attending the spread of Christianity, are consequently not only feared, but sought to be resisted by means of a restrictive policy. Under existing circumstances, therefore, we can scarcely look for the development of the resources of Madagascar, for administrative reforms, improvement in the social condition of her inhabitants, or increase in trade. Such advantages could only be obtained under a Liberal Government in favour of progress."

Remarkable awakenings occur from time to time in mission districts, that seem like the breath of the Spirit on the dry bones of the valley, and lead to more visible change in a few weeks than, it may be, in many years before. As to permanent results, much depends on the wisdom and courage with which such movements are regulated by the missionaries. Such an awakening is reported by Wesleyan missionaries in the district of Colombo, Ceylon. Mr. Spence Hardy, at the Committee of Review of the Wesleyan Conference in Birmingham the other day, after dwelling on the long night of darkness, remarked, "there is now a blessed revival, and perhaps more souls have been saved during the last six months than at any time during our former history." Mr. Nicholson, the missionary at Colombo, gives an animated account of the movement, during successive meetings in the chapel, when, in answer to fervent prayer, a blessing was poured out, and very many seemed to be brought to God.

Of the permanent results of such movements, Mr. Honiss, of Surandei, of the Church Mission in South India, writes, in reference to one that took place in that district in 1860 : "While it must be acknowledged that some things which then took place should not be attributed to a divine origin, yet the catechist's report for the past four years plainly proves that a genuine revival must be dated from that period, and that the work, though marred by man, proceeded from God. Consistency of life has been conspicuous in its subjects ever since. Formerly there were many drunkards ; now they are all sober men. Formerly they were for the most part irregular in their attendance at the services ; now we cannot complain of one. In former years, 50 rupees subscription was considered a large sum ; last year they subscribed and spent on their church 250 rupees, and on the church, since it was commenced, they have spent 600 rupees."

The habit of raising funds for the support of divine ordinances among themselves seems to be making some progress in native congregations. The Rev. I. Welland, of the Church Mission, in a letter dated Kidderpore, Calcutta, May, 1865, mentions that after 1st July the native congregation attached to the Scotch Free Church Mission at Calcutta was to be self-supporting. Sixty-eight members subscribe to its funds, and they hope to raise 125 rupees monthly. The members of this congregation are, however, of a higher class than those of the Church Mission congregations, and better able to contribute for the support of their Church.

Many parts of the East continue to be fearfully scourged by the ravages of cholera. In Constantinople a frightful fire has followed in the footsteps of the pestilence. Part of Palestine has been stripped to the bone, as it were, by a visitation of locusts. The Rev. J. Zelle, of the Church Mission at Nazareth, gives a frightful account of their ravages. Writing in June, he says, "the young breed is spreading over the whole land, destroying everything. Three days ago the first army arrived at the vineyards south and west of Nazareth. The whole population of the town and villages turned out to protect at least a part of their property. The first day they succeeded, by keeping immense fires all round the vineyards. But the next day arrived the real army, and, in spite of the fires, the land was inundated as by a flood, and in a few hours gardens and vineyards were stripped of every green leaf, and even the prickly pears (cactus hedges) were attacked. The people had to take to flight. . . . June 14th.—New swarms of locusts have arrived to-day, and the whole country round is so thickly covered with them, that for the next week no relief from this horrible plague can be expected. To-day they penetrated into my rooms, and are marching over my table whilst I am writing. . . . The winter crops, consisting of wheat, barley, lentils, beans, &c., are greatly damaged, but the summer crops of Indian corn, sesam, cotton, &c., are quite destroyed. The only remaining provisions—corn and meat—are exceedingly dear; milk and oil are scarcely to be got. June 15th.—This evening I went over the vineyards of Nazareth. . . . The trees are all barren, as in England in winter, but it looks as if the country had been burned by fire. Every one acknowledges that the curse of the Almighty has struck the land. I met many people sitting in their wasted gardens with tears in their eyes; others carried baskets full of unripe fruit and vegetables, rescued from destruction; some were still engaged in the vain attempt to defend a particularly cherished tree from the attacks of the locusts, with which the ground is swarming. All confess that these are the judgments of the Lord calling us to repent."

Books on the East, of considerable size and pretensions, have been pouring in on us of late with a rapidity that shows the unabated interest of the reading public in the lands of sacred history. Mr. H. B. Tristram has given us, in a thick octavo volume, his "Journal of Travels in Palestine, undertaken with special reference to its physical character." In the years 1863-4, he spent nearly ten months in the examination chiefly of the geology and natural history of the country. His attention was particularly directed to the basin of the Dead Sea, and to the districts east of the Jordan. Comparatively few travellers have explored this latter district, owing, in some measure, to the greater dangers that are encountered in it, in consequence of the multitude and boldness of the Bedouin that haunt it. Speaking of the Ghor,' or valley of the Jordan, Mr. Tristram says, "A few years ago the whole Ghor was in the hands of the Fellâhin, and much of it cultivated for corn. Now the whole of it is in the hands of the Bedouin, who eschew all agriculture, excepting in a few spots cultivated here and there by their slaves; and with the Bedouin come lawlessness, and the uprooting of all Turkish authority. No government is now acknowledged on the east side, and unless the Porte acts with greater firmness and caution than is its wont, it will lose the last vestige of authority on the right bank also, and a wide strip of the most fertile land in all Palestine will be desolated and given up to the Nomads. The same thing is now going on over the plain of Sharon, where, both in the north and south, land is going out of cultivation, and whole villages rapidly disappearing from the face of the earth. Since the year 1838 no less than thirty villages have been thus erased from the map, and the stationary population extirpated. As the Philistines swept the plain in the days of Saul, and 'the people did hide themselves in caves, and in thickets, and in rocks, and in high places, and in pits,' so it is again. Either an European protectorate or union with Egypt seems requisite to save Palestine from gradual dissolution, unless, which seems hopeless, the Arabs can be induced to cultivate the soil."

The conclusion to which Mr. Tristram, as a man of science, comes, with regard to the perfect accuracy of Holy Scripture, is extremely interesting: "The primary object of our journey was the investigation of physical and natural history, not, however, to the exclusion of other objects of interest. We passed through the land with our Bibles in our hands, with, I trust, an unbiassed determination to investigate facts, and their independent bearing on sacred history. While on matters of science the inspired writers speak in the ordinary language of their times (the only language which could have been understood), I can bear testimony to the minute truth of innumerable incidental allusions in Holy Writ to the facts of nature, of climate, of geographical position,—corroborations of Scripture, which, though trifling in themselves, reach to minute details, that prove the writers to have lived when and where they are asserted to have lived; which attest their scrupulous accuracy in recording what they saw and observed around them; and which, therefore, must increase our confidence in their veracity where we cannot have the like means of testing it. I can find no discrepancies between their geographical or physical statements and the evidence of present facts. I can find no stand-point here for the keenest advocate against the full inspiration of the spiritual record. The Holy Land not only elucidates but bears witness to the truth of the Holy Book."

Besides the Holy Land, the state of Arabia and the Arabs has been brought prominently before the public, in the two closely-printed volumes of Mr. W. G. Palgrave, "Narrative of a Year's Journey through Central and Eastern Arabia, in 1862-63." We refer to Mr. Palgrave's volumes chiefly on account of the view they give us of the religious character of the Arab population. It is extremely unfavourable. "Generally speaking," he says, "the Arabs are a believing, but not a religious people. Christian, Jewish, Mahometan, or Pagan creeds and forms—the Arab, when left to himself, does not see why they should not all be equally true, equally estimable; while, at the same time, he does not either see any very cogent reason for following one rather than the other, and thus comes to the happy conclusion of binding himself to none. Not that he entertains the smallest doubt regarding the Divine mission of any of the six hundred prophets from Adam down to Mahomet inclusively, and even El-Mokannaa' himself, as we shall ultimately see in 'Omân, but he is unwilling to give any one of them in particular an adherence prejudicial to the rights of the rest. Besides, he is fond of ease, and impatient of restraint; stated prayers annoy him, long prayers tire him, ablutions are inconvenient, and fasting, especially in presence of a fat sheep, is quite out of the question, if indeed his ordinary allowance of nutriment might not be called a perpetual fast, and even a severe one.

"It is true that among a very large number this immense latitude of belief has led to an equally or even a more logical consequence, namely, entire scepticism, and a settled resolution to prefer the certain to the uncertain, the present to the future.

'Shall I abandon the pleasures of the pure wine goblet
For all they tell me about milk and honey hereafter?
Life, and death, and resurrection to follow,
—Stuff and nonsense, my dear madam:'

are the too-celebrated lines of a very popular Arabian poet, and I have often heard them quoted in moments of unreserved conversation with unequivocal approval on the part of all present. Not that even thus the Arab exactly disbelieves, but that he has made up his mind not to 'fash his thumb' about the matter."

In the field of Scripture exposition, Old Testament characters have been receiving a considerable share of attention. In his four sermons on "David," delivered before the University of Cambridge, Mr. Kingsley lately made a strenuous endeavour to dispel a delusion which works no small mischief in some young men,—that unguarded and uncontrolled sensual passion is after all but a trivial offence, not greatly impairing a character of much excellence in other respects. The very opposite of this is conceived to be the moral of King David's life; his shattered and helpless condition after his great trespass, and the miserable relations between him and his family, clearly evincing the ruinous results of that one uncontrolled lust under whose power he fell. The force and earnestness with which these and other salutary lessons are urged, make us regret the more what we must take leave to call Mr. Kingsley's defective statement on the subject of Christ's great work.

"Biographies of the Kings of Judah," is the title of a volume of expository sermons by Dr. James Augustus Hessey. The field is an important one, for the kings of Judah were not only remarkable for much variety of personal character, but also for the ways in which they were influenced by the circumstances and the people that surrounded them. Dr. Hessey has sought to indicate the characteristic feature of each life by the designation which he couples with the name of the king. Thus we have—Rehoboam, or the result of an idle word; Asa, or failure at the last; Jehoshaphat, or the dangers of indecision; Joash, or ingratitude; Hezekiah, or the might of prayer; Josiah, or the consistent career. The errors and failings, as well as the excellences of the kings, are clearly brought out, and pressed especially on the attention of the young. The book is not perhaps all that it might be; but the spirit in which it is written may be judged from its concluding words:—"We have been contemplating the temporal kings of Judah. Some of them we have seen to be worthy of disapproval; others, in their several degrees, have been proposed as worthy of imitation. Yet how poor, how lustreless, after all, is the goodness of even the best of them; how unfit to be compared with Him in whom was no sin, neither was guile found in his mouth. . . . Contrast this (Josiah), perhaps almost the best of Judah's temporal kings, with the Spiritual King of Judah, with Him who, as on this day, entered Jerusalem in triumph, the children crying Hosannah, likewise early 'cut off, but not for himself.' Through his merits and his alone, those of whom we have been speaking, whosoever of them obtained acceptance, were accepted; through his merits also must any of us hope for heaven. The thrones of earthly kings have been reared and have passed away; his throne endures for ever. The righteousness of earthly kings (which, after all, was not their own) has been personal only, has not finally profited their brethren, except in the way of example, and even that very imperfectly; He is a perfect example of a godly life, and, blessed be his holy name, A SACRIFICE TO REDEEM US FROM SIN."

"Sesame and Lilies," is the enigmatical title of two lectures by Mr. Ruskin, recently delivered in Manchester, the purport or tenor of which is not made a whit more clear by their second titles—"Of King's Treasuries;" "Of Queen's Gardens." The former lecture was meant to give instruction on the reading of books, to show how these "treasuries" may be made to yield the stuff from which men of the kingly order are made and nourished; the other indicates the true function and glory of woman, and summons her, especially in the upper ranks of life, to send forth the blessed fragrance of which the "garden of lilies" is capable. Both lectures are radiant with those wonderful corruscations which sparkle in everything that falls from Mr. Ruskin's pen. Their scorching power is marvellous; everything false, mean, or untrue—everything that is not lovely and of good report, no matter by whom practised, is exposed to a withering fire of sarcasm and scorn. Every enthusiast is almost necessarily an exaggerator, and Mr. Ruskin is no exception. He finds in a daily newspaper, for example, a notice of a death by starvation, and he rushes to the conclusion that our Christianity has not in it one spark of true compassion. He greatly under-estimates the actual influence of the earnest religion of the time in the development of true compassion, and other graces, and would almost seem to approach the perilous conclusion, that all that passes for religion among us is mere sham and delusion. It is painful to see a man drifting towards a position of this kind, who is so well fitted, if he would keep within due limits, to expose the errors of society, and urge the cultivated classes to tread the noblest paths.

ANNALS OF A QUIET NEIGHBOURHOOD.

BY THE VICAR.

IV.

On the way back, my thoughts were still occupied with the woman I had seen in the little shop. The old man-of-war's man was probably the nobler being of the two; and if I had had to choose between them, I should no doubt have chosen him. But I had not to choose between them; I had only to think about them; and I thought a great deal more about the one I could not understand than the one I could understand. For old Rogers wanted little help from me; whereas the other was evidently a soul in pain, and therefore belonged to me in peculiar right of my office; while the readiest way in which I could justify to myself the possession of that office was to make it a shepherding of the sheep. So I resolved to find out what I could about her, as one having a right to know, that I might see whether I could not help her. From herself it was evident that her secret, if she had one, was not to be easily gained; but even the common reports of the village would be some enlightenment to the darkness I was in about her.

As I went again through the village, I observed a narrow lane striking off to the left, and resolved to explore in that direction. It led up to one side of the large house of which I have already spoken. As I came near, I smelt what has been to me always a delightful smell—that of fresh deals under the hands of the carpenter. In the scent of those boards of pine is enclosed all the idea the tree could gather of the world of forest where it was reared. It speaks of many wild and bright but chiefly clean and rather cold things. If I were idling, it would draw me to it across many fields.—Turning a corner, I heard the sound of a saw. And this sound drew me yet more. For a carpenter's shop was the delight of my boyhood; and after I began to read the history of our Lord with something of that sense of reality with which we read other histories, and which, I am sorry to think, so much of the well-meant instruction we receive in our youth tends to destroy, my feeling about such a workshop grew stronger and stronger, till at last I never could go near enough to see the shavings lying on the floor of one, without a spiritual sensation such as I have in entering an old church; which sensation, ever since having been admitted on the usual conditions to a Mahometan mosque, urges me to pull off, not only my hat, but my shoes likewise. And the feeling has grown upon me, till now it seems at times as if the only cure in the world for social pride would be to go for five silent minutes into a carpenter's shop. How one can think of himself as above his neighbours, within sight, sound, or smell of one, I fear I am getting almost unable to imagine; and one ought not to get out of sympathy with the wrong. Only as I am growing old now, it does not matter so much, for I dare say my time will not be very long.

So I drew near to the shop, feeling as if the Lord might be at work there at one of the benches. And when I reached the door, there was my pale-faced hearer of the Sunday afternoon, sawing a board for a coffin-lid.

As my shadow fell across and darkened his work, he lifted his head and saw me.

I could not altogether understand the expression of his countenance as he stood upright from his labour and touched his old hat with rather a proud than a courteous gesture. And I could not believe that he was glad to see me, although he laid down his saw and advanced to the door. It was the gentleman in him, not the man, that sought to make me welcome, hardly caring whether I saw through the ceremony or not. True there was a smile on his lips, but the smile of a man who cherishes a secret grudge; of one who does not altogether dislike you, but who has a claim upon you—say, for an apology, of which claim he doubts whether you know the existence. So the smile seemed tightened and stopped just when it got half-way to its width, and was about to become hearty and begin to shine.

"May I come in?" I said.

"Come in, sir," he answered.

"I am glad I have happened to come upon you by accident," I said.

He smiled as if he did not quite believe in the accident, and considered it a part of the play between us that I should pretend it. I hastened to add:

"I was wandering about the place, making some acquaintance with it, and with my friends in it, when I came upon you quite unexpectedly. You know I saw you in church on Sunday afternoon."

"I know you saw me, sir," he answered, with a motion as if to return to his work; "but, to tell the truth, I don't go to church very often."

I did not quite know whether to take this as proceeding from an honest fear of being misunderstood, or from a sense of being in general superior to all that sort of thing. But I felt that it would be of no good to pursue the inquiry directly. I looked therefore for something to say.

"Ah! your work is not always a pleasant one," I said, associating the feelings of which I have already spoken with the facts before me, and looking at the coffin, the lower part of which stood nearly finished upon trestles on the floor.

"Well, there are unpleasant things in all trades," he answered. "But it does not matter," he added, with an increase of bitterness in his smile.

"I didn't mean," I said, "that the work was unpleasant—only sad. It must always be painful to make a coffin."

"A joiner gets used to it, sir, as you do to the funeral service. But for my part, I don't see why it should be considered so unhappy for a man to be buried. This isn't such a good job, after all, this world, sir, you must allow."

"Neither is that coffin," said I, as if by a sudden inspiration.

The man seemed taken aback, as old Rogers might have said. He looked at the coffin and then looked at me.

"Well, sir," he said, after a short pause, which no doubt seemed longer both to him and to me than it would have seemed to any third person, "I don't see anything amiss with the coffin. I don't say it'll last till doomsday, as the gravedigger says to Hamlet, because I don't know so much about doomsday as some people pretend to; but you see, sir, it's not finished yet."

"Thank you," I said; "that's just what I meant. You thought I was hasty in my judgment of your coffin; whereas I only said of it knowingly what you said of the world thoughtlessly. How do you know that the world is finished any more than your coffin? And how dare you then say that it is a bad job?"

The same respectfully scornful smile passed over his face, as much as to say, "Ah! it's your trade to talk that way, so I must not be too hard upon you."

"At any rate, sir," he said, "whoever made it has taken long enough about it, a person would think, to finish anything he ever meant to finish."

"One day is with the Lord as a thousand years, and a thousand years as one day," I said.

"That's supposing," he answered, "that the Lord did make the world. For my part, I am half of a mind that the Lord didn't make it at all."

"I am very glad to hear you say so," I answered.

Hereupon I found that we had changed places a little. He looked up at me. The smile of superiority was no longer there, and a puzzled questioning, which might indicate either "Who would have expected that from you?" or, "What can he mean?" or both at once, had taken its place. I, for my part, knew that on the scale of the man's judgment I had risen nearer to his own level. As he said nothing, however, and I was in danger of being misunderstood, I proceeded at once.

"Of course it seems to me better that you should not believe God had done a thing, than that you should believe He had not done it well?"

"Ah! I see, sir. Then you will allow there is some room for doubting whether He made the world at all?"

"Yes; for I do not think an honest man, as you seem to me to be, would be able to doubt without any room whatever. That would be only for a fool. But it is just possible, as we are not perfectly good ourselves—you'll allow that, won't you?"

"That I will, sir; God knows."

"Well, I say—as we're not quite good ourselves, it's just possible that things may be too good for us to do them the justice of believing in them."

"But there are things, you must allow, so plainly wrong!"

"So much so, both in the world and in myself, that it would be to me torturing despair to believe that God did not make the world; for then, how would it ever be put right? Therefore I prefer the theory that He has not done making it yet."

"But wouldn't you say, sir, that God might have managed it without so many slips in the making as your way would suppose? I should think myself a bad workman if I worked after that fashion."

"I do not believe that there are any slips. You know you are making a coffin; but are you sure you know what God is making of the world?"

"That I can't tell, of course, nor anybody else."

"Then you can't say that what looks like a slip is really a slip, either in the design or in the workmanship. You do not know what end He has in view; and you may find some day that those slips were just the straight line to that very end."

"Ah! maybe. But you can't be sure of it, you see."

"Perhaps not, in the way you mean. But sure enough, for all that, to try it upon life—to order my way by it, and so find that it works well. And I find that it explains everything that comes near it. You know that no engineer would be satisfied with his engine on paper, nor with any proof whatever except seeing how it will go."

He made no reply.

It is a principle of mine never to push anything over the edge. When I am successful in any argument, my one dread is of humiliating my opponent. Indeed I cannot bear it. It humiliates me. And if you want him to think about anything, you must leave him room, and not give him such associations with the question that the very idea of it will be painful and irritating to him. Let him have a hand in the convincing of himself. I have been surprised sometimes to see my own arguments come up fresh and green, when I thought the fowls of the air had devoured them up. When a man reasons for victory and not for the truth in the other soul, he is sure of just one ally, the same that Faust had in fighting Gretchen's brother—that is, the Devil. But God and good men are against him. So I never follow up a victory of that kind, for, as I said, the defeat of the intellect is not the object in fighting with the sword of the Spirit, but the acceptance of the heart. In this case, therefore, I drew back.

"May I ask for whom you are making that coffin?"

"For a sister of my own, sir."

"I'm sorry to hear that."

"There's no occasion. I can't say I'm sorry, though she was one of the best women I ever knew."

"Why are you not sorry, then? Life's a good thing in the main, you will allow."

"Yes, when it's endurable at all. But to have a brute of a husband coming home at any hour of the night or morning, drunk upon the money she had earned by hard work, was enough to take more of the shine out of things than church-going on Sundays could put in again, regular as she was, poor woman! I'm as glad as her brute of a husband, that she's out of his way at last."

"How do you know he's glad of it?"

"He's been drunk every night since she died."

"Then he's the worse for losing her?"

"He may well be. Crying like a hypocrite, too, over his own work!"

"A fool he must be. A hypocrite, perhaps not.

A hypocrite is a terrible name to give. Perhaps her death will do him good."

"He doesn't deserve to be done any good to. I would have made this coffin for him with a world of pleasure."

"I never found that I deserved anything, not even a coffin. The only claim that I could ever lay to anything was that I was very much in want of it."

The old smile returned—as much as to say, "That's your little game in the church." But I resolved to try nothing more with him at present; and indeed was sorry that I had started the new question at all, partly because thus I had again given him occasion to feel that he knew better than I did, which was not good either for him or for me in our relation to each other.

"This has been a fine old room once," I said, looking round the workshop.

"You can see it wasn't a workshop always, sir. Many a grand dinner-party has sat down in this room when it was in its glory. Look at the chimney-piece there."

"I have been looking at it," I said, going nearer.

"It represents the four quarters of the world, you see."

I saw strange figures of men and women, one on a kneeling camel, one on a crawling crocodile, and others differently mounted, with various besides of Nature's bizarre productions creeping and flying in stone-carving over the huge fire-place, in which, in place of a fire, stood several new and therefore brilliantly red cart-wheels. The sun shone through the upper part of a high window, of which many of the panes were broken, right in upon the cart wheels, which, glowing thus in the chimney under the sombre chimney-piece, added to the grotesque look of the whole assemblage of contrasts. The coffin and the carpenter stood in the twilight occasioned by the sharp division of light made by a lofty wing of the house that rose flanking the other window. The room was still wainscotted in panels, which, I presume for the sake of the more light required for handicraft, had been washed all over with white. At the level of labour they were broken in many places. Somehow or other, the whole reminded me of Albert Dürer's Melencholia.

Seeing I was interested in looking about his shop, my new friend—for I could not help feeling that we should be friends before all was over, and so began to count him one already—resumed the conversation. He had never taken up the dropped thread of it before.

"Yes, sir," he said; "the owners of the place little thought it would come to this—the deals growing into a coffin there on the spot where the grand dinner was laid for them and their guests! But there is another thing about it that is odder still: my son is the last male——"

Here he stopped suddenly, and his face grew very red. As suddenly he resumed:—

"I'm not a gentleman, sir; but I will tell the truth. Curse it!—I beg your pardon, sir"—and here the old smile—"I don't think I got that from their side of the house.—My son's not the last male descendant."

Here followed another pause.

As to the imprecation, I knew better than to take any notice of a mere expression of excitement under a sense of some injury with which I was not yet acquainted. If I could get his feelings right in regard to other and more important things, a reform in that matter would soon follow; whereas to make a mountain of a mole-hill would be to put that very mountain between him and me. Nor would I ask him any questions, lest I should just happen to ask him the wrong one; for this parishioner of mine evidently wanted careful handling, if I would do him any good. And it won't do any man good to fling even the Bible in his face. Nay, a roll of bank-notes, which would be more evidently a good to most men, would carry insult with it if presented in that manner. You cannot expect people to accept before they have had a chance of seeing what the offered gift really is.

After a pause, therefore, the carpenter had once more to recommence, or let the conversation lie. I stood in a waiting attitude. And while I looked at him, I was reminded of some one else whom I knew—with whom, too, I had pleasant associations—though I could not in the least determine who that one might be.

"It's very foolish of me to talk so to a stranger," he resumed.

"It is very kind and friendly of you," I said, still careful to make no advances. "And you yourself belong to the old family that once lived in this old house?"

"It would be no boast to tell the truth, sir, even if it were a credit to me, which it is not. That family has been nothing but a curse to ours."

I noted that he spoke of that family as different from his, and yet implied that he belonged to it. The explanation would come in time. But the man was again silent, planing away at half the lid of his sister's coffin. And I could not help thinking that the closed mouth meant to utter nothing more on this occasion.

"I am sure there must be many a story to tell about this old place, if only there were any one to tell them," I said at last, looking round the room once more.—"I think I see the remains of paintings on the ceiling."

"You are sharp-eyed, sir. My father says they were plain enough in his young days."

"Is your father alive, then?"

"That he is, sir, and hearty too, though he seldom goes out of doors now. Will you go upstairs and see him? He's past ninety, sir. He has plenty of stories to tell about the old place—before it began to fall to pieces, like."

"I won't go to-day," I said, partly because I wanted to be at home to receive any one who might call, and partly to secure an excuse for calling again upon the carpenter sooner than I should otherwise have liked to do. "I expect visitors myself, and it is time I were at home. Good morning."

"Good morning, sir."

And away home I went with a new wonder in my brain. The man did not seem unknown to me. I mean the state of his mind woke no feeling of perplexity in me. I was certain of understanding it thoroughly when I had learned something of his history; for that such a man must have a history of his own was rendered only the more probable from the fact that he knew something of the history of his forefathers, though indeed there are some men who seem to have no other. It was strange, however, to think of that man working away at a trade in the very house in which such ancestors had eaten and drunk, and married and given in marriage. The house and family had declined together—in outward appearance at least; for it was quite possible both might have risen in the moral and spiritual scale in proportion as they sank in the social one. And if any of my readers are at first inclined to think that this could hardly be, seeing that the man was little if anything better than an infidel, I would just like to hold one minute's conversation with them on that subject. A man may be on the way to the truth just in virtue of his doubting. I will tell you what Lord Bacon says, and of all writers of English I delight in him:—"So it is in contemplation: if a man will begin with certainties, he shall end in doubts; but if he will be content to begin with doubts, he shall end in certainties." Now I could not tell the kind or character of this man's doubt; but it was evidently real and not affected doubt; and that was much in his favour. And I could see that he was a thinking man; just one of the sort I thought I should get on with in time, because he was honest—notwithstanding that unpleasant smile of his, which did irritate me a little, and partly piqued me into the determination to get the better of the man, if I possibly could, by making friends with him. At all events, here was another strange parishioner. And who could it be that he was like?

V.

When I came near my own gate, I saw that it was open; and when I came in sight of my own door, I found a carriage standing before it, and a footman ringing the bell. It was an old-fashioned carriage, with two white horses in it, yet whiter by age than by nature. They looked as if no coachman could get more than three miles an hour out of them, they were so fat and knuckle-kneed. But my attention could not rest long on the horses, and I reached the door just as my housekeeper was pronouncing me absent. There were two ladies in the carriage, one old and one young.

"Ah, here is Mr. Walton!" said the old lady, in a serene voice, with a clear hardness in its tone; and I held out my hand to aid her descent. She had pulled off her glove to get a card out of her card-case, and so put the tips of two old fingers, worn very smooth, as if polished with feeling what things were like, upon the palm of my hand. I then offered my hand to her companion, a girl apparently about fourteen, who took a hearty hold of it, and jumped down beside her, with a smile. As I followed them into the house, I took their card from the housekeeper's hand, and read Mrs. Oldcastle and Miss Gladwyn.

I confess here to my reader, that these are not really the names I read on the card. I made these up this minute. But the names of the persons of humble position in my story, are their real names. And my reason for making the difference will be plain enough. You can never find out my friend old Rogers: you might find out the people who called on me in their carriage with the ancient white horses.

When they were seated in the drawing-room, I said to the old lady,

"I remember seeing you in church on Sunday morning. It is very kind of you to call so soon."

"You will always see me in church," she returned with a stiff bow, and an expansion of deadness on her face, which I interpreted into an assertion of dignity, resulting from the implied possibility that I might have passed her over in my congregation, or might have forgotten her after not passing her over.

"Except when you have a headache, grannie," said Miss Gladwyn, with an arch look first at her grandmother and then at me. "Grannie has bad headaches sometimes."

The deadness melted a little from Mrs. Oldcastle's face, as she turned with half a smile to her grandchild, and said:

"Yes, Pet. But you know that cannot be an interesting fact to Mr. Walton."

"I beg your pardon, Mrs. Oldcastle," I said. "A clergyman ought to know something, and the more the better, of the troubles of his flock. Sympathy is one of the first demands he ought to be able to meet. —I know what a headache is."

The former expression, or rather, non-expression, returned; this time unaccompanied by a bow.

"I trust, Mr. Walton, I trust I am above any morbid necessity for sympathy. But, as you say, amongst the poor of your flock,—it is very desirable that a clergyman should be able to sympathize."

"It's quite true what grannie says, Mr. Walton, though you mightn't think it. When she has a headache, she shuts herself up in her own room, and doesn't even let me come near her—nobody but old Joan; and how she can prefer her to me, I'm sure I don't know."

And here the girl pretended to pout, but with a sparkle in her bright grey eye.

"The subject is not interesting to me, Pet. Pray, Mr. Walton, is it a point of conscience with you to wear the surplice when you preach?"

"Not in the least," I answered. "I think I like it rather better on the whole. But that's not why I wear it."

"Never mind grannie, Mr. Walton. I think the surplice is lovely. I'm sure its much liker the way we shall be dressed in heaven, though I don't think I shall ever get there, if I must read the good books grannie reads."

"I don't know that it is necessary to read any good books but the good book," I said.

"There, grannie!" exclaimed Miss Gladwyn triumphantly. "I'm so glad I've got Mr. Walton on my side."

"Mr. Walton is not so old as I am, my dear, and has much to learn yet."

I could not help feeling a little annoyed (which was very foolish, I know), and saying to myself, "If it's to make me like you, I had rather not learn any more ;" but I said nothing aloud, of course.

"Have you got a headache to day, grannie ?"

"No, Pet. Be quiet. I wish to ask Mr. Walton why he wears the surplice."

"Simply," I replied, "because I was told the people had been accustomed to it under my predecessor."

"But that can be no good reason for doing what is not right—that people have been accustomed to it."

"But I don't allow that it's not right. I think it is a matter of no consequence whatever. If I find that the people don't like it, I will give it up with pleasure."

"You ought to have principles of your own, Mr. Walton."

"I hope I have. And one of them is, not to make mountains of molehills ; for a molehill is not a mountain. A man ought to have too much to do in obeying his conscience and keeping his soul's garments clean, to mind whether he wears black or white when telling his flock that God loves them, and that they will never be happy till they believe it."

"They may believe that too soon."

"I don't think any one can believe the truth too soon."

A pause followed, during which it became evident to me that Miss Gladwyn saw fun in the whole affair, and was enjoying it thoroughly. Mrs. Oldcastle's face, on the contrary, was illegible. She resumed in a measured still voice, which she meant to be meek, I daresay, but which was really authoritative :

"I am sorry, Mr. Walton, that your principles are so loose and unsettled. You will see my honesty in saying so when you find that, objecting to the surplice, as I do, on Protestant grounds, I yet warn you against making any change because you may discover that your parishioners are against it. You have no idea, Mr. Walton, what inroads Radicalism, as they call it, has been making in this neighbourhood. It is quite dreadful. Everybody, down to the poorest, claiming a right to think for himself, and set his betters right ! There's one worse than any of the rest—but he's no better than an atheist—a carpenter of the name of Weir, always talking to his neighbours against the proprietors and the magistrates, and the clergy too, Mr. Walton, and the game-laws, and what not ? And if you once show them that you are afraid of them by going a step out of your way for their opinion about anything, there will be no end to it ; for the beginning of strife is like the letting out of water, as you know. I should know nothing about it, but that my daughter's maid—I came to hear of it through her—a decent girl of the name of Rogers, and born of decent parents, but unfortunately attached to the son of one of your churchwardens, who has put him into that mill on the river you can almost see from here."

"Who put him in the mill ?"

"His own father, to whom it belongs."

"Well, it seems to me a very good match for her."

"Yes, indeed, and for him too. But his foolish father thinks the match below him, as if there was any difference between the positions of people in that rank of life ! Every one seems striving to tread on the heels of every one else, instead of being content with the station to which God has called them. I am content with mine. I had nothing to do with putting myself there. Why should they not be content with theirs ? They need to be taught Christian humility and respect for their superiors. That's the virtue most wanted at present. The poor have to look up to the rich——"

"That's right, grannie ! And the rich have to look down on the poor."

"No, my dear. I did not say that. The rich have to be kind to the poor."

"But, grannie, why did you marry Mr. Oldcastle ?"

"What does the child mean ?"

"Uncle Stoddart says you refused ever so many offers when you were a girl."

"Uncle Stoddart has no business to be talking about such things to a chit like you," returned the grandmother, smiling however at the charge, which so far certainly contained no reproach.

"And grandpapa was the ugliest and the richest of them all—wasn't he, grannie ? and Colonel Markham the handsomest and the poorest ?"

A flush of anger crimsoned the old lady's pale face. It looked dead no longer.

"Hold your tongue," she said. "You are rude."

And Miss Gladwyn did hold her tongue, but nothing else, for she was laughing all over.

The relation between these two was evidently a very odd one. It was clear that Miss Gladwyn was a spoiled child, though I could not help thinking her very nicely spoiled, as far as I saw ; and that the old lady persisted in regarding her as a cub although her claws had grown quite long enough to be dangerous. Certainly, if things went on thus, it was pretty clear which of them would soon have the upper hand, for grannie was vulnerable, and Pet was not.

It really began to seem as if there were nobody but characters in my parish. I began to think it must be the strangest parish in England, and to wonder that I had never heard of it before. "Surely it must be in some story-book at least !" I said to myself.

But her grand-daughter's tiger-cat-play drove the old lady nearer to me. She rose and held out her hand, saying, with some kindness :

"Take my advice, my dear Mr. Walton, and don't make too much of your poor, or they'll soon be too much for you to manage.—Come, Pet : it's time to go home to lunch.—And for the surplice, take your own way and wear it. I shan't say anything more about it."

"I will do what I can see to be right in the matter," I answered as gently as I could ; for I did not want to quarrel with her, although I thought her both presumptuous and rude.

"I'm on your side, Mr. Walton," said the girl, with a sweet comical smile, as she squeezed my hand once more. I led them to the carriage, and it was with a feeling of relief that I saw it drive off.

The old lady certainly was not pleasant. She had a white smooth face over which the skin was drawn tight, grey hair, and rather lurid hazel eyes. I felt a repugnance to her that was hardly to be accounted for by her arrogance to me, or by her superciliousness to the poor; although either would have accounted for much of it. For I confess that I have not yet learned to bear presumption and rudeness with all the patience and forgiveness with which I ought by this time to be able to meet them. And as to the poor, I am afraid I was always in some danger of being a partizan of theirs against the rich; and that a clergyman ought never to be. And indeed the poor rich have more need of the care of the clergyman than the others, seeing it is hardly that the rich shall enter into the kingdom of heaven, and the poor have all the advantage over them in that respect.

"Still," I said to myself, "there must be some good in the woman—she cannot be altogether so hard as she looks, else how should that child dare to take the liberties of a kitten with her? She doesn't look to me like one to make game of! However, I shall know a little more about her when I return her call, and I will do my best to keep on good terms with her."

I took down a volume of Plato to comfort me after the irritation which my nerves had undergone, and sat down in an easy chair beside the open window of my study. And with Plato in my hand, and all that outside my window, I began to feel as if after all a man might be happy, even if a lady had refused him. So there I sat, never opening my favourite vellum-bound volume, but gazing out on the happy world, whence a gentle wind came in as if to bid me welcome with a kiss to all it had to give me. And then I thought of the wind that bloweth where it listeth, which is everywhere, and I forgot to open my Plato, and thanked God for the Life of life whose story and whose words are in that best of books, and who explains everything to us, and makes us love Socrates and David and all such men ten times more; and who follows no law but the law of love, and no fashion but the will of God; for where did ever one read words less like moralizing and more like simple earnestness of truth than all those of Jesus? And I prayed my God that he would make me able to speak good common heavenly sense to my people, and forgive me for feeling so cross and proud towards the unhappy old lady—for I was sure she was not happy—and make me into a rock which swallowed up the waves of wrong in its great caverns, and never threw them back to swell the commotion of the angry sea whence they came. Ah, what it would be actually to annihilate wrong in this way!—to be able to say, it shall not be wrong against me, so utterly do I forgive it! How much sooner, then, would the wrong-doer repent, and get rid of the wrong from his side also! But the painful fact will show itself, not less curious than painful, that it is more difficult to forgive small wrongs than great ones. Perhaps, however, the forgiveness of the great wrongs is not sot rue as it seems. For do we not think it is a fine thing to forgive such wrongs, and so do it rather for our own sakes than for the sake of the wrong-doer? It is dreadful not to be good, and to have bad ways inside one.

Such thoughts passed through my mind. And once more the great light went up on me with regard to my office, namely, that just because I was parson to the parish, I must not be the person to myself. And I prayed God to keep me from feeling stung and proud, however anyone might behave to me; for all my value lay in being a sacrifice to Him and the people.

So when Mrs. Pearson knocked at the door, and told me that a lady and gentleman had called, I shut my book which I had just opened, and kept down as well as I could the rising grumble of the inhospitable Englishman, who is apt to be forgetful to entertain strangers, at least in the parlour of his heart. And I cannot count it perfect hospitality to be friendly and plentiful towards those whom you have invited to your house—what thank has a man in that?—while you are cold and forbidding to those who have not that claim on your attention. That is not to be perfect as our Father in heaven is perfect. By all means tell people when you are busy about something that must be done, that you cannot spare the time for them except they want you upon something of yet more pressing necessity; but tell them, and do not get rid of them by the use of the instrument commonly called the cold shoulder. It is a wicked instrument that, and ought to have fallen out of use by this time.

I went and received Mr. and Miss Boulderstone, and was at least thus far rewarded—that the eerie feeling, as the Scotch would call it, which I had about my parish, as containing none but characters, and therefore not being canny, was entirely removed. At least there was a wholesome leaven in it of honest stupidity. Please, kind reader, do not fancy I am sneering. I declare to you I think a sneer the worst thing God has not made. A curse is nothing in wickedness to it, it seems to me. I do mean that honest stupidity I respect heartily, and do assert my conviction that I do not know how England at least would get on without it. But I do not mean the stupidity that sets up for teaching itself to its neighbour, thinking itself wisdom all the time. That I do not respect.

Mr. and Miss Boulderstone left me a little fatigued, but in no way sore or grumbling. They only sent me back with additional zest to my Plato, of whom I enjoyed a hearty page or two before any one else arrived. The only other visitors I had that day were an old surgeon in the Navy who since his retirement had practised for many years in the neighbourhood, and was still at the call of any one who did not think him too old-fashioned; for even here the fashions, though decidedly elderly young ladies by the time they arrived, held their sway none the less imperiously; and Mr. Brownrigg, the churchwarden. More of Dr. Duncan by and by.

Except Mr. and Miss Boulderstone, I had not yet seen any common people. They were all decidedly uncommon, and, as regarded most of them, I could not think I should have any difficulty in preaching to them. For, whatever place a man may give to preaching in the ritual of the church—indeed it does not properly belong to the ritual at all—it is yet the part of the so-called service with which his personality has most to do. To the influences of the other parts he has to submit himself, ever turning the openings of his soul towards them, that he may not be a mere praying machine; but with the sermon it is otherwise. That he produces. For that he is responsible. And therefore, I say, it was a great comfort to me to find myself amongst a people from which my spirit neither shrunk in the act of preaching, nor with regard to which it was likely to feel that it was beating itself against a stone wall. There was some good in preaching to a man like Weir or old Rogers. Whether there was any good in preaching to a woman like Mrs. Oldcastle I did not know.

The evening I thought I might give to my books, and thus end my first Monday in my parish; but, as I said, Mr. Brownrigg, the churchwarden, called and stayed a whole weary hour, talking about matters quite uninteresting to any who may hereafter peruse what I am now writing. Indeed he was not an interesting man: short, broad, stout, red-faced, with an immense amount of mental inertia, discharging itself in constant lingual activity about little nothings. Indeed, when there was no new nothing to be had, the old nothing would do over again to make a fresh fuss about. But if you attempted to convey a thought into his mind which involved the moving round half a degree from where he stood, and looking at the matter from a point even so far new, you found him utterly, totally impenetrable, as pachydermatous as any rhinoceros or behemoth. One other corporeal fact I could not help observing, was, that his cheeks rose at once from the collar of his green coat, his neck being invisible, from the hollow between it and the jaw being filled up to a level. The conformation was just what he himself delighted to contemplate in his pigs, to which his resemblance was greatly increased by unwearied endeavours to keep himself close shaved.—I could not help feeling anxious about his son and Jane Rogers.—He gave a quantity of gossip about various people, evidently anxious that I should regard them as he regarded them; but in all he said concerning them I could scarcely detect one point of significance as to character or history. I was very glad indeed when the waddling of hands—for it was the perfect imbecility of hand-shaking—was over, and he was safely out of the gate. He had kept me standing on the steps for full five minutes, and I did not feel safe from him till I was once more in my study with the door shut.

I am not going to try my reader's patience with anything of a more detailed account of my introduction to my various parishioners. I shall mention them only as they come up in the course of my story. Before many days had passed I had found out my poor, who I thought must be somewhere, seeing the Lord had said we should have them with us always. There was a workhouse in the village, but there were not a great many in it; for the poor were kindly enough handled who belonged to the place, and were not too severely compelled to go into the house: though I believe in this house they would have been more comfortable than they were in their own houses.

I cannot imagine a greater misfortune for a man, perhaps still more for a clergyman, than not to know, or knowing, not to minister to any of the poor. And I did not feel that I knew in the least where I was until I had found out and conversed with almost the whole of mine.

After I had done so, I began to think it better to return Mrs. Oldcastle's visit, though I felt greatly disinclined to encounter that tight-skinned nose again, and that mouth whose smile had no light in it, except when it responded to some nonsense of her grand-daughter's.

VI.

About noon, on a lovely autumn day, I set out for Oldcastle Hall. The keenness of the air had melted away with the heat of the sun, yet still the air was fresh and invigorating. Can any one tell me why it is that when the earth is renewing her youth in the spring, man should feel feeble and low-spirited, and gaze with bowed head, though pleased heart, on the crocuses; whereas on the contrary in the autumn, when nature is dying for the winter, he feels strong and hopeful, holds his head erect, and walks with a vigorous step, though the flaunting dahlias discourage him greatly? I do not ask for the physical causes: those I might be able to find out for myself; but I ask, where is the rightness and fitness in the thing? Should not man and nature go together in this world which was made for man—not for science, but for man? Perhaps I have some glimmerings of where the answer lies. Perhaps I see a cherub aloft that sees it. And in many of our questions we have to be content with such an approximation to an answer as this. And for my part I am content with this. With less, I am not content.

Whatever that answer may be, I walked over the old Gothic bridge with a heart strong enough to meet Mrs. Oldcastle without flinching. I might have to quarrel with her—I could not tell: she certainly was neither safe nor wholesome. But this I was sure of, that I would not quarrel with her without being quite certain that I ought. I wish it were never one's duty to quarrel with anybody: I do so hate it. But not to do it sometimes is to smile in the Devil's face, and that no one ought to do. However, I had not to quarrel this time.

The woods on the other side of the river from my house, towards which I was now walking, were of the most sombre rich colours—sombre and rich, like a life that has laid up treasure in heaven, locked in a casket of sorrow. I came nearer and nearer to them through the village, and approached the great iron gate with the antediluvian monsters on the top of its stone pillars. And awful monsters they were—are still! I see the tail of one of them at this very moment. But they let me through very quietly, notwithstanding their evil looks; and I thought they were saying to each other across the top of the gate, "Never mind; he'll catch it soon enough." But, as I said, I did not catch it that day; and I could not have caught it that day; it was too lovely a day to catch any hurt even from that most hurtful of all beings under the sun, an unwomanly woman.

I wandered up the long winding road, through the woods which I had remarked flanking the meadow on my first walk up the river. These woods smelt so sweetly —their dead and dying leaves departing in sweet odours—that they quite made up for the absence of the flowers. And the wind—no, there was no wind —there was only a memory of wind that woke now and then in the bosom of the wood, shook down a few leaves, like the thoughts that flutter away in sighs, and then was still again.

I am getting old, as I told you, my friends. (See there, you seem my friends already. Do not despise an old man because he cannot help loving people he never saw or even heard of.) I say I am getting old—(is it but or therefore? I do not know which)—but, therefore, I shall never forget that one autumn day in those grandly fading woods.

Up the slope of the hillside they rose like one great rainbow billow of foliage—bright yellow, red rusty and bright, fading green, all kinds and shades of brown and purple. Multitudes of leaves lay on the sides of the path, so many that I betook myself to my old childish amusement of walking in them without lifting my feet, driving whole armies of them with ocean-like rustling before me. I did not do so as I came back. I walked in the middle of the way then, and I remember stepping over many single leaves, in a kind of mechanico-merciful way, as if they had been living creatures—as indeed who can tell but they are, only they must be pretty nearly dead when they are on the ground.

At length the road brought me up to the house. It did not look such a large house as I have since found it to be. And it certainly was not an interesting house from the outside, though its surroundings of green grass and trees would make any whole beautiful. Indeed the house itself tried hard to look ugly not quite succeding only because of the kind foiling of its efforts by the Virginia creepers and ivy, which, as if ashamed of its staring countenance, did all they could to spread their hands over it and hide it. But there was one charming group of old chimneys, belonging to some portion behind, which indicated a very different, namely a very much older, face upon the house once—a face that had passed away to give place to this. Once inside, I found there were more remains of the olden time than I had expected. I was led up one of those grand square oak staircases, which look like a portion of the house to be dwelt in, and not like a ladder for getting from one part of the habitable regions to another. On the top was a fine expanse of landing, another hall in fact, from which I was led towards the back of the house by a narrow passage, and shown into a small dark drawing-room with a deep stone-mullioned window, wainscotted in oak simply carved into panels. Several doors around indicated communication with other parts of the house. Here I found Mrs. Oldcastle, reading what I judged to be one of the cheap and gaudy religious books of the present day. She rose and received me, and having motioned me to a seat, began to talk about the parish. You would have perceived at once from her tone that she recognized no other bond of connection between us but the parish.

"I hear you have been most kind in visiting the poor, Mr. Walton. You must take care that they don't take advantage of your kindness, though. I assure you, you will find some of them very grasping indeed. And you need not expect that they will give you the least credit for good intentions."

"I have seen nothing yet to make me uneasy on that score. But certainly my testimony is of no weight yet."

"Mine is. I have proved them. The poor of this neighbourhood are very deficient in gratitude."

"Yes, grannie,——"

I started. But there was no interruption, such as I have made to indicate my surprise; although, when I looked half round in the direction whence the voice came, the words that followed were all rippled with a sweet laugh of amusement.

"Yes, grannie, you are right. You remember how old dame Hope wouldn't take the money you offered her, and dropped such a disdainful courtesy. It was so greedy of her, wasn't it?"

"I am sorry to hear of any disdainful reception of kindness," I said.

"Yes, and she had the coolness, within a fortnight, to send up to me and ask if I would be kind enough to lend her half-a-crown for a few weeks."

"And then it was your turn, grannie! You sent her five shillings, didn't you?—Oh, no; I'm wrong. That was the other woman."

"Indeed, I did not send her anything but a rebuke. I told her that it would be a very wrong thing in me to contribute to the support of such an evil spirit of unthankfulness as she indulged in. When she came to see her conduct in its true light, and confessed that she had behaved very abominably, I would see what I could do for her."

"And meantime she was served out, wasn't she? With her sick boy at home, and nothing to give him?"

"She made her own bed, and had to lie on it."

"Don't you think a little kindness might have had more effect in bringing her to see that she was wrong."

"Grannie doesn't believe in kindness, except to me—dear old grannie! She spoils me. I'm sure I shall be ungrateful some day; and then she'll begin to read me long lectures, and prick me with all manner of headless pins. But I won't stand it, I can tell you, grannie! I'm too much spoiled for that."

Mrs. Oldcastle was silent—why, I could not tell, except it was that she knew she had no chance of quieting the girl in any other way.

I may mention here, lest I should have no opportunity afterwards, that I inquired of dame Hope as to her version of the story, and found that there had been a great misunderstanding, as I had suspected. She was really in no want at the time, and did not feel that it would be quite honourable to take the money when she did not need it—(some poor people are capable of such reasoning), and so had refused it, not without a feeling at the same time that it was more pleasant to refuse than to accept from such a giver; some stray sparkle of which feeling, discovered by the keen eye of Miss Gladwyn, may have given that appearance of disdain to her courtesy to which the girl alluded. When, however, her boy in service was brought home ill, she had sent to ask for what she now required, on the very ground that it had been offered to her before. The misunderstanding had arisen from the total incapacity of Mrs. Oldcastle to enter sympathetically into the feelings of one as superior to herself in character as she was inferior in worldly condition.

But to return to Oldcastle Hall.

I wished to change the subject, knowing that blind defence is of no use. One must have definite points for defence, if one has not a thorough understanding of the character in question; and I had neither.

"This is a beautiful old house," I said. "There must be strange places about it."

Mrs. Oldcastle had not time to reply, or at least did not reply, before Miss Gladwyn said,

"Oh, Mr. Walton, have you looked out of the window yet? You don't know what a lovely place this is, if you haven't."

And as she spoke she emerged from a recess in the room, a kind of dark alcove, where she had been amusing herself with what I took to be some sort of puzzle, but which I found afterwards to be the bit and curb-chain of her pony's bridle which she was polishing up to her own bright mind, because the stable-boy had not pleased her in the matter, and she wanted both to get them brilliant and to shame the lad for the future. I followed her to the window, where I was indeed as much surprised and pleased as she could have wished.

"There!" she said, holding back one of the dingy heavy curtains with her small childish hand.

And there indeed I saw an astonishment. It did not lie in the lovely sweeps of hill and hollow stretching away to the horizon, richly wooded, and—though I saw none of them—sprinkled, certainly, with sweet villages full of human thoughts, loves, and hopes; the astonishment did not lie in this—though all this was really much more beautiful to the higher imagination—but in the fact that, at the first glance, I had a vision properly belonging to a rugged or mountainous country. For I had approached the house by a gentle slope, which certainly was long and winding, but had occasioned no feeling in my mind that I had reached any considerable height. And I had come up that one beautiful staircase; no more; and yet now, when I looked from this window, I found myself on the edge of a precipice—not a very deep one, certainly, yet with all the effect of many a deeper. For below the house on this side lay a great hollow, with steep sides, up which, as far as they could reach, the trees were climbing. The sides were not all so steep as the one on which the house stood, but they were all rocky and steep, with here and there slopes of green grass. And down in the bottom, in the centre of the hollow, lay a pool of water. I knew it only by its slaty shimmer through the fading green of the tree-tops between me and it.

"There!" again exclaimed Miss Gladwyn; "isn't that beautiful? But you haven't seen the most beautiful thing yet. Grannie, where's—ah! there she is! There's auntie! Don't you see her down there, by the side of the pond? That pond is a hundred feet deep. If auntie were to fall in she would be drowned before you could jump down to get her out. Can you swim?"

Before I had time to answer, she was off again.

"Don't you see auntie down there?"

"No, I don't see her. I have been trying very hard, but I can't."

"Well, I daresay you can't. Nobody, I think, has got eyes but myself. Do you see a big stone by the edge of the pond, with another stone on the top of it, like a big potato with a little one growing out of it?"

"No."

"Well, auntie is under the trees on the opposite side from that stone. Do you see her yet?"

"No."

"Then you must come down with me, and I will introduce you to her. She's much the prettiest thing here. Much prettier than grannie."

Here she looked over her shoulder at grannie, who, instead of being angry, as, from what I had seen on our former interview, I feared she would be, only said, without even looking up from the little blue-boarded book she was again reading—

"You are a saucy child."

Whereupon Miss Gladwyn laughed merrily.

"Come along," she said, and, seizing me by the hand, led me out of the room, down a back-staircase, across a piece of grass, and then down a stair in the face of the rock, towards the pond below. The stair went in zigzags, and, although rough, was protected by an iron balustrade, without which, indeed, it would have been very dangerous.

"Isn't your grandmamma afraid to let you run up and down here, Miss Gladwyn?" I said.

"Me!" she exclaimed, apparently in the utmost surprise. "That would be fun! For, you know, if she tried to hinder me—but she knows it's no use; I taught her that long ago—let me see how long: oh! I don't know—I should think it must be ten years at least. I ran away, and they thought I had drowned myself in the pond. And I saw them, all the time, poking with a long stick in the pond, which, if I had been drowned there, never could have brought me up, for it is a hundred feet deep, I am sure. How I hurt my sides trying to keep from screaming with laughter! I fancied I heard one say to the other, 'We must wait till she swells and floats!'"

"Dear me! what a peculiar child!" I said to myself.

And yet somehow, whatever she said,—even when she was most rude to her grandmother—she was never offensive. No one could have helped feeling all the time that she was a little lady.—I thought I would venture a little with her. I stood still at a turn of the zigzag, and looked down into the hollow, still a good way below us, where I could now distinguish the form, on the opposite side of the pond, of a woman seated at the foot of a tree and stooping forward over a book.

"May I ask you a question, Miss Gladwyn?"

"Yes, twenty if you like; but I won't answer one of them till you give up calling me Miss Gladwyn. We can't be friends, you know, so long as you do that."

"What am I to call you, then? I never heard you called by any other name than Pet, and that would hardly do, would it?"

"Oh, just fancy if you called me Pet before grannie! That's grannie's name for me, and nobody dares to use it but grannie—not even auntie; for, between you and me, auntie is afraid of grannie; I can't think why. I never was afraid of anybody—except—yes, a little afraid of old Sarah. She used to be my nurse, you know; and grandmamma and everybody is afraid of her, and that's just why I never do one thing she wants me to do. It would never do to give in to being afraid of her, you know.—There's auntie, you see, down there, just where I told you before."

"Oh, yes, I see her now.—What does your aunt call you, then?"

"Why, what you must call me—my own name, of course."

"What is that?"

"Judy."

She said it in a tone which seemed to indicate surprise that I should not know her name—perhaps read it off her face, as one ought to know a flower's name by looking at it. But she added instantly, glancing up in my face most comically,

"I wish yours was Punch."

"Why, Judy?"

"It would be such fun, you know."

"Well, it would be odd, I must confess. What is your aunt's name?"

"Oh, such a funny name!—much funnier than Judy: Ethelwyn. It sounds as if it ought to mean something, doesn't it?"

"Yes. It is an Anglo-Saxon word, without doubt."

"What does it mean?"

"I'm not sure about that. I will try to find out when I go home—if you would like to know."

"Yes, that I should. I should like to know everything about Auntie Ethelwyn. Isn't it pretty?"

"So pretty that I should like to know something more about Aunt Ethelwyn. What is her other name?"

"Why, Ethelwyn Oldcastle, to be sure. What else could it be?"

"Why, you know, for anything I knew, Judy, it might have been Gladwyn. She might have been your father's sister."

"Might she? I never thought of that. Oh, I suppose that is because I never think about my father. And now I do think of it, I wonder why nobody ever mentions him to me, or my mother either. But I often think auntie must be thinking about my mother. Something in her eyes, when they are sadder than usual, seems to remind me of my mother."

"You remember your mother then?"

"No, I don't think I ever saw her. But I've answered plenty of questions, haven't I? I assure you, if you want to get me on to the Catechism, I don't know a word of it. Come along."

I laughed.

"What!" she said, pulling me by the hand, "you a clergyman, and laugh at the Catechism! I didn't know that."

"I'm not laughing at the Catechism, Judy. I'm only laughing at the idea of putting Catechism-questions to you."

"You know I didn't mean it," she said, with some indignation.

"I know now," I answered. "But you haven't let me put the only question I wanted to put."

"What is it?"

"How old are you?"

"Twelve. Come along."

And away we went down the rest of the stair.

When we reached the bottom, a winding path led us through the trees to the side of the pond, along which we passed to get to the other side.

And then all at once the thought struck me—why was it that I had never seen this auntie, with the lovely name, at church? Was she going to turn out another strange parishioner?

There she sat, intent on her book. As we drew near she looked up and rose, but did not come forward.

"Aunt Winnie, here's Mr. Walton," said Judy.

I lifted my hat and held out my hand. Before our hands met, however, a tremendous splash reached my ears from the pond. I started round. Judy had vanished. I had my coat half off, and was rushing to the pool, when Miss Oldcastle stopped me, her face unmoved, except by a smile, saying, "It's only one of that frolicsome child's tricks, Mr. Walton. It is well for you that I was here, though. Nothing would have delighted her more than to have you in the water too."

"But," I said, bewildered, and not half comprehending, "where is she?"

"There," returned Miss Oldcastle, pointing to the pool, in the middle of which arose a heaving and bubbling, presently yielding passage to the laughing face of Judy.

"Why don't you help me out, Mr. Walton? You said you could swim."

"No, I did not," I answered coolly. "You talked so fast, you did not give me time to say so."

"It's very cold," she returned.

"Come out, Judy dear," said her aunt. "Run home and change your clothes. There's a dear."

Judy swam to the opposite side, scrambled out, and was off like a spaniel through the trees and up the stairs, dripping and raining as she went.

"You must be very much astonished at the little creature, Mr. Walton."

"I find her very interesting. Quite a study."

"There never was a child so spoiled, and never a child on whom it took less effect for evil. I suppose such things do happen sometimes. She is really a good girl; though mamma, who has done all the spoiling, will not allow me to say she is good."

Here followed a pause, for, Judy disposed of, what should I say next? And the moment her mind turned from Judy, I saw a certain stillness—not a cloud, but the shadow of a cloud—come over Miss Oldcastle's face, as if she, too, found herself uncomfortable, and did not know what to say next. I tried to get a glance at the book in her hand, for I should know something about her at once if I could only see what she was reading. She never came to church, and I wanted to arrive at some notion of the source of her spiritual life; for that she had such, a single glance at her face was enough to convince me. This, I mean, made me even anxious to see what the book was. But I could only discover that it was an old book in very shabby binding, not in the least like the books that young ladies generally have in their hands.

And now my readers will possibly be thinking it odd that I have never yet said a word about what either Judy or Miss Oldcastle was like. If there is one thing I feel more inadequate to than another, in taking upon me to relate—it is to describe a lady. But I will try the girl first.

Judy was rosy, grey-eyed, auburn-haired, sweet-mouthed. She had confidence in her chin, assertion in her nose, defiance in her eyebrows, honesty and friendliness over all her face. No one, evidently, could have a warmer friend; and to an enemy she would be dangerous no longer than a fit of passion might last. There was nothing acrid in her; and the reason, I presume, was, that she had never yet hurt her conscience. That is a very different thing from saying she had never done wrong, you know. She was not tall, even for her age, and just a little too plump for the immediate suggestion of grace. Yet every motion of the child would have been graceful, except for the fact that impulse was always predominant, giving a certain jerkiness, like the hopping of a bird, instead of the gliding of one motion into another, such as you might see in the same bird on the wing.

There is one of the ladies.

But the other—how shall I attempt to describe her?

The first thing I felt was, that she was a lady-woman. And to feel that is almost to fall in love at first sight. And out of this whole, the first thing you distinguished would be the grace over all. She was rather slender, rather tall, rather dark-haired, and quite blue-eyed. But I assure you it was not upon that occasion that I found out the colour of her eyes. I was so taken with her whole that I knew nothing about her parts. Yet she was blue-eyed, indicating northern extraction—some centuries back perhaps. That blue was the blue of the sea that had sunk through the eyes of some sea-rover's wife and settled in those of her child, to be born when the voyage was over. It had been dyed so deep in-grayne, as Spenser would say, that it had never been worn from the souls of the race since, and so was every now and then shining like heaven out at some of its eyes. Her features were what is called regular. They were delicate and brave.—After the grace, the dignity was the next thing you came to discover. And the only thing you would not have liked, you would have discovered last. For when the shine of the courtesy with which she received me had faded away, a certain look of negative haughtiness, of withdrawal, if not of repulsion, took its place, a look of consciousness of her own high breeding—a pride, not of life, but of circumstance of life, which disappointed me in the midst of so much that was very lovely. Her voice was sweet, and I could have fancied a tinge of sadness in it, to which impression her slowness of speech, without any drawl in it, contributed. But I am not doing well as an artist in describing her so fully before my reader has become in the least degree interested in her. I was seeing her, and no words can make him see her.

Fearing lest some such fancy as had possessed Judy should be moving in her mind, namely, that I was, if not exactly going to put her through her Catechism, yet going in some way or other to act the clergyman, I hastened to speak.

"This is a most romantic spot, Miss Oldcastle," I said; "and as surprising as it is romantic. I could hardly believe my eyes when I looked out of the window and saw it first."

"Your surprise was the more natural that the place itself is not properly natural, as you must have discovered."

This was rather a remarkable speech for a young lady to make. I answered:

"I only know that such a chasm is the last thing I should have expected to find in this gently undulating country. That it is artificial I was no more prepared to hear than I was to see the place itself."

"It looks pretty, but it has not a very poetic origin," she returned. "It is nothing but the quarry out of which the old house at the top of it was built."

"I must venture to differ from you entirely in the aspect such an origin assumes to me," I said. "It seems to me a more poetic origin than any convulsion of Nature whatever would have been; for, look you," I said—being as a young man too much inclined to the didactic, "for, look you," I said—and she did look at me—"from that buried mass of rock has arisen this living house with its histories of ages and generations; and——"

Here I saw a change pass upon her face: it grew almost pallid. But her large blue eyes were still fixed on mine.

"And it seems to me," I went on, "that such a chasm made by the uplifting of a house therefrom, is therefore in itself more poetic than if it were even the mouth of an extinct volcano. For, grand as the motions and deeds of Nature are, terrible as is the idea of the fiery heart of the earth breaking out in convulsions, yet here is something greater; for human will, human thought, human hands in human labour and effort, have all been employed to build this house, making not only the house beautiful, but the place whence it came beautiful too. It stands on the edge of what Shelley would call its 'antenatal tomb'—now beautiful enough to be its mother—filled from generation to generation—"

Her face had grown still paler, and her lips moved as if she would speak; but no sound came from them.

I had gone on, thinking it best to take no notice of her paleness; but now I could not help expressing concern.

"I am afraid you feel ill, Miss Oldcastle."

"Not at all," she answered, more quickly than she had yet spoken.

"This place must be damp," I said. "I fear you have taken cold."

She drew herself up a little haughtily, thinking no doubt that after her denial I was improperly pressing the point. So I drew back to the subject of our conversation.

"But I can hardly think," I said, "that all this mass of stone could be required to build the house, large as it is. A house is not solid, you know."

"No," she answered. "The original building was more of a castle, with walls and battlements. I can show you the foundations of them still; and the picture, too, of what the place used to be. We are not what we were then. Many a cottage, too, has been built out of this old quarry. Not a stone has been taken from it for the last fifty years, though. Just let me show you one thing, Mr. Walton, and then I must leave you."

"Don't let me detain you a moment. I will go at once," I said; "though, if you would allow me, I should be more at ease if I might see you safe at the top of the stair first."

She smiled.

"Indeed, I am not ill," she answered; "but I have duties to attend to. Just let me show you this, and then you shall go with me back to mamma."

She led the way to the edge of the pond and looked into it. I followed, and gazed down into its depths, till my sight was lost in them. I could see no bottom to the rocky shaft."

"There is a strong spring down there," she said. "Is it not a dreadful place? Such a depth!"

"Yes," I answered; "but it has not the horror of dirty water; it is as clear as crystal. How does the surplus escape?"

"On the opposite side of the hill you came up, there is a well with a strong stream from it into the river."

"I almost wonder at your choosing such a place to read in. I should hardly like to be so near this pond," said I, laughing.

"Judy has taken all that away. Nothing in nature, and everything out of it, is strange to Judy, poor child! But just look down a little way into the water on this side. Do you see anything?"

"Nothing," I answered.

"Look again, against the wall of the pond," she said.

"I see a kind of arch or opening in the side," I answered.

"That is what I wanted you to see. Now, do you see a little barred window there, in the face of the rock, through the trees?"

"I cannot say I do," I replied.

"No. Except you know where it is—and even then—it is not so easy to find it. I find it by certain trees."

"What is it?"

"It is the window of a little room in the rock, from which a stair leads down through the rock to a sloping passage. That is the end of it you see under the water."

"Provided, no doubt," I said, "in case of siege, to procure water."

"Most likely; but not, therefore, confined to that purpose. There are more dreadful stories than I can bear to think of——"

Here she paused abruptly, and began anew.

"——As if that house had brought death and doom out of the earth with it. There was an old burial-ground here before the Hall was built."

"Have you ever been down the stair you speak of?" I said.

"Only part of the way," she answered. "But Judy knows every step of it. If it were not that the door at the top is locked, she would have dived through that archway now, and been in her own room in half the time. The child does not know what fear means."

We now moved away from the pond, towards the side of the quarry and the open-air staircase, which I thought must be considerably more pleasant than the other. I confess I longed to see the gleam of that water at the bottom of the dark sloping passage, though.

Miss Oldcastle accompanied me to the room where I had left her mother, and took her leave with merely a bow of farewell. I saw the old lady glance sharply from her to me as if she were jealous of what we might have been talking about.

"Grannie, are you afraid Mr. Walton has been saying pretty things to Aunt Winnie? I assure you he is not of that sort. He doesn't understand that kind of thing. But he would have jumped into the pond after me and got his death of cold if auntie would have let him. It was cold. I think I see you dripping now, Mr. Walton."

There she was in her dark corner, coiled up on a couch, and laughing heartily; but all as if she had done nothing extraordinary. And, indeed, estimated either by her own notions or practices, what she had done was not in the least extraordinary.

Disinclined to stay any longer, I shook hands with the grandmother, with a certain invincible sense of slime, and with the grandchild with a feeling of mischievous health, as if the girl might soon corrupt the clergyman into a partnership in pranks as well as in friendship. She followed me out of the room, and danced before me down the oak staircase, clearing the portion from the first landing at a bound. Then she turned and waited for me, who came very deliberately, feeling the unsure contact of sole and wax. As soon as I reached her, she said, in a half-whisper, reaching up towards me on tiptoe,—

"Isn't she a beauty?"

"Who? your grandmamma?" I returned.

She gave me a little push, her face glowing with fun. But I did not expect she would take her revenge as she did.

"Yes, of course," she answered, quite gravely. "Isn't she a beauty?"

And then, seeing that she had put me hors de combat, she burst into loud laughter, and, opening the hall-door for me, let me go without another word.

I went home very quietly, and, as I said, stepping with curious care—of which, of course, I did not think at the time—over the yellow and brown leaves that lay in the middle of the road.

OUR FATHER'S BUSINESS; OR, METHODS TO DO GOOD.

BY THE EDITOR.

I.—OUR MODEL.

The alarm, A child lost!—like the cry, A man overboard!—is one that goes to all hearts. I have known it stop the business, and engross all the interests of a rural neighbourhood. Leaving the shuttle on the loom, their cattle in the field, and ploughs standing idle in the furrow, while women wept and hoped and feared and prayed, men,—some on horseback and some on foot,—scoured the country; nor ceased at nightfall, but, with shouts and gleaming torches, pursued their search through trackless moor and forest. Even in cities, where there is less community of feeling, like a rock that, lifting up its head mid-river, and disturbing its even flow, stays for a moment the rush of waters, a lost child sobbing, crying in the street arrests the stream of passengers, and moves all to pity,—even those who have but time to ask, What is it? as, casting a kind glance on the distracted creature, they hurry on. There is a sight more touching than a child crying for its mother. It is a mother, flying through the streets with dishevelled hair and panting bosom, pallor on her cheek and terror in her eye, who cries for her child; while fancy, conjuring up all manner of horrid evils, with pictures of its dead form or unpitied sufferings, wrings her heart and almost shakes her reason.

Such a sight, when the crowds who had gathered from all parts of the country, and of the world indeed, taking their departure, had left Jerusalem to comparative repose, awakened the kind interest of many there. People had met such a woman at the dead of night; and had seen her by day going up and down the city addressing eager inquiries both to acquaintances and strangers,—looking more haggard and feeling more hopeless as the weary hours wore on, that gladdened her with neither sight nor tidings of her son. That woman was Mary, our Lord's mother. Three days has she sought Jesus; and nothing now remains to do but turn to God. All other, all earthly hope has failed her. Wan and weary, supported by the kind man and husband who had shared her sorrows, she turns her faltering steps to the house of God. She will cast her burden on the Lord, and commit her lost one to the care of his heavenly and only Father. And a mother who had more than any other a right to do so, and betake herself to that refuge in the hour of trouble, we seem to hear saying,

> I to the hills will lift mine eyes,
> From whence doth come mine aid;
> My safety cometh from the Lord,
> Who heaven and earth hath made.

Staggering beneath her burden, as much perhaps as Abraham when, to his amazement and consternation and horror, God addressed the patriarch, saying, "Take now thy son, thine only son Isaac, whom thou lovest, and offer him for a burnt-offering on a mountain that I will tell thee of," Mary enters the Temple with faith and foot faltering. What a revulsion of feeling at the sight which meets her astonished eyes! Ready to sink to the ground under the sudden emotion, she can hardly believe them. Is it a vision? Does she dream? No. 'Tis he—the very form, face, and voice of Jesus, her own lost and long-sought son. The centre of all eyes, of a crowd that hushed to silence regard him with gaping wonder,—wiser than the wisest, more subtle than the subtlest, he sits there among grey-haired elders, asking and answering questions.

Happy mother! whom we expect to see, regardless of all forms and of any presence, rush forward under the impulses of affection to throw her arms around her child, and cover him with impassioned kisses. But what strangely constituted creatures we are? We swing of a sudden, like a pendulum, from one state of feeling to another, and that perhaps the very opposite; as I once happened to see illustrated by a mother who had dared, and done a noble deed. Our horses, suddenly turning a corner, were going down at full gallop on a child that sat, heedless of danger, right in their path. To rein them in was impossible. Its death seemed inevitable; and we sat transfixed with horror to see it trodden beneath their hoofs, crushed below the wheels. At that fearful moment, a woman, stooping like a hawk on its prey, darted from a doorway across the road, and with the hot breath of our horses on her pallid cheek, plucked her infant from among their feet. It was bravely done. But what a strange revulsion of feeling succeeded her mortal fright? She did not, as we expected, clasp the child to her beating bosom; cover it with kisses; or drop on her knees to give thanks to God for her own and its hairbreadth escape. The feeling of terror suddenly gave place to a violent burst of anger; and, resenting the alarm the child had given her, she gave it a sound, sharp beating.

In this incident we found a key to explain what had always seemed the strange conduct of Jesus' mother on finding her son; and, also, what we have ever since regarded as one of the many indirect evidences, but of all the most satisfactory, of the truth of Scripture. In the hands of a novelist, for example, the part Mary acted would have assumed a quite different character. What a pathetic scene we should have had?—the mother in transports of gratitude throwing herself on her knees, and rising in transports of joy to throw herself on the neck of her child, and cry as she clasped him to her beating bosom: "My son that was dead is alive again, that was lost is found!" Far more true to nature—as I saw her on her trial—the evangelist shows us Mary acting another part; displaying no such dramatic pathos. In her, as in that other mother, anger, or a feeling akin to it, seems to have suddenly succeeded to terror; and going up to Jesus, not to fall on his neck and kiss him, but to complain of the fright he has given her, with, I cannot help fancying, displeasure in her look, and harshness in her tones, she addresses him, saying, "Son, why hast thou thus dealt with us? behold, thy father and I have sought thee sorrowing." A sharp question this. In reply Jesus, with mingled looks of love and dignity, turns to Mary, and, fixing on her those eyes which penetrated others' thoughts, but had often strange, deep, mysterious meanings of their own, he gently remonstrates, saying, "How is it that ye sought me? wist ye not that I must be about my Father's business?" Though not intended on her son's part, Mary may possibly have felt in this reply the sharp edge of a rebuke. No wonder at least that on receiving such an answer from the lips of such a child, for Jesus was then but twelve years old, that she was struck with it, pondered it, tried to sound its depths, and waiting for further light on its mysterious meanings, kept it in her heart. So may we keep it in ours; not, however, as a mystery, but a truth; signally illustrated and fully explained by the consecration of Christ's labours, and life, and death to the glory of God and the salvation of men. This was his Father's business. And in dedicating his life to such lofty purposes, Jesus supplies us with a model on which to fashion our own.

This is of the highest importance; what concerns the end and manner of our life being of far more consequence than anything that belongs to the nature and circumstances of our death. It is natural I admit, to take a lively interest in the scenes of the dying chamber, the expressions and experience of departing saints; yet so little countenance does this feeling receive from Scripture that the Bible, which contains a pretty full account of the lives of many saints, is, in almost every instance, silent on the subject of their deaths. One after another, they appear on the stage to play their different parts. But the curtain usually drops as the last act begins; and the saint vanishes from sight with some such brief, simple record as this: "he died," or "he was gathered to his fathers," or "angels carried him to Abraham's bosom." In regard to this, one cannot but be struck with the marked difference between God's lives of the saints and those which man writes—in fact, most of our biographies. And may not the manner in which the Bible drops a veil over the last scene be intended to warn us against attaching much importance to dying frames—to teach us this great lesson, that, in all but a very few exceptional cases, our destiny in eternity turns on the way we pass our life, not on the way we close it? Who lives by faith, who lives to Christ, however he dies, shall find death to be gain. He who takes care of the nature of his life need feel no anxiety whatever about the character or issues of his death—the great question we should ask respecting others, and which shall one day be asked respecting us, being, not How did he die, but How did he live?

The close of the seasons often supplies a criterion of their character; stubble-fields where the sheaves stand thick and tall, farm-yards swollen with the fruits of a lavish harvest, speak of an early spring and a genial summer, long days bright with sunshine and soft with showers. The close of a voyage also often reveals its character. From the pier-head where I have watched a homeward-bound ship enter the harbour, I could tell from her condition the weather she had encountered on distant seas—sails blown to tatters, bulwarks gone by the board, the stump of a mast rising ragged from her deck told the story of the voyage, and how the weather-beaten crew, who now congratulate each other as she floats into the dock, had battled with giant waves and well-nigh perished in the roaring tempest. But the close of man's life affords no such means of judging of its character. I have indeed seen death-beds, not a few, to which I could point, saying, "Mark thou the perfect man and behold the upright, for the latter end of that man is peace;" where the chamber of death seemed the vestibule of heaven; and after reading how Lazarus was borne by angels to Abraham's bosom, one almost expected to see their celestial forms and hear the rustling of their wings. How bright his sunset, for example, what a blessed peace his, who said to the friend that watched by his side, "If I am able to hear when the last moment approaches, be sure to tell me of it. I should like so well to know that a few breaths more, a short struggle more, and I am in glory with my Lord and Saviour."

But so to die, to go up to Mount Zion with songs and everlasting joy upon their heads, to travel the dark valley singing, with the shout and step of a conqueror, trampling the last enemy beneath our feet, to expire with Christ's dear name trembling on our lips—that name our last word on earth, as it shall be the first we raise our hands to speak in heaven—is not granted to all who close at death a life of true love to God and saving faith in his Son. Some saints have died raving mad; others in dark despair; not a few in deep despondency—their cry an echo of the cross, My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me?—their faith finding in the disease of which they were dying what the sun finds in the cloud-bank behind which he sinks, a veil to obscure his light and conceal his glorious form. On the other hand, death is often preceded by an apathy, a listlessness, an obtuseness of feeling which renders the mind incapable of anxiety or alarm; and passes with many thoughtless ones for the peace of God. Thus the wicked have sometimes "no bands in their death;" nay, sometimes under delirium and a fevered brain, impenitent sinners die amid visions of glory, and with expressions of divinest rapture on their lips. In fact, the frame in which people die depends so much on the nature of their disease, so much on constitutional tendencies, so much on many accidental circumstances, that it forms no safe standard whereby to judge either what was their character in this world, or what is their condition in the next. By its fruit the tree is known. According to the deeds done in the body, whether they were good or evil, is the last award. The judgment at God's bar turns not on the character of men's deaths, but of their lives; and therefore the question which determines whether heaven or hell shall be our portion is not, how we died, but how we lived?

In these circumstances it is a great advantage to possess in God's Word not only full instructions how to live, but in his Son, what is more valuable than volumes of instuctions, a model, a perfect model, after which to shape our lives. One of the dangerous tendencies of these times is to thrust Calvary and its cross into the background—to modify, and by modifying to emasculate, Paul's grand saying, "I am determined not to know anything among you, but Jesus Christ and him crucified." Jesus Christ they know, but not him crucified—not Him as a sacrifice for sin and the substitute of sinners, as fulfilling in our stead the demands of the divine law, satisfying the claims of justice, and reconciling the offender to an offended God. This is a vital, a cardinal doctrine. Who holds it fast will find the gates of hell shall not prevail against him. Plainly announcing it long ages ago, Isaiah said, "He was wounded for our transgressions, he was bruised for our iniquities: the chastisement of our peace was upon him; and with his stripes we are healed;" and believing it, thousands since then have gone through the river to find the flood of Jordan part before the feet of the Priest. But as many others have been, the present error may be a reaction from an opposite but also an erroneous position; the tendency of our minds being, under the law of action and reaction, to swing from one extreme to another. What if God, by permitting an error which disparages fundamental doctrines and rings senseless changes on a personal Christ, to disturb the Church, and lead some astray, may be rebuking men for having dwelt, not too much on Christ as a Propitiation, but too little on Christ as a Pattern. Valiant for the truth, and holding it fast, let us resent a heresy which, making light of the infinite evil of sin and the infinite holiness of God's law, must end in making light of the Saviour it professes to honour. At the same time, like wise men, we may extract the honey while we reject the sting; and learn from these errors, not to look at Christ's death less, but at his life more: not to trust in him less as a Mediator, but to copy him more as a Model.

A sense of the hopelessness of such an attempt may hinder it being made. People say, Who can succeed in modelling their life on Christ's—making their lives a fair and graceful copy of his? To rise to such thoughts as his seems as impossible for us as for a bird of humble roost to follow the eagle when, springing from her rocky nest, she soars aloft, cleaving the sky till her lessening form is lost in its azure depths. We are required to make our light shine before men: but to shine with the light of such works as Christ's seems as impossible for us as for a taper that burns its little hour to blaze like the sun, when, rising each morning with unabated and unabating splendour, he bathes air, and earth, and ocean in one flood of light. To live like Christ!—ah, who is sufficient for these things? For fallen man to attempt it seems presumption—Scripture, and our own sad experience teaching us that we are not able of ourselves to think even one good thought?

Nevertheless the motto of a Christian is Nil desperandum—I despair of nothing. With resources to draw on of which the world knows nothing, if our faith is in any degree commensurate with God's faithfulness, we may address ourselves to duties the most difficult, saying, "Who art thou, O great mountain? Before Zerubbabel thou shalt become a plain." In this the believer is no fanatic, or fool; no builder of castles in the air. He knows in whom he has believed; and what in others were the highest presumption, is in him a solid, well-founded trust. With God nothing is impossible; nor impossible with one who, responding to a divine call, holds God's Word in his hand, and feels God himself at his back. It may be held an axiom of the Christian faith, that everything commanded is come-at-able—"I can do all things," says Paul, "through Christ, who strengtheneth me."

To attempt to live like Christ is no doubt a high, as it is a holy, object. To sing like Milton, to make discoveries like Newton, to climb the lofty solitude of the Macedonian who achieved the conquest of the world, are mean in comparison with it. Since Christ united the divine to our human nature, who takes him for a model aims, if I may say so, at being a God in miniature,—at presenting in the beneficence of his life, in a pure heart and a holy nature, such an image of the Godhead as we see of the sun in the lake that shines in his light, and reflects his dazzling form on its placid bosom. Scripture calls us to take prophets and martyrs, apostles and saints, for models—to walk in the footsteps of the flock; and reading the lives of the great and the good, we are to catch their spirit, and inflame our piety at their fires. But, without despising or disparaging these, we are to look higher still. Though his back is bent with toil, and his manners are rustic, and he has no home but a cot, and knows little of books beyond his Bible, the most ambitious of men, and yet the humblest, the believer, is inspired with the loftiest aims. His aim is not to be holy, as Paul, or Peter, or John, or saints in glory, or even the angels before the throne. It is as God is holy that he seeks to be holy,—perfect as his Father in heaven is perfect—in nature, though not in measure; just as in nature, though not in measure, the tiniest cup that is filled to the lip is as full as the great sea at flood-tide.

But there is a view of Christ as our model which makes the imitation of him appear less impracticable; for, as the great circle of the heavens seems to bend towards, and touch, and embrace the earth at the horizon, so the Son of the Most High, though exalted apparently above all approach in his divinity, appears near to us in his humanity. In that nature he presents us with a model we may more hopefully attempt to imitate. How should it encourage us to attempt it, and, not disheartened by successive failures, to try it again and again, to remember that Jesus, though without sin, was made in all points like his brethren,—bone of our bone, and flesh of our flesh; with a heart strung in every respect like our own? Animated by the breath of God, the dust of Palestine, like that of Paradise, could have produced, in the second Adam, a man with every faculty mature. But Jesus sprang into being like one of us. He despised not the Virgin's womb; and passed through all the common phases of human life—his condition and connections in the world in no apparent manner differing from ours. A babe, he was rocked in a cradle and fed at the breast like others. A child, he had the feelings, and entered into the common joys of childhood; he might have been seen in his night-dress lisping prayers at his mother's knee; nor was he made in all points like as we are if he stood apart from the innocent sports of the boys and girls of Nazareth. A man, he went to church on Sabbath; and on other days, the sun lighting its Maker to his daily toil, he wrought at a bench, and ate his bread in the sweat of his brow. He was bound to others by the ordinary ties of humanity—this man was a cousin; these were his brethren and sisters; and, among the women who followed him to Calvary, and wept by his cross, she on whose form, as it sinks fainting into John's arms, his last earthly look is fixed, is his mother. Indeed, so like was he in all things to his brethren that, until the last three years of his life, his townsmen never seem to have suspected who or what Jesus was,—that he was any thing more than Joseph's son. They never so much as fancied that the God of their worship was present in the synagogue; that the Messiah, of whose glorious coming the preacher discoursed in glowing colours, was there—in the meek, modest, gentle, unassuming man who sat by Mary, listening to the sermon.

And for what purpose did the Son of God thus identify himself with our humanity? In tasting every common cup—the obedience of childhood and labours of manhood, the pleasures of friendship and the sharp arrows of ingratitude, the kindness of affection and the cold neglects of selfishness, the joy of feasts and the grief of funerals, all they suffer who toil for daily bread, or, animated with philanthropy, toil in the cause of others—our Lord not only thereby became a High Priest to sympathise with and succour us, as one touched with a feeling of our infirmities, but, leaving his footprints on the sands of time, he became an Example that we should follow his steps. Would any one know how to live, let him turn to Christ's history and read it there. See how he lived devoted to the glory of God and the good of men; how he made it his meat and drink to do his Father's will, and also reverenced and obeyed his parents; how he honoured the Sabbath Day, and kept the whole law of God; how, neither envious of the rich, nor ambitious to rise above his circumstances, he submitted to a humble lot, and patiently endured its trials; how he bore a life-long humiliation with contentment, and his few brief honours with humility; how he cherished his friends, and forgave his bitterest enemies; how, gently rebuking the bad, and kindly raising the fallen, instructing the ignorant, helping the weak, shielding the oppressed, pitying all that sorrowed, relieving all that suffered, loving all that lived, he lived for others, not for himself. In these things he set us an example. And, as I have seen a weaver on his loom working the beautiful flowers of a pattern into his web, let us by God's gracious help try to weave a copy of Christ's life into the body of our own. Men of God, for you no better shield against temptation, or stouter buckler in a battle-day, no better curb to pull us up on the edge of sin, nor sharper spur to urge us onward in the path of duty, than a constant imitation of Christ; the habit of bringing all our conduct to this holy test—Had Christ been in my circumstances, how would he have acted?—Would he have felt, would he have spoken, would he have acted as I am doing? The Spirit helping us, we shall thus become living epistles of Jesus Christ, seen and read of all men; true followers of him whose history is summed up in this brief but weighty sentence, "He went about doing good." With aims no less lofty, let his holy, beautiful beneficent life be the model of ours; and its motto—nobler than any ever blazoned on banners of silk, in letters of gold, and borne before the greatest kings—its motto this: TO ME TO LIVE IS CHRIST, AND TO DIE IS GAIN.

TO-MORROW.

How sweet to the heart is the thought of to-morrow,
When Hope's lovely pictures bright colours display!
How sweet, when we can from futurity borrow
A balm for the griefs that afflict us to-day!

When wearisome sickness has made us to languish
For health, and the comforts it bears on its wing,
We can trust that our Saviour will lessen the anguish,—
That to-morrow new proofs of his mercy shall bring.

When trav'ling alone, quite forlorn, unbefriended,
Sweet the hope that to-morrow our wand'rings will cease;
That at home then, with care sympathetic attended,
We may rest unmolested, and slumber in peace.

Or when from the friends of our heart long divided,
The fond expectation with joy how replete!
That from far distant regions, by Providence guided,
To-morrow shall see us most happily meet.

When six days of labour, each other succeeding,
With hurry and toil have our spirits opprest,
What pleasure to think, as the last is receding,
To-morrow shall be a sweet Sabbath of rest!

And when the vain shadows of Time are retiring,
When life is fast fleeting, and death is in sight,
The Christian, believing, exulting, expiring,
Beholds a to-morrow of endless delight.

WEIGHTS AND MEASURES.

Very few people seem to have noticed how much there is in the Bible about "Weights and Measures." When the Tabernacle was erected, all the parts of the building and all its sacred furniture were constructed according to "specifications" curiously exact and minute. We are told the precise length of the wings of the cherubim in Solomon's Temple, and how much water the "molten sea" would hold. What is more remarkable still, we know the "length" and the "breadth" and the "height" of "the house of the forest of Lebanon," and the shape of its windows and doors, and the number of its cedar pillars.

It is probable that standard weights and standard measures were deposited by Moses in the Tabernacle itself, and were transferred by Solomon to the Temple. In doing this the Jews would only follow the example of other ancient nations. In the old world, the sanctity of religion was added to the authority of public law, to check dishonesty, and to prevent, as far as possible, any accidental changes in the authorised measures of length, weight, and capacity. The care with which this part of the duty of the State was attended to in Egypt, may perhaps soon receive a new and most remarkable illustration; investigations are being carried on which many think will result in proving that the great Pyramid—the wonder and the riddle of so many centuries—was built to contain the standard weights and measures.

Very many of the readers of the Sunday Magazine are engaged in trade; it may be well that they should see, for once, some of the things which the Bible says about things which they are handling every day in the week all the year round.

In Leviticus xix. 36, God says, "Just balances, just weights . . . . shall ye have: I am the Lord your God, which brought you out of the land of Egypt."

In Deuteronomy xxv. 13, the Jew is told "Thou shalt not have in thy bag divers weights, a great and a small [great, that is, to purchase with, and small to sell by]. But thou shalt have a perfect and just weight, a perfect and just measure shalt thou have: that thy days may be lengthened in the land which the Lord thy God giveth thee. For all that do such things, and all that do unrighteously, are an abomination unto the Lord thy God."

In the book of Proverbs there are such sayings as this:—"A false balance is an abomination to the Lord: but a just weight is his delight" (ch. xi. 1).

In the writings of the Prophets, too, we find very much on this unromantic and commonplace and unspiritual subject. Those inspired men were not always speaking of the coming of Christ, or forecasting the dark destiny of great Pagan empires; they were in the habit of denouncing very resolutely dishonesty in the matter of weights and measures. Ezekiel says, "Ye shall have just balances" (ch. xlv. 10). Hosea says of Ephraim, "He is a merchant, the balances of deceit are in his hand: he loveth to oppress" (ch. xii. 7). Micah asks, "Are there yet the treasures of wickedness in the house of the wicked, and the scant measure that is abominable? Shall I count them pure with the wicked balances, and with the bag of deceitful weights?" (ch. vi. 10, 11). Amos exclaims, "Hear this, O ye that swallow up the needy, even to make the poor of the land to fail, saying, When will the new moon be gone, that we may sell corn? and the sabbath, that we may set forth wheat, making the ephah small"—the ephah was the measure they sold the corn by,—"and the shekel great"—the shekel was the weight by which they weighed the money of those that bought it; so that they cheated both ways, giving short measure and taking too much money in return.

Of course, the plain lesson these texts are meant to teach is, that all cheating in weights and measures is hateful to God. Those who are guilty of it commit an injustice against man, and they provoke God's anger. We have got into a bad habit of being amused by the dishonest tricks to which many tradesmen resort in their haste to get rich. These texts teach that every trick of this kind is observed by God's eye, is recorded in God's book, and will be punished by God's hand.

I fear that there is not a solitary trade in which these dishonesties are not largely practised. Scales are tampered with; measures have false bottoms. Boxes of nails are sent to every part of the world

"warranted to contain a thousand," and containing only seven hundred and fifty. Bottles have gradually degenerated in size, until nobody now expects a quart bottle to hold a quart, or a pint bottle to hold a pint. Reels of cotton marked "120 yards" measure only eighty. The four-pound loaf is said to weigh less than four pounds—eleven ounces less, sometimes—if delivered at the house instead of being sold over the counter. You can have your meat full weight if you carry your basket on your arm to the butcher's; but it is said to be often very much under weight when sent to customers whose accounts are booked. I have heard of several yards more trimming being found in a dress-maker's bill than could possibly have been used in the lady's dress. I have heard of a master painter, who charged his customers according to his men's time, telling a man who was working at the decoration of a drawing-room that he was going on a great deal too fast; and the work that would have been done in four or five days was made to stretch over ten or twelve, the man spending three or four hours every day in reading quietly by the fire.

All these things are neither more nor less than an "abomination to the Lord;" they are not to be laughed at; they are not to be tolerated; they are to be sternly condemned.

For some of these dishonest practices the excuse is often made, that the seller himself has been cheated in buying, and that in self-protection he has a right to cheat in selling; he got short measure himself, so he gives it to his customer,—"which excuse," to use the language of Dr. Paley, in reference to passing bad money, "is much the same as if one who had been robbed upon the highway, should allege that he had a right to reimburse himself out of the pocket of the first traveller he met; the justice of which reasoning the traveller may not comprehend."

There is another form of dishonesty very near akin to giving bad measure and short weight, which Paley has also exposed with his usual clearness and felicity. I mean putting an unfair price on what is sold. He says, "Whoever opens a shop, or in any manner exposes goods to public sale, virtually engages to deal with his customers at a market price; because it is upon the faith and opinion of such an engagement, that any one comes within his shop-doors or offers to treat with him. This is expected by the buyer, is known to be expected by the seller." And so Paley argues, that when more than the market price is charged, there is a breach of an implied contract, and therefore an act of dishonesty. I know that there may be some difficulty in always determining how this principle is to be applied, but the principle itself s obviously just. You cannot reduce a moral law to the form of an equation.

Men sometimes ask how they are to make their business a part of their religion. This is one way —to remember that "a false balance is an abomination to the Lord," and to set it right if you have one; to remember that "a just weight is his delight," and to find satisfaction and joy in thinking that God himself is pleased when you sell as good an article as your customer has a right to expect, give full measure, and charge a fair price. There is a very remarkable sentence in the Book of Proverbs—"A just weight and balance are the Lord's; and the weights of the bag are his work." It is equally true that an unjust balance is the devil's, and that if the weights are not true, they bear the devil's stamp and name.

Some persons may think, perhaps, that this is a very unspiritual article; but then the Bible is a very "unspiritual" book. God forbid that I should depreciate those lofty acts of the soul in which it holds communion with the invisible God, meditates on the infinite love of Christ, strives to penetrate more deeply into the mysterious glory of his atonement for sin, and lays open every channel through which those streams of spiritual life and power can flow which have their springs in the living God. Let those who are content with morality and uprightness of conduct, and are indifferent to religious duty, be assured that there is an unearthly peace, a heavenly joy, a blessedness like that of the angels, for every one who has learnt the happy secret of dwelling in the light of the Divine presence. When the heart glows with devout affection, and the spirit sinks in prostrate worship, and the eye gazes on the glory of Christ, Heaven comes down to earth, and the promises of immortal bliss begins to be fulfilled.

But I repeat, that in the sense in which some good people use the word "spiritual," the Bible is in many parts extremely unspiritual. They say themselves that they must "spiritualise" many passages in the Old Testament, and some in the New, to find any such instruction and profit as they are always asking for. They forget that the words of inspired men were not written to be read only on Sundays; that they were not written for persons who have nothing to do but to pray. The first lesson that Holy Scripture teaches is unlearnt, if we have not discovered that God is interested in all the affairs of our daily life, and judges us not merely by our prayers and religious affections but by our works.

There is no occupation in which man can be lawfully engaged, in which he may not see God. The tens of thousands of rough fellows who are working underground in South Staffordshire, are getting out of the earth the iron God himself put there. The tens of thousands of men, women, and children in the workshops of Birmingham are melting, moulding, hammering, and stamping the metals God himself made. It was God who created the cotton-plant out of which the Lancashire people manufacture their calicoes. It was God who created the silk-worm that spins the cocoon for all workers in silk. The first part of the process in every form of manufacturing industry is done by God. He always finds the material; and that material has been produced by most complicated methods, and by methods which in many cases have taken thousands of years to complete and perfect their results. It is plain that He meant us to employ our hands in honest labour, as well as our lips in thankful praise; that He meant our brains to be active in planning, inventing, and scheming, in relation to this world, as well as our hearts in longing and hoping for the next. He made our bodies of the dust which belongs to the earth, though He breathed into us a higher life, which unites us to Himself. And so the Bible has very much in it about common work, as well as about religious duty. In the "book of remembrance," there are pages not only for our Sundays, but for every day in the week besides. "The prayer of the wicked is an abomination to the Lord;" "a false balance" is an abomination to Him too. That religion is worthless which has to do only with books of devotion, and not with day-books and ledgers; with pews and churches, and not with counting-houses and workshops; with prayers and sermons, and not with "weights and measures."

In the Ten Commandments there are only four which refer to duties we owe directly to God; there are six which refer to duties we owe to our fellow men. All through the Bible we are repeatedly reminded that God has his eye upon us at all times; and that to please Him we must "do justly," as well as "love mercy, and walk humbly with our God."

There are some persons who plead, in excuse for their own irreligion, that in secular affairs religious men are no better than other people. If they are not, they ought to be. I believe that, as a rule, they are. If not, how is it that when a religious banker has been guilty of using securities entrusted to his keeping, the whole country rings with his crime, and there is so much sneering and triumph at the expense of religion itself? We do not make such a stir when a man who makes no profession of faith in Christ is guilty of the same thing. We do not put articles in our religious newspapers, headed in large capitals, "Doings of an irreligious banker." How is it that if a minister is betrayed into grievous sin, the scandal of his fall is kept alive for years? If another man commits the same offence it is soon forgotten.

There have been many bank failures during the last twenty years; but the failure of Sir John Dean Paul is likely to be remembered after all the rest are forgotten. There were hundreds of men hung for forgery in the last century; I doubt whether ten readers of the SUNDAY MAGAZINE could tell me the name of any one of them except Dr. Dodd. Of the people that fill our gaols, that are sent to our penal colonies, that are brought up before the magistrates for drunkenness and disorder, I wonder whether one in a thousand is a communicant in any Christian church.

However this may be, it is plain that if people who profess to be Christians give short weight and bad measure it is not the fault of the Bible. If a shopman who robs the till on Saturday night goes to church on Sunday morning, he hears nothing at church to make him think that his crime against man is no sin against God. If a father who professes to be religious, gives way to a bad temper and "provokes his children to wrath," it is not from the Bible he learns to do it; if he read his Bible properly he would know better. If a master professes to be a Christian, and is guilty of using harsh and violent language to the people he employs, do not blame his Christian faith: that teaches him to "forbear threatening," reminds him that he has "a Master in heaven," and that "there is no respect of persons with Him."

It is the shallowest and weakest reasoning in the world to argue against religion because some religious people do wrong; their religion condemns their wrongdoing as heavily as human censure can condemn it. If they are earnestly religious, they will gradually become better.

I cannot close this paper without recalling the solemn truth, that God's laws for our conduct to each other are a revelation of his own character, and are in strict analogy to the laws which determine his own action towards his creatures. The time is coming when He will judge every man; and He will use no false balance, He will put into the scales no light weights. He is merciful as well as just; but now is the time for mercy. When He judges He will judge righteously. He will "weigh" the reasons and motives which led men to neglect public worship and private prayer. He will "weigh" the temptations which betray us into sin against the considerations which should have led us to do right. He will "weigh" our love for Himself, and our obedience to his law against his infinite grace; our trust in his goodness and submission to his hand in times of trouble, against his "exceeding great and precious promises;" our religious earnestness, our loyalty to Christ, our triumphs over sin, against the sanctifying power of Christian truth and the grace of the Holy Ghost. We might well tremble in the anticipation of the hour when, one by one, we shall wait for the divine sentence on our deeds; but our rest and hope are fixed in this, that the critical act of the soul, in God's judgment, is its acceptance or rejection of the mercy of the Lord Jesus; and that if we trust in Him we shall not only be justified by faith in this world, but shall be so strengthened for all good works that God himself, when He looks at our deeds, will be able to say, "Well done, good and faithful servants; enter ye into the joy of your Lord."

IN THE LIFE OF OUR LORD.

THE TWO HEALINGS—THE LEPER AND THE PARALYTIC.

Matt. viii. 2—4; Mark i. 40—45, ii. 1—12; Luke v. 12—26.

In describing our Lord's first circuit through Galilee, the Evangelist tells us that "they brought unto him all sick people that were taken with divers diseases and torments, and those which were possessed with devils, and those which were lunatick, and those that had the palsy; and he healed them" (Matt. iv. 24). How many and how varied were the cures effected within the course of this first itinerary of our Lord can only be conceived aright by remembering how numerous the towns and villages were through which He passed, and how large the population with which, one way or other, He was thrown into contact. Remembering this, we may believe that within a week or two after his first departure from Capernaum more healings were effected than the whole put together, of which any specific record has been preserved in the Four Gospels.

There was one form of disease, however, which is not noticed in St. Matthew's compendious description—a disease peculiar enough in its own character, but to which an additional peculiarity was attached by the manner in which it was dealt with under the Mosaic law. However infectious, however deadly, however incurable, no disease but one was held to render the victim of it ceremonially unclean. Such uncleanliness was stamped by the law upon the leper alone. This strange creeping, spreading, loathsome, fatal disease appears to have been selected as the one form of bodily affliction to stand, in the legal impurity attached to it, and in the penalties visited on that impurity, the type of the deep, inward, pervading, corrupting, destroying malady of sin.

Among the Jews the leper was excommunicated. Cut off from the congregation of the people, he had to live apart, enjoying only such society as those afflicted with the same disease could offer. He had to bear about with him on his person the emblems of sorrow and of death; had to wear the rent garments which those wore who were weeping for the dead; to shave his head and keep it bare as those had to do who had touched the dead—himself the living dead, for whom those emblems of mourning were to be assumed. His face half covered, he had to go about crying out, "Unclean, unclean," to warn all others off lest they should come too near to him.

From what we know of the prevalence of this disease, it may be believed that there were many lepers in Galilee when our Lord made his first journey through it—gathered here and there into small and miserable communities. Even among these the tidings of the wonderful cures that were being effected could circulate (for the segregation was not so complete as to prevent all intercourse); and when these poor exiles from their fellows heard of many visited with complaints as much beyond all human remedy as theirs being healed, the hope might spring up in their hearts that the Great Healer's powers might extend even to their case. But which of them had faith enough to make the trial—to break through the legal fences imposed, and go into any of the cities in which Jesus was, and throw himself upon his sympathy for succour? One such there was—the first of those so afflicted—who ventured to approach the Lord: his case, on that account, selected for special record by all the three Evangelists. He came to Jesus "when he was in a certain city."* He had never seen the Lord before, or seen Him but at a distance, among a crowd. He could have known or heard but little more about Him than what the voice of the general rumour proclaimed. Yet so soon as he recognises Him, see with what reverence he kneels and worships and falls on his face before Him (Luke v. 12), and hear how he salutes and pleads, "Lord, if thou wilt, thou canst make me clean." Perhaps Jesus never before saw a man prostrate himself in his presence as this man does. Certainly, Jesus was never before addressed in words so few and simple, yet so full of reverence, earnestness, faith, submission. He calls Jesus Lord. Was this the first time that Jesus had been so addressed? Sir, Rabbi, Master—these were the terms in which Andrew, and Nathanael, and Nicodemus, and the woman of Samaria, and the nobleman of Capernaum, had addressed Him. None of them had spoken to Him as this leper does. If, indeed, the miraculous draught of fishes by which Peter had been finally summoned away from his old occupation had already occurred, then it would be from his lips that this title was first heard coming, when he fell down at Jesus' feet exclaiming, "Depart from me, for I am a sinful man, O Lord." That, however, is uncertain; but though it had been true, how much had Simon had to elevate his conception of Christ's character,—how little this leper! One wonders, indeed, how far on he had got in his idea of who this Jesus—this healer of diseases—was. All that we can know is that he chose the highest title that he knew of, and bestowed it on him. "Lord, if thou wilt, thou canst." No hesitation as to the power; no presumption or dictation as to the will. Upon that firm will, upon that almighty power, he casts himself. "Lord, if thou wilt, thou canst make me clean." Jesus instantly went forward—went close to him—put forth his hand and touched him. His disciples hold back; a strange shuddering sensation passes through the hearts of the onlookers, for, by the law of Moses, it was forbidden to touch a leper. He who touched a leper became himself unclean. Yet at once, without hesitation at the time—without acting afterwards as if he had contracted any defilement or required any purification—Jesus lays his hand upon one who was "full of leprosy," and he says to him, "I will, be thou clean." We lose a little of the power and majesty of our Saviour's answer in our tongue. Two words were spoken (Θέλω, καθαρίσθητι), the answer, the echo to the prayer; two of the very words the man had used taken up and employed by Jesus in framing his prompt and gracious reply. No petition that was ever presented to Jesus met with a quicker, more complete, more satisfactory response. If our Lord's conduct in this instance was regulated by the principle which we know so often guided it in the treatment He gave to those who came to Him to be cured, great must have been the faith which was met in such a way. The readiness, indeed, which Jesus had displayed to exert his power may partly have been due to this being the first case of a leper's application to Him, and to his desire to show that no legal barrier would be allowed by Him to stand in the way of his stretching forth his hand to heal all that were diseased. Yet, the manner and the speech of the leper himself attest that he approached with no ordinary reverence, and petitioned with no ordinary faith. And, according to his faith, it was done unto him immediately. As soon as the words, "I will, be thou clean," had come from the Saviour's lips, "the leprosy departed from him, and he was cleansed."

* Had the name of that city been given it might have helped to track the course that Jesus was taking, but here, as in many other instances, the means of identification are denied.

Did any further colloquy take place between the healed and the Healer? When, quick as lightning, through the frame the sensation passed of an entirely recovered health—when he stood up before the Lord, not a sign or symptom of the banished leprosy on his person—did no thanks burst from his grateful lips? or did our Lord say nothing to him about another healing which He was both willing and able to effect? We are not to infer that nothing of the kind occurred because nothing is recorded. The Evangelists have preserved alone the fact that, whatever words may have passed between them, Jesus was in haste to send the leper away, and in doing so gave him strict command to tell no man, but to go instantly and show himself to the priest, and offer the gifts that Moses commanded—the live birds and the cedar wood, and the scarlet and hyssop,—the means and instruments by which the purification of one declared free of leprosy was to be effected, and, relieved from the ban that had been laid upon him, he was to be reinstated in the possession of all the common privileges of society and citizenship. It is quite possible that, knowing the opposition which was already kindling against Him, of which we shall presently see traces, Jesus may have desired that, without throwing out any hint of what had occurred which might precede him by the way and prejudice the judge, this man should repair as quickly as possible to the priest upon whom it devolved judicially to declare that he so recently a man full of leprosy was now entirely free of the complaint. It would be a testimony they could not well gainsay, if the fact of the departure of the leprosy were attested by the acceptance of the offerer's gifts and his re-admission into the congregation of Israel. To prevent any possibility of this ratification of the reality of the cure being refused, Jesus might have enjoined silence and as speedy a resort as possible to the priest: the silence in such circumstances and with such a view prescribed to last only till the desired end was gained. It would seem, however, from the result, that a more immediate object of the Saviour in laying this injunction upon the leper was to prevent the influx of a still greater crowd than that which was already oppressing Him—the hampering thus of his movements and the absorption of too much of his time in the mere work of healing. For straightway, though charged to keep silence, the man when he went away from Jesus could not restrain himself, but "began to publish it much, and to blaze abroad the matter, insomuch that great multitudes came to be healed of their infirmities, and Jesus could no more openly enter into the city, but was without in desert places, and withdrew himself into the wilderness and prayed" (Mark i. 45, Luke v. 15, 16). Again, a second time, as it was after that busy Sabbath in Capernaum, and before his first journey through Galilee, so now, at the close of this circuit and under the pressure of the multitude that beset his path, Jesus is driven forth from the city's crowded haunts to seek his solitary place, where for some hours at least he may enjoy unbroken communion with Heaven. To watch how and when it was that He took refuge thus in prayer, mingling devotion with activity, the days of bustle with the hours of quiet, intercourse with man with fellowship with God, let this be one of our cherished employments to follow the earthly footsteps of our Lord: for nothing more than his example is fitted to impress upon us the lesson how needful, how serviceable it is, if we would walk and work rightly among or for others around us, that we be often alone with our Father which is in heaven. A life all action will be as bad for the soul itself as a life all prayer would be profitless for others. It is the right and happy blending, each in its due proportion, of stillness and of action, of work and prayer, which promotes true spiritual health and growth; and so much weaker as we are—so much more easily at once distracted and absorbed by much bustling activity—so much more of reflection, retirement, and devotion is needed to temper our spirit right, and to keep it in anything like harmony with that of our Lord and Master.

It is as little possible to tell how long a time it took to make the first round of the Galilean towns and villages, as it is to define the line or circle along which Jesus moved. One high authority concludes that it must have occupied between two and three months (Greswell). Another that it did not occupy more than four or five days (Ellicott). A period of intermediate length would probably be nearer the truth than either. On completing the circuit He returned to Capernaum, to take up his abode again in Peter's house. No rest was given Him. The news of his return passed rapidly through the town, and straightway so many were gathered together "that there was no room to receive them, no, not so much as about the door." We must remember here, in order to understand what followed, what the form of a Jewish house was, and what the materials of which its roof was ordinarily composed. There is not now, and there never seems to have been, much variety in the shape of a Syrian dwelling-house. Externally they all present the one dull uniform appearance of so many separate cubes or squares, seldom more than one storey high—the outer walls showing no windows or any opening on the level of the ground, except the door. On entering you pass through a lesser court, into which alone strangers are admitted, and then into the inner uncovered square into which the different apartments of the building open. In one corner, either of the outer or inner court—generally in the latter—there is a flight of steps conducting to the roof, a place of frequent resort at all times, which in the hotter months of summer is turned into the sleeping-place of the household. The larger houses, in which the wealthier inhabitants reside, are all separate from one another. The lesser are often without any open court-yard, and built close together, so that you could pace readily from roof to roof. These roofs, always flat, are made of bricks or tiles, or more generally of a compost of mud and straw, which a day's such rain as we often have would entirely demolish. Whatever the size of the houses be, or however they be situated relatively to each other, in one way or other, either by a staircase within the court—open, of course, only to the family to which the house belongs—or by a flight of steps without—which, when the houses are contiguous, may serve many households as a common means of access to all—the roof of each dwelling is easily reached. We do not need to settle what size of dwelling the one was in Capernaum where Jesus took up his abode ; we have only to imagine it to be of the usual and invariable Syrian type, to render the narrative intelligible.

A crowd assembles and fills the room of the house in which Jesus sits and teaches. At first this crowd is not so dense but that a single individual may pass through it, and in this way one and another of the diseased did press through, and the power of the Lord was there to heal them. But it grew and it thickened, it overflowed the room, it filled the street before the door, till every spot within reach of Christ's voice was occupied, and still there were new comers pressing in to try and catch a word ; for to the work of healing them within an effectual stop seems now to have been put. At this stage four men appear, bearing a sick man on a litter. They reach the crowd, they try to enter, they entreat, they expostulate ; the thing is hopeless, for four men with such a burden ever to get through. Is the project to be given up, the great chance lost ? The bearers consult the man they carry. He is paralytic, cannot move a limb, can do nothing for himself. But he is in full possession of his faculties, the spirit is entire within. It was his eagerness to be healed, still more than their readiness to help him, that had led these four men to lift him and carry him so far, and they are ready still to do anything—anything they can. Some one suggests—who so likely as the paralytic himself?—that they might get upon the roof, lift up so much of it as was required, and let the bed on which the patient lay down before Christ ; a singular, an extreme step to take, yet one to which men who were resolved to do anything rather than forfeit the opportunity, might not refuse to have recourse.

They all were strong in the belief that if only they could get at Jesus the cure would be effected, but the paralytic himself had an eager craving to get into the Saviour's presence, deeper than that springing from the desire to have his bodily ailment removed. The stroke that had taken the strength out of his body had quickened conscience. He had recognised it as coming from the hand of God—it had awakened within a sense of his great and manifold bygone transgressions. His sins had taken hold of him, and the burden was too heavy for him to bear. He hears Jesus that He had announced himself as the Healer of the broken-hearted ; that there is a Gospel, some good tidings that he proclaims to the poor in spirit. If ever a heart needed healing, a spirit needed comforting, it is his. And now, shall he be so near to Him whom he has been so anxious to see, and yet have to go away disappointed, unrelieved ? He either himself suggests, or, when suggested, he warmly approves, the project of trying to let him down through the roof. His bearers second his desires. They make the effort—they succeed : noiselessly they lift the tiles—gently they let down the bed, and before Jesus, as He is speaking, the bed and its burden lie.

But now, before noticing how Jesus met this interruption of his discourse, and dealt with the man who was so curiously obtruded on his notice, let us look around a moment on the strangely constituted audience which Christ at this moment is addressing. Close beside Him are his disciples—around Him are many simple-minded, simple-hearted men, drinking in with wonder the words that they scarce half understand. But they are not all friendly listeners who are there, for there are "Pharisees and doctors of the law sitting by," some from Galilee, some from Judæa, some even from Jerusalem. The last—what has brought them here ? They come as spies—they come as emissaries from the men who had challenged Jesus at Jerusalem for his healing of another paralytic at the pool of Bethesda, on the Sabbath day, and who sought Him to slay Him, "because he had not only broken the Sabbath, but said also that God was his Father, making himself equal with God." Already these Pharisees counted Jesus a blasphemer, whose life they were seeking but the fit ground and occasion to cut off. And here are some of their numbers wearing the mask, waiting and watching, little knowing all the while that an eye is on them which follows every turn of their thoughts, and sees into all the secret places of their hearts. It is as one who thus thoroughly knew them, and would with his own hand throw a fresh stone of stumbling before their feet—as one who thoroughly knew him too, the poor, helpless, palsied penitent, who lies on the bed before him, that Jesus now speaks and acts. Meeting those pleading eyes that are fixed so importunately upon Him, without making any inquiries or waiting to have any petition presented, "Son," he says to the sick of the palsy, "be of good cheer, thy sins be forgiven thee." He would not have addressed him thus had he not known how greatly he needed to be cheered, how gladly he would welcome the pardon, in what a suitable condition he was to have that pardon bestowed. Let us believe then that, spoken with nicest adaptation to the man's state and wants, Christ's words were with power—that as quickly and as thoroughly as the words, "I will, be thou clean," banished the leprosy from the one man's body, as quickly and as thoroughly these words banished the gloom and despondency from this man's soul. Thus spoken to by one in whom he had full confidence, he was of good cheer, and did assuredly believe that his sins had been forgiven him. If it was so—if his faith in Jesus as his soul's deliverer were as simple and as strong as, from the way in which Christ spoke, we presume it was—then too happy would he be at the moment when the blessedness of him whose sins are forgiven, whose iniquity is covered, filled his heart, to think of anything beside. He is silent at least, he is satisfied, he makes no remonstrance, he proffers no request. There is nothing going on within his breast that Jesus needs to drag forth to light, to detect and to rebuke. Not so with the Scribes and Pharisees, upon whom those words of Jesus have had a quite startling effect. They, too, are silent; nor, beyond the glances of wonder, horror, hate, that they hastily and furtively exchange, do they give any outward sign of what is passing in their hearts. But Jesus knows it all. They had been saying within themselves "this man blasphemeth;" they had been reasoning in their hearts, to their own entire satisfaction and to Christ's utter condemnation, saying, "Why doth this man thus speak blasphemies? who can forgive sins but God only." Notwithstanding all their self-assurance, they must have been a little startled when, the thoughts of their hearts revealed, Jesus said to them, "Why reason ye these things in your hearts? Whether is it easier to say to the sick of the palsy, Thy sins be forgiven thee; or to say, Arise, and take up thy bed, and walk?" He does not ask which was easier, to forgive sins or to cure a palsy, but which was easier, to say the one or to say the other, for He knew that they had been secretly thinking how easy it was for any man to say to another, Thy sins be forgiven thee, but how impossible it was for him to make good such a saying. "But that ye may know," he added, "that the Son of Man hath power on earth to forgive sins, (then saith he to the sick of the palsy,) Arise and take up thy bed, and go thy way into thine house." The man arose and departed to his own house—healed in body, healed in spirit—glorifying God. The people saw it, and were amazed, and were filled with awe; and they said to one another, "We never saw it in this fashion—we have seen strange things to-day." And "they glorified God which had given such power to men." The Scribes and Pharisees saw it, and had palpable evidence of the superhuman knowledge and superhuman power of Christ given to them—had a miracle wrought before their eyes in proof of Christ's possession of a prerogative which they were right in thinking belonged to God only, but they would not let anything convince them that the Son of Man had power on earth to forgive sins; and it was not long, as we shall see, ere new stumbling-blocks were thrown in their way, over which they fell.

Our Saviour, in bodily presence, has now passed away from us. He can touch us no more with his living finger; He banishes no more our bodily diseases with a word; but the leprosy of the heart—the spreading, pervading taints of ungodliness, selfishness, malignity, impurity—these it is his office still to cure; these it is our duty still to carry to Him to have removed; and if it be in the spirit of him who said, Lord if thou wilt thou canst make me clean, we go, the cleansing virtue will not be withheld.

The Son of Man had power on earth to forgive sins: He exercised that power; He absolved at once the penitent of Capernaum from all his sins; He caused that man to taste the joy of an immediate, gracious, free, and full forgiveness. What is to hinder our receiving the same benefit—enjoying the same blessing? Has the Son of Man lost any of his power to forgive sins by his being no more upon this earth, his having passed into the heavens? Is pardon a boon that He no longer dispenses, that He holds now suspended over our heads—a thing to be hoped for but never to be had? No, let us believe that his mission on earth has not so failed in its great object; that He is as willing as He is able to say and do for each of us what He said and did for the palsied man in Peter's house at Capernaum; that He waits but to see us penitent and broken-hearted, looking to and trusting in Him, to say in turn to each of us, "Son—Daughter—be of good cheer, thy sins be forgiven thee."

WILLIAM HANNA.

SENSATIONAL AND SCRIPTURAL APPEALS.

AT the close of the parable of the Rich Man and Lazarus, a principle is laid down which does not at first sight command universal assent: "If they hear not Moses and the Prophets, neither will they be persuaded though one rose from the dead." Most of us would be disposed to hold with the Rich Man rather than with Abraham—to believe that one rising from the dead would make a deeper impression than Moses and the Prophets on the minds of the living. When we see men yawning over Moses and the Prophets, without any sign of either mind or soul being roused by what they read, we are tempted to ask whether the book has not become old and worn out, whether it has not lost whatever power it may once have had to stir men's spirits and impress their hearts. On the other hand, when we fancy even the most indifferent and careless man on earth brought suddenly into contact with a messenger from the eternal world—when we fancy a ghost or spirit flitting before him, whether "with airs from heaven or with blasts from hell"—when we fancy the man held, spell-bound, by his ghostly visitor, listening to warnings and counsels poured out by one who claims to speak with authority on these subjects, we seem to have before us one of the most impressive scenes that can be conceived, and we fancy that every word the departed spirit may utter must be riveted on the attention of his hearer for ever. This certainly would be the first impression of most men ; and it is a proof that, with all its simplicity in form, our Lord's teaching is very profound, that He here gives forth so decisively a statement whose truth appears only after mature reflection. It is no common-place assertion our Lord makes when He affirms that men who are unmoved by Moses and the Prophets would not be persuaded though one rose from the dead. It is a position that carries a lesson to us of deep and awful solemnity. For what does it imply ? We all have Moses and the Prophets, and, more than that, we have Christ and the Apostles in addition, with all their clearer light, and more direct appeals ; all of us, therefore, are under an agency more fitted, in Christ's judgment, to impress us, than one risen from the dead ; and if you would pronounce a man inexcusable who should lend a deaf ear to a departed brother come from hell to warn him, or from heaven to charm him ; on the principle of the text you must hold every one still more inexcusable who reads his Bible or hears it preached, yet never asks in earnest, "What must I do to be saved ?"

Let us try to commend the words, which our blessed Lord puts into the mouth of Abraham, to every man's conscience in the sight of God. Let us direct careful attention to the two modes of influence which are brought into comparison, endeavouring to find the true value and force of each in a more accurate way than by a hasty impression. It is evidently implied in the judgment of our blessed Lord, first, that a visit of one rising from the dead would carry less weight than we should at first suppose ; and secondly, that in Moses and the Prophets there is far more of that power of persuasion which men need, than many are disposed to give them credit for.

I. Obviously a chief element of the power which a visit of one rising from the dead would possess, would lie in the unusual, the unprecedented nature of the occurrence. But then, like other things of the same kind, it would lose all this element of influence as soon as it should become common. We all know how many occurrences of a similar kind there are ;—the first time one encounters them, they make an extraordinary impression ; but use, habit, frequent occurrence, take away all their charm. The remark is especially true of occurrences that make a great impression on our nervous system,—that give one a shock or a fright. Who does not remember his sensations the first time he looked on a dead body ? If you were very young, you were seized with a nervous horror,—a sense of awe crept over your frame,—your blood ran chill,—your heart turned sick. Yet what is more certain than that this feeling of awe wears off entirely from those who look often upon death, and that, as a whole, there is no class less impressed by death and its solemnities than those who are constantly surrounded by them. The remark holds equally good of the ravages of war. The sight of a man lying in a field with a shattered limb, wallowing in his blood, and writhing in agony, would sicken an ordinary man ; but amid the ravages of war, men get used to such scenes, and can look on them with little more emotion than you look on a beggar by the wayside. The first walk through a military hospital after a bloody battle would probably make most men faint away ; but after a little experience one gets at home, even in such a scene of horrors, and can move about and do one's work with the same composure with which a housekeeper perambulates the rooms of a house. Thus we see how scenes that at first give a frightful shock, not only lose their power when frequently repeated, but harden and deaden the very feelings which at first they roused into such wild activity. And thus, too, it would be if men were to be frequently visited by messengers from the dead. A single visit —the first visit—would give a great shock ; but the frequent repetition of such visits would deprive them of their power, and probably leave the most of men more careless and hardened than ever. Visits from the spirits of the dead would come to be scarcely more thought of than visits from the living ; and men would be little more affected by their statements than they are by the inscriptions on the tombstones of a churchyard. They would soon become as familiar with the spectacle as a sexton with the skulls and skeletons, and other mementoes of the tomb ; and, spoiled by frequent sensational applications, their hearts would become like a rock to the wholesome influences of the truth, they would not listen to the voice of the charmer, charm he never so wisely.

But, you say, this reasoning is not quite appropriate to the case in hand. It is conclusive enough as to any proposal to turn visits from the dead into an ordinary or a frequent mode of influence. But that was not what the Rich Man asked ; that was not what Abraham declined. It was but one such visit to his brethren the rich man pled for ; and it was of that single visit that Abraham affirmed so strongly that it would be in vain. But then let it be observed particularly what is the nature of the effect which Abraham denied that the visit would have. Weigh well the force of the word "persuaded," for the saying hinges upon that. It is not said that they would not be startled. It is not said that they would not be very profoundly impressed in some ways. Most certainly they would. What is said is, that they would not be persuaded. Persuaded to what ? Persuaded to live a different life from what their brother had lived, and they were living ; persuaded to keep the eternal world in view ; persuaded to live under the sense of responsibility to God ; persuaded to abandon a life of self-indulgent ease, and devote themselves to a career of godliness and charity ; persuaded to live as pilgrims and strangers here, and to look for a city that hath foundations whose builder and maker is God. It is one thing to be startled, to be solemnized, to be convinced : it is another thing to be persuaded. It is comparatively easy to compass the one effect ; it is infinitely difficult to reach the other. But till this great result is reached, till men are persuaded, how little is done ! How little is got beyond a goodness that is as the morning cloud or the early dew ! How little beyond the impression of the man beholding his natural face in a glass, and going away, and forgetting what manner of man he was !

We are almost in a position to test this argument by facts. What is modern Spiritualism but a professed carrying out of the Rich Man's desire—bringing the souls of the dead into communication with the living? What have been the results of this system, in the case of those who profess to believe in it? Startled, amazed, distracted, driven to madness, many of them have been; but how little has there been that you could put under the head of "persuaded!" It must strike every one as remarkable that the advocates of spiritualism have got such a meagre account of spiritual results to present to the world. Earnest Christianity has never failed to gather round itself a wonderful array of men and women that have been persuaded—persuaded to come to Christ, to abandon sin, to conquer the world, to live for eternity, and who, in their changed and holy lives, have given evidence of the reality of their change. But what has spiritualism to show of this sort? What have they who have thrown off Moses and the Prophets as "Hebrew old-clothes," as they were once profanely called, and adopted as their creed the vagaries of spiritualism—what have they to boast of, in the region of moral and spiritual elevation? or how can they prevent us from regarding their case as an additional evidence of the truth of Christ's statement, that if men hear not Moses and the Prophets, neither will they be persuaded though one rose from the dead?

II. Perhaps enough has been said in the way of testing the strength of one of the modes of influence adverted to in this passage. Let us, then, direct attention to the other. The result of the examination in this case will be precisely the opposite to that in the former. The more we consider the power of apparitions, the slighter does it appear; but the more we weigh the influence of Moses and the Prophets, the more overwhelming, the more fitted to persuade, the more entirely adapted to the great end in view, shall we find it to be.

Let us consider, in the first place, that it is GOD who speaks through Moses and the Prophets, and that we hardly ever find even a chapter where we are not reminded of this. "Hear, O heavens, and give ear, O earth, for the Lord hath spoken; I have nourished and brought up children, but they have rebelled against me." How different the impression of that voice from a mere human voice, even on the inanimate and irrational creation! The very stones and mountains are moved by it, and the only chord in nature that will not respond to it is the heart of man. "The heathen raged, the kingdoms were moved; he uttered his voice, the earth melted." "The voice of the Lord is upon the waters, the God of glory thundereth, the Lord is on many waters. The voice of the Lord is powerful, the voice of the Lord is full of majesty. The voice of the Lord breaketh the cedars, yea the Lord breaketh the cedars of Lebanon. The voice of the Lord divideth the flames of fire." It is this sublime voice that addresses itself to men through Moses and the Prophets, and the sin of disregarding what they proclaim is no other than the sin of disregarding the voice of the Almighty. "He that heareth you, heareth me; and he that despiseth you, despiseth me; and he that despiseth me, despiseth him that sent me." One risen from the dead could only claim the personal respect and reverence due to a creature; every appeal in the Word of God comes to us with the respect due to the Creator. No one of us could venture to slight the audible voice of the Living God, sounding in our ears from the throne of his majesty; it is substantially the same crime we commit when we set aside Moses and the Prophets, proclaiming, "Let the wicked forsake his way, and the unrighteous man his thoughts!"

Again, let it be considered that the perfect knowledge God has of the subjects on which He addresses us through Moses and the Prophets, entitles them to far deeper attention and reverence from us than would be due even to one rising from the dead. What is so reasonable as that we should give most attention to those whose knowledge of any subject is most complete? When we desire information respecting a distant country, we pay more regard to the man who has been there than the man who has not; and far more to the man who has spent his life in it than the man who has but paid it a flying visit. The eternal world is to us an unseen and unexplored country, no one has ever come back to tell us anything about it, and that is one reason why, at the first a for and time, one risen from the dead would be so eagerly listened to. But, after all, what can one who has been a few weeks or even years in the eternal world know of it, compared to God? Like the Rich Man he may have endured for a time the agonies of the lost, or like Abraham he may have witnessed them from the heights of bliss; but can it be supposed that either the one or the other could have the deep and all-comprehensive acquaintance with the subject possessed by the infinite God? Can it be thought that a creature, in any circumstances, should impart knowledge regarding it that should be more impressive than God has imparted through His word? You may say, But God has thrown a veil over it, He has spoken of it in figures; we should like to know more of it, we have a thousand questions we should like to put respecting it; and we are sure that if these were resolved, we should be far more under the power of it than we are. "Thou speakest as one of the foolish women speaketh." Does God not know best how much it is right and fitting that we should know? Does the Lord of All not know best when it is needful to spread a veil over scenes with which we might wish to become familiar? He that has so delicately adjusted the human eye to the strength of the sunlight that falls on our planet, do you suppose He has shown no skill in proportioning the degree of light He has given in his word on these subjects of awful interest, to the power of the human soul to bear it? Very possibly one rising from the dead might pour on us a measure of light that would destroy the organ of vision,—he might drive us to despair by his fearful descriptions. The very fact that God has kept back so much ought to give us the more confidence in what He has been pleased to reveal. It should make us thankful that what we have got is not a vast encyclopædia, containing everything, through whose massive volumes we have to search for what is applicable to ourselves: but a carefully selected manual, in which, out of the stores of his infinite knowledge, God has placed everything that can best contribute to the great end,—that can best serve to make us wise unto salvation, through faith that is in Christ Jesus.

This suggests another remark. God has infinitely better knowledge of man's heart, and of what is adapted to turn it to Himself, and so to become a real blessing to it, than one rising from the dead could have.

Men of large knowledge and great power often fail in impressing their views on others, from want of knowledge of their hearts, and consideration of their infirmities. It is not mere force or power that is needed to move the heart. No amount of physical force could draw out the leaflets that are folded in the rosebud; to effect this needs the gentle influences of air, and light, and heat. So with the human heart. "Thy gentleness," said David, "hath made me great." One rising from the dead, coming to us straight from the lake of fire and brimstone, would probably try to affect us by the mere vehemence of his description; he would describe in tones that would thrill the very heart of stone the awful horrors of that prison, and appeal to our strongest instincts of terror, to escape to a place of safety. But would such an appeal be the most effectual?—or rather, would it do best as the usual method? In the Word of God, things are finely tempered. There is no exclusive appeal to a single order of faculties, or a single class of feelings—all are appealed to together. Our horror of pain is appealed to occasionally; but then this is not a very elevated feeling, and those who are most moved by dread of pain are not men of a very high order; therefore in the Bible this appeal is not very prominent. Our understanding is appealed to, our conscience, our sense of justice, our sense of gratitude, our imagination, our half-smothered aspirations after goodness and purity, our love of the peaceful and the beautiful,—whatever, indeed, in us can give any response to infinite love, and grace, and condescension, and fatherly yearnings, and conjugal doatings; the heart is pressed at every point—the citadel is approached by every avenue—all the considerations are urged that are likely to make any impression; and can it reasonably be thought that the heart that holds out against all forms of heavenly artillery, would yield to a single piece of human ordnance?—that the citadel that resists all the appliances of divine engineering would fall before a mere earthly battery? Nay, verily; if they hear not Moses and the Prophets neither will they be persuaded though one rose from the dead.

Not only are these things so, but it should be considered, further, that it is by a direct action of the Spirit of God on the heart that the heart is turned to God; and that action of the Spirit must be looked for in connection with the means of grace that God's wisdom approves, not those thatman's wisdom mi ght prefer. Some are ready enough to say, Oh, if only some one would come from the other world, and convince us of the reality of hell and of heaven, we should then become serious, we should break off our sins, we should seek the Saviour. They forget that, to effect this result, the Divine Spirit must change their will—turn it from earth to heaven—make it obedient to the magnet that draws upwards instead of the magnet that draws downwards. But is it likely that the Spirit will own, for this end, the means that man might desiderate, rather than what He himself has ordained? It is not through visits from the departed but through the remonstrances, the appeals, the entreaties, which He employed the sacred writers to compose, that He must be expected to carry on his work. To fancy that the life-giving power has migrated from the once lively oracles, and can only be found amid the appliances of sensationalism, is a crime and a blunder in one—it is to dishonour the Spirit of Revelation, and it is to seek the living among the dead.

And, after all, what is there about Moses and the Prophets that can justify the notion that, for any purposes of high persuasion, they are worn out and useless? As we look back along the vista of the ages, what figures rise with such solemn and majestic dignity before us as those of Moses and the Prophets? What forms are so clothed with the highest attainments of grace and godliness? What human teachers ever so impressively echoed their testimony by their lives? Who ever showed more clearly what it is to conquer the baser propensities of our nature, to rise above the world both as a master and as a portion, and to dwell in the higher regions of faith and trust, and reverence and love? When we fancy ourselves in the presence of these holy men of God, do we not feel ashamed of our earthiness, our low motives of life, our distance from God, our hearts so out of tune to his words, and so out of harmony with his will? Even though they had formally taught us nothing—even though their writings had served merely to perpetuate the lessons of their lives, it would hardly be possible to over-estimate the influence, in all future generations, of that venerable band of pilgrims that we see in the earliest age of the world going up from earth to heaven, and that never cease to call on all who come after to be followers of them who through faith and patience inherit the promises.

And if it be thus clear that those who have Moses and the Prophets are without excuse if they neglect the great salvation, and that they cannot be expected to yield to any more exciting instrumentality if they hear not them, what shall be said of those who, besides Moses and the Prophets, have Christ and the Evangelists too? What shall be said of us? Not that the teaching of Christ and the Apostles is essentially different from that of Moses and the Prophets. It is the same teaching, but with how much greater clearness and tenderness and power! How have life and immortality been brought to light in the Gospel! What views have we got now of the sinfulness of sin, and the love of God, and the way of life, and the grace that bringeth salvation, and the great travail of soul through which the Son of God prevailed to open the gate of glory, and fling over the wide earth the invitation, Come up hither? What an insult were it to the Son of God to fancy that any one returning from the unseen world could give us more effectual lessons than those which come to us from the life and the lips and the death of the Redeemer? Could they tell us the doom of sin more forcibly than his bleeding body and stricken soul, and the touching pathos of his question, "If these things be done in the green tree, what shall be done in the dry?" Or what higher lesson can we have respecting the glory of heaven than when He went about spreading heaven around Him, verifying by anticipation the vision of the heavenly city—"the city hath no need of the sun nor of the moon to shine in it, for the glory of God doth lighten it, and the Lamb is the Light thereof"? Are we all impressed as we should be with the deep responsibility of the position in which these things place us? Do we all feel what cause the Vine-dresser has to say of us—"What could have been done more to my vineyard, that I have not done in it?" Do we realise the unutterable solemnity of the alternative, How shall we escape if we neglect so great salvation?

Among the many minor lessons which this subject suggests, let us select a single one for a concluding observation. We are reminded of the small extent to which the mere sensational element is to be found in the Word of God. The Bible deals but very sparingly in the startling, the terrifying, the horrible. It does not exclude this element: in the very parable before us it has a place; but its place is carefully limited, and other elements abound on every side of it. And this may show us that, neither in preaching, nor in religious literature, nor in common literature, is it wholesome or desirable that this element should often predominate. That is one lesson as to wholesome and useful literature that the Word of God may supply. But it is not the only lesson. The great breadth and variety of the Word of God, and pre-eminently of the Old Testament, yield another. The Bible is not one sort of reading only. It is not simply didactic, nor devotional, nor poetical, nor historical, nor proverbial, nor parabolical, nor biographical, it is all combined. Why should any be jealous of a literature—of a religious literature—that, like the Bible, has a like variety? All honour to those who cultivate with pre-eminent success and benefit any single department of Christian literature! All honour to those who cultivate the more experimental or spiritual department! Well may we bless God for them, and for the work they do, and rejoice that He sends among us, both through the pulpit and the press, sons of thunder to startle sleepers, and sons of consolation to guide, and soothe, and comfort earnest and exercised souls. But not the less should we bless God for all that varied Christian literature which eighteen centuries have gathered round the Scriptures—which has done so much permanently to illustrate the Divine message, as well as to bring it into contact with the characteristic modes of thought and feeling of every successive age. Some there are who think there is little call for the encouragement of any literature, except what presents the great vital truths of the Gospel in a direct and simple form. They would help to circulate tracts and books of the highest spiritual tone; but every other kind of publication they deem inferior, and almost incapable of receiving God's blessing or of doing real good.

But whoever really believes in the whole Bible of the Old and New Testaments as the Word of God, will see the value of that whole circle of Christian literature that revolves round the great central source of Light—nay, will be persuaded, that in the long run a varied Christian literature of this sort will do more good than one consisting merely of the most concentrated essences. It is not honouring the Bible—it is not showing confidence in it as the deliberate product of the Divine wisdom—to act as if only certain parts of it were fit nourishment for the soul, or worthy to be made our models, whether in our periodical, or in our permanent Christian literature. It is plain that God has made man capable of being more powerfully acted on by a variety of instrumentalities, than by any single appliance, however startling or impressive. The Bible is not such as man would have made it, but when we thoughtfully consider its structure, we see cause to acknowledge that the foolishness of God is wiser than men. Our tendency to onesidedness is wonderfully corrected by its wide and comprehensive fulness. The reaction that is ever caused by too constant pressure in one direction, is prevented by its firm and equable pressure on every faculty of our nature. The final results are infinitely more for God's glory and for man's highest and fullest good.

W. G. Blaikie.

A FRENCH QUAKER'S LABOUR OF LOVE.

When Etienne de Grellet du Mabillier was born in 1773, at Limoges, in what is now the department of Haute Vienne, in France, his family seemed as near the summit of worldly prosperity as could have been desired. His father was wealthy, and resided on his patrimonial estate. The owner of extensive porcelain works, he had greatly improved the manufacture, and for that, and other services to his country, he had received a title of honour from the king. At one time Comptroller of the Mint, he had been a member of the household of Louis XVI., and, as his intimate friend and councillor, had been accustomed to attend service with him in his private chapel. Though Etienne was his fifth child, he could have had little difficulty in finding for him some lucrative and honourable position. During his boyhood, nothing seemed more likely than that his life should be spent amid such pursuits as were held fitting for a member of the French noblesse, but characterised by a higher moral tone and a nobler purpose to be useful to his generation than unhappily prevailed in his class. His education was designed simply "to make him accomplished in the eyes of the world," and direct religious instruction and training formed no part of it. But he was marked by a singular religious susceptibility, and at times was filled for a little with the liveliest spiritual emotions. If these should become so strong as to give a direction to his life, he might follow the example of several of his female relations, who had renounced the world, and chosen the life of the réligieuse. Even in his boyhood the thought of their privations would sometimes haunt him, and when he thought of them "rising three times in the night for prayer in the church, from the hard boards which formed their couch, even the luxury of a straw pallet being denied them," the thoughtlessness and carelessness of his own life seemed to him inexcusable, and filled him with shame and sorrow.

But ere his boyhood had passed away, the French Revolution brought a change o'er the spirit of his dream. As his father was a member of the odious nobility, his estates were confiscated, and both he and his wife were afterwards thrown into prison. For himself, after various stirring incidents, he joined the army of the French princes, along with his brothers, and became a member of the corps of the King's Horse Guards, which consisted mostly of the nobility. Though often in the midst of battle, it so fell out that he never drew a sword or fired a gun his corps being a reserve one—a circumstance to which in after life, when, as a Quaker, he came to regard all war as sinful, and all shedding of blood as unlawful, he used to revert with peculiar thankfulness. It was not long ere the army of the princes was obliged to retire from France, and was disbanded. After being at one time made prisoners of war, and ordered to be shot, he and his brothers found an opportunity of escaping, and reached Amsterdam. Soon after Etienne and his brother Joseph resolved to emigrate to America. Demerara was their first place of abode on American soil. While there, the sufferings of the wretched slaves made such an impression on him, that in after years the sound of a whip in the streets would chill his blood, from remembrance of the agony of the slaves; and he felt convinced that there was no excess of malice or wickedness which a slaveholder or driver might not be guilty of. A rumour reaching Demerara, that a French fleet was coming to take possession of the colony, he and his brother removed in 1795 to New York. From that time he may be regarded as a citizen of the United States, and was usually known under the Anglicised and plainer name of Stephen Grellet.

A number of remarkable proofs of religious susceptibility have been preserved of his early years. At the age of five or six, he had been almost driven to despair by a long Latin exercise; looking out of his window, the thought flashed on him that God had made all the wonders of nature, and could not the same God give him memory too? He knelt down at the foot of his bed, poured out his heart to God, rose with fresh hope and energy, and mastered his lesson by a single additional effort. At another time, when at Lyons, he fancied he saw a number of persons, or rather purified spirits, in one of those floating vessels on the Rhone which are used by washerwomen. They were washing linen. He wondered to see what beating and pounding was going on, but how beautifully white it came out of their hands. He was told he could not enter God's kingdom till he underwent such an operation. For weeks he was absorbed in the consideration of the subject—wondering greatly how such a regeneration should be needed by one who had been both baptised and confirmed. After he had gone to America, he was walking one evening in the fields alone, when he was suddenly arrested by what seemed an awful voice proclaiming the words "Eternity! Eternity! Eternity!" It reached his very soul, his whole frame shook, and it brought him, like Saul, to the ground. For weeks he continued in prayer, beseeching the Lord to have mercy on him. Falling in with a book of William Penn's, "No Cross, no Crown," he read it with great interest, with the aid of a dictionary. The English Bible also became his study, for he had none in French. In this state of mind, he heard of a Friends' meeting, which was to be addressed by two Englishwomen, on a religious visit to the States. He understood very little of what they said, but a gush of happy feeling filled his heart. The Lord whom he sought suddenly came to His temple. He felt like a new man, his heart was full of peace, and glowed with love to all. Of course, he became a Quaker. His experience seemed a divine verification of the Quaker doctrine of the inward light.

Baptised into Quakerism under circumstances so spirit-stirring, his loyalty to its tenets became unbounded. Constitutionally of a Catholic spirit, he was nevertheless out-and-out a Quaker. Hardly any man ever combined such fervent loyalty to his sect, with such open-hearted charity, and such readiness to recognise good wherever it might be found. We do not, of course, agree with him and his friends in the pre-eminent place assigned by them to that inner light from which his peace seemed to spring. We hold that it is not inwards to his own heart, but outwards to the Cross, the sinner is to look who seeks for peace. But when the light from the Cross, with all its blessed concomitants, is felt in a sinner's heart, making a kind of heaven there, the sensation is such, that we do not wonder at some persons fancying that if any would have peace, they must just wait till it is flashed in an instant by the Spirit into their hearts. Of Grellet, it must be said, that he did all his life most devoutly and earnestly revere Jesus Christ as the sole author of redemption, and the Holy Ghost as the only life-giving power in the heart of man. His attitude was ever one of humble, waiting expectancy, as the eyes of a servant are upon the hand of his master, or as the eyes of a maiden are upon the hand of her mistress. This goes far to explain his remarkable success as an evangelist; for very remarkable it was; although we believe at the same time that much of the emotion which his addresses occasioned was little more than the natural effect of one very susceptible temperament acting upon other temperaments of a similar kind.

It must be confessed that, as a whole, his autobiography is a tedious book. Its Quaker-slang one might get reconciled to, but its chief defect is its sameness and monotony. He seems to have felt bound to chronicle every meeting he ever held, no matter how like it may have been to a thousand others, and to do it in a style as plain, unpicturesque, and unattractive as that of the coat he wore, or the house he lived in. Yet very few books are so full of interesting passages. His experience of life was rich and wonderful, the kinds of people he came among embraced all classes, from convicts and slaves up to emperors and empresses. He had a marvellous entrée to all kinds of society, an "open sesame" that admitted him alike to cloistered cell and royal closet. An ultra-Protestant, he held religious meetings in nunneries, and preached the Gospel even in Catholic sanctuaries. He was the intimate acquaintance of Romish bishops and of Greek patriarchs. Though he could never be induced to uncover his head in the presence of royalty, he obtained friendly interviews with nearly all the crowned heads of Europe. With the Emperor Alexander of Russia, and several members of his family and court, he was on the most intimate footing. He obtained on one occasion a private interview with old Pope Pius VII., the Pope whom Napoleon imprisoned; but we suspect the interview was rather uncomfortable, not because the Pope was his interlocutor, but because one of the papal attendants had whipped off his hat, and compelled him to sit uncovered. Traversing Europe with the view of discovering, cherishing, and propagating vital religion, he was constantly meeting with interesting and prominent Christian men, such as Lavater, Zeller, Gessner, Tholuck, Martin Boos, and the family of Oberlin. His notices of these men and of their labours are remarkably interesting. The facility with which he got access to all kinds of society was partly due to the fact of his being a Frenchman and at the same time a Quaker; for a French Quaker seemed as extraordinary a combination as a Mermaid or a Minotaur. The charm of his manner, and the persuasive tenderness of his addresses greatly deepened the interest he excited. As years passed over him he became known as a privileged person, in whose case the standing-orders of society might be suspended, because no one else could take advantage of the precedent. His life is one of the most remarkable instances in modern times of apostolic devotion, industry, and self-denial. At what he believed to be the call of his Lord, he never hesitated to leave business, family, and country for years together, and to go wherever he felt that he was summoned, to call men to repentance and salvation.

It was not long before he felt called to become a minister in the Quaker communion; but, following the rule in that body, he laboured without remuneration, so that he continued in business, making such arrangements as he could for absences which, though short at first, sometimes extended over two or more years. First, the United States, then Canada, became the scene of his labours; then, crossing the Atlantic, he visited Europe, spending six or eight months in his native country; a longer visit to Europe occupied him from 1811 to 1814; a third and a fourth visit followed at later periods, and between them he paid a visit to Hayti, and traversed large sections of the United States. The European visits embraced, though not always at the same time, Great Britain and Ireland, France, Switzerland, Italy, Germany, Holland, Scandinavia, Russia, Turkey, Greece, Austria, and Spain. Through the French language, Mr. Grellet was able to talk to a very large circle; but sometimes, of course, he had to make use of an interpreter. His manner, like that of St. Paul, was to search out his own brethren, when there were any, wherever he went, and radiate outwards from them over a wider area. Religious meetings, conducted on the Quaker model, were held, often with comparatively few at first, but larger numbers came to successive meetings, until often the crowd was extremely great. He became a recognised centre, so to speak, of earnest Christian labourers, and his arrival at any place was a signal for those to gather round him, who, in those cold times, desired encouragement and counsel in their difficult work. What proportion of those who were "contrited" or "tendered" under his warm appeals on the subject of Christ's love, continued stedfast in his doctrine and fellowship, it is impossible to tell; but whatever may have been the value of his labours in that direction, there can be little doubt that, in animating the members of the little flock, scattered over Europe, who were holding fast the truth, and earnestly trying to do their Lord's work, he rendered important service, for which his name deserves to be had in grateful remembrance.

A few samples of his labours, especially of his interviews and intercourse with remarkable characters will give the reader a better notion of the man and his work than any general description.

In early life he lived in the same village with Thomas Paine, the notorious infidel. Floating rumours of Paine's death have long been in circulation, but as doubts are apt to arise as to the authenticity of such accounts, it is well to have them authenticated by a respectable name. "On hearing that he was ill and in a very destitute condition," Mr. Grellet says, in 1809, "I went to see him, and found him in a wretched state, for he had been so neglected and forsaken by his pretended friends, that the common attentions to a sick man had been withheld from him. The skin of his body was in some places worn off, which greatly increased his sufferings." Mr. Grellet was obliged to leave home, but he procured a nurse for Paine, and a variety of comforts, and got a young Quaker lady, who had been staying with him, to visit him from time to time. Once when she was in his room some of his infidel associates came to him, and in a loud, heartless manner said: "Tom Paine, it is said you are turning Christian, but we hope you will die as you have lived," and then went away. Turning to Miss Roscoe, Paine said: "You see what miserable comforters they are." Once he asked her if she had read any of his writings; she told him she had begun the "Age of Reason," but it made her so miserable that she flung it into the fire. "I wish all had done as you did," he said, "for if the Devil ever had any agency in any work, he had it in my writing that book." When going to carry him any refreshment, she repeatedly heard him uttering the language, "O Lord! Lord God!" or "Lord Jesus, have mercy on me!" It was observed that during his illness he wrote a great deal, but as nothing was ever heard of these writings, it was presumed that his infidel associates had destroyed them, finding them not in keeping with his former views.

It is an interesting fact that it was Mr. Grellet who first introduced Elizabeth Fry to prison visiting. He had paid a visit to the female department of Newgate prison under very affecting circumstances. The jailer had tried to dissuade him, telling him, among other things, that the prisoners were such a pack of termagants that if they did not tear him in pieces, they would at least tear his clothes from his back. But it was quite otherwise. The women were greatly pleased at his coming to see them, and hastily rolled up their hammocks and arranged their sleeping room, so that he might address them together. The smell of the air was fearful, and everything base and depraved was so strongly depicted on the faces of the women who stood before him, with looks of boldness and wantonness that appalled him, that it seemed for a while as if he could not go on. But the more he beheld the awful consequences of sin, the more did he feel moved to speak of the love of Him who had come to seek and to save that which was lost. As he spoke of the love of Christ their countenances began to alter, they hung down their heads, their haughtiness and proud looks were brought low, and the tears flowed down over unaccustomed channels. On going to the hospital to visit the sick, his astonishment at the woe and misery he beheld was overwhelming. He found many very sick lying on the bare floor or on some old straw, with very scanty clothing, though the weather was cold ; and there were several children among them, almost naked, who had been born in the prison.

Here was a case for female succour : he went straight to Mildred's Court, the residence of the Frys, and appealed to Mrs. Fry. Touched with the terrible tale, she immediately sent for flannel and Friends, whose nimble fingers prepared a bundle of garments before next day, with which Mrs. Fry went to the prison for the naked children. When she saw the wretchedness prevailing in the prison she was induced to devise the plan, to which she devoted her life, for improving the condition of female prisoners, reforming their morals, and gaining them to Christ.

We have referred to the singular manner in which Mr. Grellet got access to continental nunneries. Writing of a nunnery at the place where his mother resided (Brives, in France), he says, "I visited the nuns of the hospital, with whom I had such precious seasons of the Lord's favour six years ago. Their aged and venerable superior continued in the greenness of the divine life, manifesting Christian meekness and humility. . . . On returning (from the hospital) to the aged superior, I found that, Cornelius-like, she wished that her household should share with her in the consolations she expected from my visit ; she therefore had all the nuns collected . . . My heart was enlarged among them in the love of Christ, who was preached to them as the only Saviour, and the bread of life." Next day, a nun from another religious order, accompanied him to the hospital, and entreated the prisoners to attend to the message of salvation thus brought to them. "There was something," says Mr. Grellet, "particularly pleasing to my mind in having a nun as my fellow-worker directing sinners to Christ, as the only hope of salvation." Many more of the nuns of the place were of a similar spirit ; he was convinced that they were not far from the Kingdom of God, and that but for the ascendency the priests had obtained over them, they might have become bright and shining ornaments of the Church of God. Unhappily the priests did not share their emotions, but lifted up their hands in token of their joy, when they heard that Mr. Grellet had left the place.

On another occasion, when at Naples, Mr. Grellet was fearfully distressed at the amount and depth of the depravity he found among the inmates of the criminal prisons. Many of the prisoners, male and female, and even children, had committed atrocious crimes. Fifteen in one cell were condemned to death. Some boys, not above eleven years of age, had committed several murders. Every effort of Mr. Grellet to awaken a right feeling in any of them was utterly in vain. Next day he went to the Foundling Hospital. Passing the door of the chapel, about 400 girls were seen engaged in devotions to the Virgin. Mr. Grellet was asked by the priests and nuns who accompanied him to go in and see them at their devotions ; he consented, on condition that if he felt moved by the Spirit to speak to the assembled girls, the chief priest would interpret for him. He agreed. After they had sung a hymn, he pointed out to them the idolatrous and unprofitable character of their worship, which could never be acceptable to Him who must be worshipped in spirit and in truth. Then he spoke of Jesus Christ, as the only Saviour of sinners, the only hope of salvation, the way, the truth, the life ; without whom no man can come to God the Father. The priest interpreted faithfully into Italian, as Grellet could perceive. The nuns and other priests said, several times, This is the truth. The countenances of the girls showed emotion.

"Thus," says Mr. Grellet, "did my blessed Master enable his poor servant, in a Popish church, assisted by priests, to bear testimony to his blessed truth, and against the superstitious worship that those poor girls were offering to a piece of carved wood. After we came out, some more of the nuns collected about us, and in answering some of their questions, I further expounded to them wherein acceptable worship consists, and also what is the only hope of salvation. After opportunities of this sort, I sometimes marvel that they do not lay their hands on me ; but here, on the contrary, they parted from me in tenderness, and with expressions of their satisfaction with my visit. Surely, this is the Lord's doing !"

His interview with the Pope, in 1819, was more curious than impressive. The Pope, a spare old man, of a mild and serious countenance, wished to be agreeable to his Quaker visitor, who had done much good work in his prisons, and had suggested to him many useful reforms, especially the abolition of the Inquisition. But, as in the case of Pio Nono, when pressed pretty hard to make the reforms, the reply was virtually, "Non possumus." Proceeding to more vital topics, Grellet began to describe the character and duties of a minister of Christ, a priest of God—to all of which the Pope gave an amiable assent.

"Finally," says Grellet, "as I felt the love of Christ flowing in my heart towards him, I particularly addressed him. I alluded to the various sufferings he underwent from the hands of Napoleon ; the deliverance granted him by the Lord; and queried whether his days were not lengthened out to enable him to glorify God, and exalt the name of Jesus Christ, as the only Head of the Church, the only Saviour, to whom alone every knee is to bow, and every tongue is to confess; that such a confession from him in his old age would do more towards the advancement of Christ's kingdom, and the promotion of his glory, than the authority of all the popes his predecessors was ever able to do; moreover, that thereby his sun, now near setting, would go down with brightness, and his portion in eternity would be with the sanctified One, in the joys of his salvation. The Pope, while I thus addressed him, kept his head inclined, and appeared tender; then rising from his seat in a kind and respectful manner, he expressed a desire 'that the Lord would bless and protect me wherever I went.' On which I left him."

The singularly sanguine nature of Grellet was never more apparent; even an inclined head and tender look were encouraging tokens for good.

A much more congenial listener was found in the Emperor Alexander of Russia: several of Alexander's courtiers were also persons of decided piety. Mr. Grellet was thoroughly assured of the reality of the Emperor's profession. He himself gave him an account of his conversion. Trained up in the Greek Church, he had been taught to repeat prayers without praying; and yet often, when he lay down, his convictions of sin were so strong that he had to rise from his bed, and with tears entreat the Lord's forgiveness, and strength to act with greater watchfulness. In 1812, he had been recommended by a pious man, Prince Alexander Galitzin, to read the Bible, which he had not seen till this nobleman presented him with a copy. He devoured it with eagerness, and through the teaching of the Holy Spirit its truths were firmly fastened on his heart. It was a practice of the Princess Metchersky and the Emperor to read the Bible at the same time, one chapter of the Old Testament in the morning, and another of the New Testament in the evening. As they corresponded, and the Emperor in his letters often alluded to the religious impressions made on his mind by the chapter of the day, she knew that he continued the practice. His mind was full of schemes for the benefit of his subjects, and it is one of the mysteries of Providence that one so full of Christian views and aims should have been removed so early from the important post he had been called to occupy.

We have left ourselves hardly a line to note some of Grellet's visits to those excellent champions of Divine truth and love who were working, often alone and unsuccoured, in various parts of Europe. Speaking, in 1832, of Dr. Tholuck of Halle, and of the persecutions endured by his pious students, he says: "He has an arduous path to tread, but the Lord supports him amidst his numerous difficulties; his enemies, like those of Daniel formerly, can find no occasion against him, except concerning the law of his God. He has two or three hundred young men, steady attenders of his lectures at the University. He has the consolation to hope that every year from thirty to forty of these young men go from the University to various parts of Germany, thoroughly established in sound Christian truths, giving evidence also that they love the Lord Jesus Christ in sincerity."

One other notice in this department must suffice. We select the visit to Zeller, because in last month's part of the SUNDAY MAGAZINE an account appeared of his interesting and important labours. "Accompanied by two friends, we went to Bueggen on the Rhine, to see an interesting establishment for eighty poor orphans of both sexes, and for twenty-four young men, who are educated for schoolmasters, in institutions where the pupils support themselves by manual labour of various sorts. Zeller and his wife, who are the superintendents of it, are persons of rare piety; it is from an apprehension of religious duty that they occupy their stations; Christian love and kindness are very conspicuously appearing in their hearts, by those they govern. The same love seems to flow back from the young people towards them. . . . . I could but compare this house to that of Obededom, on which the Lord's blessing rested. The wife of Zeller devoted herself in very early life to the Lord, and to this day she appears to be faithful in endeavouring to perform her solemn vow. When about five years of age she was playing on some of the rocky hills of the country; one of their large eagles saw her, and darted down upon her head; a man with a gun not far distant, watched the motions of the eagle but did not see the child; he fired and killed the bird, at the very moment of its darting on the child's head; great was his surprise on coming to the spot to find the dead eagle by the side of the child. The deep wounds made by his talons on her head show what a narrow escape she had from the voracious bird, and from being wounded or killed by the gun. This dear woman considers that her life, thus spared, is to be wholly devoted to the service of God."

As years multiplied on the head of Stephen Grellet, he of course had to contract the sphere of his activity. But till his death, in 1855, at the age of 82, he continued more or less engaged in the labour of love. His later years were clouded by a schism in the Quaker body, and by the spread of views which he deemed destructive of the Gospel of Jesus Christ, views which he did all in his power to check and overthrow. But the inward peace gladdened his heart to the close. His life, like that of the patriarch Joseph, is a singular proof how good may be brought out of evil. Had no French Revolution and no Reign of Terror ever been known, Etienne de Grellet du Mabillier would, of course, never have become Stephen Grellet. He might have carried on the porcelain business at Limoges, and become rich and powerful; but, so far as we can know, he would never have reached that higher sphere which entitles him to have for his motto: "They that are wise shall shine as the brightness of the firmament, and they that turn many to righteousness as the stars for ever and ever."

THINK ON THE POOR.

THOUGH you sit in warm mansions, secure from the tempest,
Nor feel the keen storm, as it drifts on the moor,
Yet shut not your door 'gainst the wandering stranger,
But learn from your blessings to pity the poor.

When the cold northern wind blows chilly and rudely,
And the rain patters hard at your windows and door—
When you hear the blast howl, look around on your comforts,
And plan some good thing for the indigent poor.

Oft lift up the latch of chill poverty's dwelling,
Explore the sad chamber where care sits obscure,
When you see tears of want wash the withering bosom,
Then think of your Saviour, and give to the poor.

Cold Winter presents a foreboding dark aspect,
In clusters the icicles hang at the door:
Red berries may grace the brown thorn for the songster,
But you must relieve the hard lot of the poor.

Remember that soon we must go to that dwelling
Where riches no sort of distinction procure:
For that leveller, Death, and the grave, our last mansion,
Shall mingle our dust with the dust of the poor.

ABOUT RICHARD BAXTER.

PART SECOND.

WHEN the nation, in a tumult of enthusiastic loyalty, hastened to throw itself at the feet of the returning monarch, Baxter was not slow to commend and participate in the common joy. With him loyalty was a Christian duty as well as a deep-seated emotion; and though he had submitted peaceably to the rule of Cromwell, and had thankfully availed himself of the freedom to pursue his work which Cromwell's policy secured to him, he had never got over a certain feeling of personal dislike to the man, and had no[illegible] throne. This [illegible]n for assuming the rein[illegible]taken no pains to conceal. [illegible]ly seating him[illegible]hat upon one occasion he got [illegible]e and [illegible]able by the vehemence of his language [illegible]d [illegible]e usurper." The course, however, which [illegible]narily pursued was, while protesting against he regarded as sin on the part of the ruling [illegible]er, to submit peaceably to the existing authority, [illegible] give Cromwell credit for all the good he did and the good intentions he displayed, to avail himself of whatever advantages were to be enjoyed under his rule, and to leave the issue with God. At a later period, and after some rather instructive experiences, he began "to be in great doubts how far he did well or ill in his oppositions to Cromwell and his army at last." But no such doubts disturbed him while Cromwell's power lasted. He thought his "duty was clear to disown the usurper's sin, what good soever he might do;" and it seemed to him there was but one course for sincere and true men to follow. "We are bound," said he, "by the covenant to the King that last was, and by the oath of allegiance to his heirs. All the changes since have been made unlawfully by rebellious sectaries. Therefore we ought as loyal subjects to restore the King, and for the issue let God do what He will."

Charles II. had sought to smooth the way for his restoration by declarations fitted to remove [illegible]ay fears [illegible] and Presbyterians as to the consequences to themselves of his being invested with the royal prerogatives and power. In his famous Declaration from Breda he promised "a liberty to tender consciences, and that no one should be disquieted for differences of opinion in matters of religion which do not disturb the peace of the kingdom." At first it seemed as if his Majesty, when in possession of the throne, meant to keep his word with his Nonconformist subjects in this matter; and in justice to Charles it must be said that he showed himself more concerned to act honourably towards them than were those who had drawn up the Declaration for him, and were now the administrators of his authority. The Earl of Manchester, as Lord Chamberlain, was authorised to appoint some of the leading Presbyterian divines to the office of Chaplain to the King; of these Baxter was one, and he had the honour of preaching once before the King, as had also Reynolds, Calamy, and Spurstowe. His Majesty even went so far as to grant an interview to certain of the Presbyterian ministers for the purpose of considering the proposals which they had to make as to the best method of settling the affairs of the Church, so as to unite in one communion both the Presbyterians and the Episcopalians. At this Baxter was the chief speaker on the Presbyterian side; and the substance of what he urged upon the King was summed up in three points:—"Not to make any unnecessary thing a term of communion; not to allow the discipline of the Church to become so lax as to be tolerant of sin; and not to suffer the faithful pastors who must exercise such discipline, if it be exercised, to be removed, and unworthy men to be obtruded in their place." The King professed himself pleased by what he had heard; promised to do his utmost to bring both parties together; and intimated his conviction that this could be accomplished only by "abating somewhat on both sides and meeting in the midway." Charles probably meant no more by this than to wind up the conference in a manner that, without pledging himself to anything special, would be agreeable to those who had waited on him; for, with all his faults, "the merry monarch" had the courtesy that became his station, and possessed largely that nameless charm of manner which was the heritage of his race, and had given such dangerous influence to his father and great-grandmother. The worthy divines were overwhelmed with delight at his Majesty's graciousness; and "old Mr. Ash burst out into tears with joy, and could not forbear expressing what gladness this promise of his Majesty had put into his heart."

In all probability Charles would have willingly accepted any arrangement that would have pleased all parties, and left him to enjoy in peace the good things in which he delighted. But this case was not one which could be very easily managed; and as those who had now obtained the ascendancy in the state were for the most part men strongly opposed to such concessions as the Nonconformists demanded, it must have been manifest to all that that "midway" on which his Majesty suggested they must meet would be one exceedingly difficult to reach. The King foresaw that the great difficulty would be about Church government. On this point the Nonconformists were willing to make concessions, so far as to accept Archbishop Usher's scheme of a reduced episcopacy; but that admitted so large an infusion of the Presbyterian element that to adopt it would have been in effect to abolish Episcopacy as it had previously existed in the English Church. To this one does not see how the Episcopal party could be expected to assent. The only course by which peace could have been preserved was, in accordance with the King's declaration from Breda, to give full "liberty to tender consciences" by allowing the Nonconformists to retain their place in the Church without exacting from them concurrence in what they conscientiously disapproved. Whether such a course was practicable may be questioned; but it was one of which the dominant party had no inclination to make trial.

Conferences and debates ensued, petitions were presented to the King, declarations and counter-declarations were issued; the terms proposed by the one party were canvassed and criticised by the other; and, as is usual in such cases, the contest waxed hotter, the longer it was continued. Into this turmoil, in which Baxter bore a principal share, it is not necessary that we should enter minutely here. It may suffice to say that whilst the Nonconformists demanded a reduced episcopacy, a revised liturgy, and exemption from certain usages in worship which had previously prevailed, the opposite party insisted on the restoration of everything to the state in which it had been before the great Rebellion. Once during the storm there were appearances which seemed to hold out a promise of returning peace. The King issued a declaration in which he adopted so many of the proposals of the ministers, that Baxter thought, if his Majesty's scheme became law, no man who had taken the Covenant would scruple to accept it. Proposals were at the same time made to confer three vacant bishoprics on Presbyterian divines, those selected being Reynolds, Calamy, and Baxter. Of this last proposal Baxter warmly approved, only he begged for himself to decline the honour intended for him; not because he judged the thing unlawful in itself as described in the King's declaration, but because he knew it would take him off his studies. All that he would accept was the vicarage of Kidderminster, if the incumbent could be provided for by being placed in some sinecure post; if not, he was content to remain as he was.

The hopes excited by these proceedings proved delusive. After much time had been spent in fruitless discussions between the bishops and the Presbyterians, Parliament interfered; and the prelatic party being in the ascendant, a bill was passed restoring the bishops to their former seats in the House of Lords and their former jurisdiction, and a committee was appointed "to view the several laws for confirming the liturgy of the Church of England . . . . to bring in a compendious bill to supply any defect in the former laws; and to provide for an effectual conformity to the liturgy of the Church for the time to come." This was a preliminary to the passing of the "Act for the uniformity of Public Prayers and Administration of the Sacraments," which was read a third time in the Commons on the 9th of July, 1661, and after sundry amendments, received the royal assent and became law on the 19th of May, 1662.

During the two years that preceded this event Baxter resided chiefly in London, and was constantly occupied in the discussions and conferences which took place. He was hopeful of a better issue for a long time; but there were many things which filled him with anxiety and excited his fears. Not the least disturbing was the readiness with which the government gave ear to all rumours which tended to implicate the Nonconformists in the charge of disloyalty, and the extreme severity with which they punished any against whom their numerous spies could succeed in producing any appearance of having been engaged in treasonable plots. His own path was beset by these mischievous emissaries. He hardly ever preached a sermon, he tells us, without receiving reports from Westminster that he had given offence by his preaching. Because in a discourse on the words "And he was speechless," he had said that "wicked men and the refusers of grace, however they may now have many things to say to excuse their sin, will at last be speechless, and not dare stand to their wickedness before God," he was reported to the bishop of London as having preached seditiously. His efforts to resume his labours at Kidderminster were baffled, though he offered to preach there for nothing; and he was even refused the satisfaction of once more administering the sacrament to the people, and preaching a farewell sermon. He had even reason to believe that soldiers were in readiness to prevent his preaching anywhere near the sphere of his former labours had he persisted in making the attempt. So far did his enemies go in their endeavours to injure him, that a letter was forged for the purpose of implicating him in a plot to overthrow the government. Happily the insinuation was too vague and groundless to be formed into an accusation, and the charge fell to the ground.

These things were but "the beginning of sorrows." The Act of Uniformity, passed in May, prescribed the 24th of August following as the day when every clergyman of the Church of England must, after the reading of the morning and evening prayer as prescribed in the Book of Common Prayer, "openly and publicly, before the congregation there assembled, declare his unfeigned assent and consent to the use of all things in the said book." To refuse or neglect to do this was ipso facto to incur deprivation of "all spiritual promotions;" in other words, to be cast out of whatever office the party so acting held in the Church. To the Nonconformists such an act was virtually an act of expulsion; for, as a matter of course, they could not with any decency, to say nothing of conscience, express their "unfeigned assent and consent" to everything contained in a book to which they had for years been urging many and serious objections. The result was, that on the day prescribed, nearly 2000 of the best and most godly of the ministers of the Church of England took farewell of their sorrowing flocks, and went forth to face poverty, contumely, and persecution, rather than do violence to conscience, or betray the cause which they believed to be the cause of truth and of God. A grand deed, surely, whether they were right or wrong in the opinions for which they suffered! a deed of which Englishmen may well be proud for all time!

The Act of Uniformity had excluded the Nonconformists from the ministry of the English Church. But though ejected from their livings they were not silenced, and as they retained the confidence and affection of their flocks, they still continued to exercise influence over them by their preaching. To put a stop to this, the Conventicle Act was passed in 1664. By this the meeting of more than four persons for religious exercises in other manner than as allowed by the liturgy and practice of the Church of England, was forbidden under a penalty of a fine of £5, or three months' imprisonment for each person for the first offence; a fine of £10 or six months' imprisonment for the second; and a fine of £100, or transportation for seven years to some one of his Majesty's plantations, for the third. The ministers were thus precluded from preaching to, or holding meetings, except of the most limited extent, with their former flocks. Still they might be among them, and in various ways might exercise influence over them. This, therefore, must also be prevented; and accordingly the Five Mile Act became law, by which Nonconformist ministers were prohibited from coming or being within five miles of any city or town corporate, or any borough sending burgesses to parliament, or any place, however rural, where they had at any time exercised their ministry. This was a sentence of banishment into the most lonely and unpeopled parts of the country, and as they were prohibited from occupying themselves in any way in the work of education in the place of their banishment, it was virtually a dooming to hard labour of men whose education and training unfitted them for such pursuits, but who, destitute of worldly means, must either betake themselves to such labour or starve.

It is necessary to remind the reader of these historical facts, for out of them arose much of what has now to be narrated of the life of Richard Baxter.

Shortly after the Act of Uniformity took effect, Baxter entered into the marriage relation with Margaret Charlton, a young lady to whom his preaching had proved useful. Though there was considerable disparity of age between them, and though Baxter's infirmities and peculiarities might be supposed not to promise much for domestic felicity, the marriage turned out an exceedingly happy one. "We lived," says he, "in inviolated love and mutual complacency, sensible of the benefit of mutual help, nearly nineteen years. I know not that ever we had any breach in point of love, or point of interest, save only that she somewhat grudged that I had persuaded her, for my quietness, to surrender so much of her estate, to the disabling her from helping others so much as she earnestly desired." He refers here to his having stipulated before their marriage that she should relinquish of her small fortune whatever might involve them in lawsuits. It was characteristic of the man that he also stipulated that he "should have nothing that before the marriage was hers." They were married on the 10th of September, 1662.

After residing some time in London, Baxter took up his abode in the small village of Acton. Here he devoted himself to his favourite occupation of writing books; and to the period between his leaving Kidderminster, in 1661, and 1665, belong several of his most important works; among the rest his "Reasons for the Christian Religion," 4to, his "Divine Life," 4to, and his "Christian Directory; or Sum of Practical Divinity," folio. The last of these is a treatise on Christian Ethics and Casuistry, intended to be the companion of another work which he was writing in Latin, and in which he purposed to set forth the theoretic side of the Christian theology. The author apologises for the deficiencies of the book, especially the small number of cases of conscience which he has considered, on the ground that it was written when he had been "long separated from his library, and from all books saving an inconsiderable parcel which wandered with him where he went." He naïvely adds, "But perhaps there will be enough for those I intend them for." Most readers of the present day will probably think that a few of them might have been spared.

At Acton, Baxter was beyond the reach of the Five Mile Act, but he was still within that of the Conventicle Act, and in consequence of this, was brought into trouble. Though he complied with it so far as to abstain from publicly preaching, he was in the habit of conducting a religious service with his own family, and as several of the neighbours of their own accord came to this, and he could not reconcile it with his conscience or with right feeling either to send them away when they thus came, or to forbid them to come, he soon placed himself in circumstances in which he might be brought under the penalties of the Act. But no action of this kind was taken against him for a long time. Whether this arose from supineness in the matter on the part of the magistrates, or from unwillingness on the part of the people to lodge information against him; or whether it was due to his intimacy with Chief-Justice Hale, who resided near Acton, and often sought his society; or whether the calamities of the metropolis—for it was the time of the Plague and the Great Fire in London—gave the authorities something else to think about than persecuting the Nonconformists, the happy result to Baxter was, that he was permitted not only to pursue his studies in peace, but also to minister of God's truth to many who were hungering for the bread of life. It could not be expected, however, that with such an Act in force this state of peace could always last. Though he never conducted his service during church hours, and made a point of going with his hearers to the parish church when his own service was over, he gave offence to the clergyman of the parish, partly by holding these meetings, partly by refusing to come to the sacrament in his church. In consequence of this, a warrant was issued to bring Baxter before the justices at Brentford, and they, by their mittimus, sent him to Clerkenwell Prison for holding a conventicle. An informality in their proceeding led to his being discharged when the case was brought, by his demanding his habeas corpus, into the Court of Common Pleas; somewhat, apparently, to Baxter's disappointment, who was thus deprived of the opportunity of arguing the question fully on its merits. The magistrates made another attempt to seize him, and this time they thought to lodge him in Newgate; "which was," says he, "since the fire which burnt down all the better rooms, the most noisome place that I have heard of, of any prison in the land, except the Tower dungeon." His enemies, however, were not as yet so far to prevail against him.

Baxter did not return to Acton, but on his liberation, went to live at Totteridge. Here he spent three years (1670—73) "of great peace, among quiet neighbours." He suffered much, however, at this time from ill health, was "seldom free from much anguish," and was "in deaths oft." Nevertheless, he held on his course of work with unabated ardour; preparing for the press volume after volume, and toiling at his huge "Methodus Theologiæ," the greater part of which was written at this time. To this period also belongs that noble work, "The Life of Faith."

The reputation which Baxter had acquired as a theologian, led to his friendship being sought by several continental divines of eminence; and at one time he seems even to have contemplated the possibility of seeking refuge from the distractions of his own country in a foreign residence. Whilst he was at Totteridge a proposal of a still more extraordinary kind was made to him. It came from the Court, through the Earl of Lauderdale. When this nobleman was on his way to Scotland to carry out the schemes of the Court for the settling of the ecclesiastical affairs of that country, he sent for Baxter to meet him at Barnet, and there in the King's name offered him, if he would go to Scotland, a church, or a bishopric, or the management of one of the colleges. It is not easy to conceive why such a proposal was made to Baxter, as it was one not at all likely to be accepted by him. He treated it, however, as meant in good faith and in kindness to himself; and in declining it did so with the utmost courtesy, assigning as reasons of his declinature, his infirm health, his desire to complete the books on which he was engaged, and the inconvenience of moving his family and books so far. In the letter to Lauderdale, however, in which he communicates these reasons, he takes occasion to hint that if he was thought worthy of having liberty to preach in Scotland, where there were already enough for the work who were likely to do it better than he, it was strange and unreasonable that he should, in his own country, be liable, for doing the very same thing, to be sent to Newgate among thieves and robbers; and he concludes by earnestly entreating Lauderdale to use his influence that he might be permitted to reside in London where he could oversee the press and collect around him his books, which he had left at Kidderminster and had not seen for ten years, and that he might have liberty occasionally to preach the Gospel there gratuitously; "for," he adds, "it is not maintenance that I expect." Whether Lauderdale conveyed his desire to the King does not appear; certain it is that no favour was ever again shown to him by the Court.

Whilst Baxter was residing at Totteridge the attempt was made by Charles to suspend the operation of the Acts against Nonconformists by his own royal authority, a step to which, it is believed, he was moved by a desire to favour the Romanist clergy. Of the inexpediency and unlawfulness of such procedure the leading men among the evangelical Nonconformists were in no doubt; but they did not on that account feel that they were precluded from availing themselves of the opportunity which was thus opened to them of worshipping God according to the dictates of their consciences. Accordingly, many of the silenced ministers in and around London began to preach where they could find a place suited for the purpose; and at length, having obtained licence from the King, they aimed at ministering to regular congregations. Baxter was among the number of those who took this course; and he made use of his licence to preach every Tuesday at Mr. Turner's Church, New Street, Fetter Lane. This service, which he rendered gratuitously, he commenced on the 24th of January, $167\frac{2}{3}$; and in this was the origin of the Tuesday Lecture, which still, we believe, continues to be delivered, though not now in the same place.

Shortly after this he removed his residence to London, where he took a house in Bloomsbury.

The Parliament having constrained the King to resile from his unconstitutional attempt to suspend laws by his own sovereign will, the Act of Uniformity again came into force. The common danger, however, arising from the aggressions of Popery, served for a season to throw the Church of England party and the evangelical Nonconformists more upon each other for mutual support; and this prevented interference for the time with the liberties of the latter. Attempts were even made to renew negotiations, with a view to the healing of the breach which had been made between them. But these came to nothing; and the passing of the Test Act, while it tended to abate the anxieties of the Church party as to the influence of Popery, imposed on the Nonconformists new disabilities, and excited new animosities.

At this time Baxter was struggling with severe bodily ailments, which often brought him very low. Writing under date of April, 1674, he says, "At this time God so much increased my languishing, and laid me so low . . . . that I had reason to think that my time on earth would not be long. And oh!" he adds, "how good hath the will of God proved hitherto to me; and will it not be the best at last? Experience causeth me to say to his praise, 'Great peace have they that love his law, and nothing shall offend them; and though my flesh and heart do fail, God is the rock of my heart, and my portion for ever.'"

These illnesses considerably interfered with his public work; and he was obliged to give up some services he had begun in London. He had a room over St. James's Market-place, where he preached once a week; and this service he managed to keep up. One day as he was preaching, a main beam on which the floor of the room rested gave way, and the whole audience might have been precipitated to the street, but for the presence of mind of Mrs. Baxter. Hearing the crack, she went down-stairs, and accosting the first person she met, she asked what was his occupation. On being told in reply that he was a carpenter, she got him to fetch a prop from his yard which was at hand, and place it under the cracked beam, so that it bore the weight under which it was beginning to sink. The congregation were alarmed, but the preacher succeeded in preventing a panic, so that none were injured. Though considerably pestered by the assiduity of informers, who were constantly lodging accusations against him, Baxter continued his preaching at St. James's Market, with no small encouragement. The alarm of insecurity in the building having driven away most of the wealthier sort, especially the women, his audience consisted chiefly of young men, and persons drawn from the immediate neighbourhood, mostly persons of degraded condition and habits. His labours among them were signally blessed of God. "Many," he says, "that had not come to church for years received so much, and manifested so great a change (some Papists, and divers others returning public thanks to God for their conversion), as made all my charge and trouble easy to me." One would have thought that labours such as those, so useful, and so disinterested, might at least have been suffered to go on without interruption. But when the flames of persecution have been kindled, they are apt to burn with indiscriminate fury; and oftentimes it is those who have deserved best of the community who suffer most in consequence. Baxter found it so. After several attempts to punish him had failed, his enemies at last succeeded in having warrants issued against him, and he was fined in the sum of 50*l.* upon two judgments, for preaching a lecture in New Street. "Some Conformists," he quietly remarks in recording this, "are paid to the value of 20*l.* a sermon for their preaching, and I must pay 20*l.*, and 40*l.* a sermon for preaching for nothing!"

Baxter, however, was not without friends even among the nobility, and by their means he sometimes escaped the blows that were aimed at him. He was even encouraged, though somewhat reluctantly, to consent to the building of a suitable place of worship in lieu of the insecure place at St. James's Market, and to this several persons of rank largely subscribed. By the exertions of Mrs. Baxter a place was also erected at Bloomsbury, where her husband engaged occasionally to preach. But his persecutors still continued to harass him. Wearied of keeping his doors shut on those who came to distrain on his goods for preaching, he resolved at length to give up housekeeping, to sell his goods, and first to hide his library and then to sell it. "The prelates," says he, "to hinder me from preaching deprived me also of these private comforts, but God saw that they were my snare. We brought nothing into this world, and we must carry nothing out. The loss is very tolerable."

Having now no goods to be distrained, Baxter's persecutors sought to silence him by seizing his person. He had only preached once in his new chapel, when he escaped being sent to jail by taking refuge with a friend in the country. Having whilst there acceded to the wish of the parish minister to preach in his church, he aroused the wrath of his enemies to exasperation, and they resolved to leave no means untried to lodge him in prison. The state of his health, however, compelling him to live in great quiet, and death having removed most of those who, as informers or justices, were most ready to serve their designs against him, it was a considerable time before they could get him into their power. After a year's silence he resumed preaching in London, though not in his own chapel, which was closed against him. He preached principally in a chapel in Swallow Street.

Trials of another kind now began to cast their shadows over his path. Death was fast taking away from him those friends with whom he delighted to hold converse, and many of whom had been partakers with him in his conflicts and his sufferings for the cause of truth and liberty. He had followed some of the dearest of them to the tomb, when the heaviest stroke of all fell upon him in the death of his wife, an event which took place on the 14th of June, 1681. To him such a loss was irreparable. For many years she had been his cherished companion, able to sympathise with him in his labours, ever ready to soothe and cheer him amid his troubles. And now in his old age, with infirmity growing upon him, with evil tongues busy around, and with clouds gathering ominously over his own prospects and those of his country, he was left to struggle on as he best could, without the solace of her society, or the strength of her sympathy. It was a sore and heavy trial that had come upon him. But the good man saw God's hand in it, and he humbly bowed his head to the stroke. He had learned to say with Job: "The Lord gave and the Lord hath taken away, blessed be the name of the Lord."

Amid all these troubles and sorrows his pen never rested. Volume after volume of every size, from the huge folio down to the single sermon, came forth from his prolific brain and unwearying hand. Between 1673, when he left Totteridge, and 1682, shortly after his wife died, he published no fewer than forty works, some of them of great length and elaboration, many of them controversial, and all of them the result of study and thought. Among these was "A Breviate of the Life of Mrs. Margaret Baxter," with the writing of which he consoled the first months of his widowhood; and his "Poetical Fragments," in which, in strains somewhat rugged, often prosaic, but always pious, and occasionally rising into true poetry, he gives vent to his feelings and aspirations concerning Divine things.

If ever a man had by toil and suffering earned a right to spend the evening of his life in peace, it was Richard Baxter. But this boon was not to be his. Rather were his latter days to be among the most troubled of his troubled life. When he returned from the country, whither he had retreated for a season after his wife's death, bonds and imprisonment awaited him. The Apostle's fight with the wild beasts at Ephesus could hardly have been much sorer than that which Baxter had to endure in London.

Exhausted by ill-health, he had relinquished the pulpit, and retired to live in quiet. Why should he, then, be harassed by informers and dragged before tribunals? Old and infirm, he might have been allowed, in that "living death" as he calls it to which he was now consigned, to drag out his few remaining days in peace. But his enemies would not suffer it to be so. Though silent, he had presumed to dwell in a corporate town, and therefore under the Five Mile Act was liable to prosecution; and as he had dared to preach, though a Nonconformist, he was still liable to be called to account for that. Warrants were accordingly issued to seize his person, and distrain for 190*l.* for five sermons. He was saved from going to prison through the interposition of Dr. Cox, who took oath before the justices that to send him to prison was to imperil his life. "Let him die in his bed," said Charles, when the matter was referred to him, and so for the present his persecutors were forced to content themselves with distraining his goods, which they did, even to the bed that he lay sick on, and sold them all. But they did not stop here. "When they had taken and sold all," he says, "and I had borrowed some bedding and necessaries of the buyer, I was never the quieter; for they threatened to come upon me again, and take all as mine, whosesoever it was, which they found in my possession." Thus in pain, in sickness, and in poverty he was driven forth to seek shelter "in secret lodgings at a distance;" and, but for the liberality of his friends, he must have perished. As if this was not enough, he was sought out, again apprehended, and whilst under such suffering that he could scarcely stand, forced to appear at the quarter sessions, and become bound in four hundred pounds to his good behaviour. "I told them," he says, "I had rather they would send me to jail, than put me to wrong others by being bound with me in bonds that I was likely to break to-morrow; for if there did but five persons come in when I was praying, they would take it for a breach of good behaviour."

At this crisis Charles II. died, and his sullen, bigoted, and priest-ridden brother reigned in his stead. His accession brought no immediate mitigation of the sufferings of the Nonconformists. Baxter had been long a mark for the fury of the persecutor, and at length the full vials of his wrath were poured on the innocent and dying old man. Unable to find anything else to lay to his charge, they pounced upon an expression or two in a work he had just published, his "Paraphrase on the New Testament," in which he had let drop some censures on persecuting prelates, and had condemned the silencing of godly ministers who sought to preach in Christ's name. Though expressed in the most general terms, these passages were considered as designed to bring into contempt the King and the bishops of the Church of England, and Baxter was accordingly brought before the notorious Judge Jefferies on a charge of sedition. Jefferies behaved at the trial with his usual coarseness and brutality. He broke out upon Baxter with the most violent abuse, calling him rogue, rascal, an old blockhead, an unthankful villain; declaring that he would "handle him" for refusing to conform; and swearing by God that he deserved to be whipped through the city. Baxter was ably defended by Pollexfen, Wallop, and other eminent lawyers, on whom no small portion of the judge's abuse fell. At length Baxter ventured to put in a word of explanation for himself. "Richard, Richard," roared the judge, "dost thou think we will hear thee poison the court? "Richard, thou art an old fellow, an old knave; thou hast written books enough to load a cart, every one as full of sedition, I might say treason, as an egg is full of meat. Hadst thou been whipped out of the writing trade forty years ago, it had been happy. . . . Come, what do you say for yourself, you old knave?—come, speak up. What doth he say? I am not afraid of you, for all the snivelling calves you have got about you" (alluding to some persons near Baxter who were in tears). To this tirade Baxter calmly replied, "Your lordship need not, for I'll not hurt you. But these things will surely be understood one day; what fools one sort of Protestants are made to persecute the other." And lifting up his eyes to heaven he added, "I am not concerned to answer such stuff; but am ready to produce my writings for the refutation of all this; and my life and conversation are known to many in this nation."

Before such a tribunal neither mercy nor justice was to be expected. Accordingly, after a furious charge from the Chief-Justice, the jury brought in a verdict of guilty. When sentence came to be pronounced, Jefferies would have had the worn-out old man whipped through the city, but to this the other judges would not accede. The sentence pronounced was that he should pay a fine of 500 marks, lie in prison till he paid it, and be bound to his good behaviour for seven years.

Unable to pay this heavy fine, and knowing, besides, that if he did pay it he would in all probability be soon prosecuted again on some other pretence, Baxter went to prison. Here he continued for two years, at the end of which time he was released, through the intercession, it is said, of Lord Powis. It is probable that James's project of favouring the Papists by procuring indulgence for the Dissenters may have had not a little to do in expediting his release.

During his imprisonment, Baxter had liberty to see his friends, many of whom visited him, and with them several of the conforming clergy, who sympathised with him under the cruel injustice with which he had been treated. In the enjoyment of quiet his spirits revived, and even his bodily health improved, so that when he was liberated he was able to resume preaching. This he did in the pulpit of his friend Sylvester, for whom he officiated gratuitously every Lord's-day morning and every alternate Thursday morning for about four years and a half. His growing infirmities having at length constrained him to relinquish public ministerial service, he still sought to be about his Master's work by opening his house morning and evening to all who were willing to be present at family worship, when he read and expounded a portion of Scripture. This he continued till his strength failed, and he was obliged to keep his bed.

As before so still in the midst of all his troubles, changes, sufferings, and sorrows, his pen continued its work. Between the year 1681 and his death some of his most valuable works were written. In these there are no traces either of decaying vigour or of mental perturbation. They have all the depth and all the fervour of his earlier writings. During the time mentioned the number of his publications was nearly forty. In all, he wrote 169 separate works, large and small, some of which appeared after his death. This represents an amount of work which would be surprising in one man under any circumstances: it becomes absolutely marvellous when we consider that it was done by one who was under almost constant bodily suffering, who was much engaged in public service, who was exposed to continual harassment by persecution, and who had rarely a settled abode for more than a few years at a time.

And now the close of this vexed and toilsome life drew near. It is pleasing to know that in his last days Baxter was in peace and comfort, surrounded by kind friends, who attended to his wants and cheered him with their society. With calm, serene, humble confidence, and meek patience, he awaited the summons of death. Most comfortable to his loving spirit was the thought that he was going to join the General Assembly and Church of the First-born. Without any transports or excited emotion of any kind, he was yet without fear or doubt. He knew in Whom he had believed. When a friend asked him how he felt, his reply was, "Almost well." He was leaving his pains and sicknesses behind, and already felt as if the wholesome air of heaven was breathing health into him. He died on the morning of Tuesday the 8th of December, 1691, having just entered on his 77th year.

The feeling with which one contemplates such a history as that we have briefly sketched, is well expressed by Mr. Orme, the latest and best of Baxter's biographers. "In studying the character of Richard Baxter," says he, "while I would do honour to the man and justice to his talents; while I would speak in the strongest terms of his genius and his eloquence; while I would venerate him as the leader of the noble army of Nonconformist confessors, whose labours and sufferings have secured for them a deathless renown; I would, above all, contemplate him as the MAN of GOD, strong in faith, rich in the fruits of love, and adorned with the beauties of holiness."*

W. L. ALEXANDER.

THOMAS-À-KEMPIS' IMITATION OF CHRIST.

THE greater number even of good religious books disappear with the age that produced them. It was sufficient honour for their authors to have ranked among the teachers of one generation. They may still be found upon the topmost and dustiest shelves of book-collectors, or in the cellars of our national libraries, but they have ceased to exert any appreciable influence on the religious thought and action of posterity. What was most valuable in such writings has probably been assimilated and reproduced in new forms and colours by other minds; what was ephemeral has vanished. This is true of thousands of works to which there was promised, at the time of their appearance, a certain immortality.

But there is a rare class of works, which, after making a profound impression on the age that saw their birth, are found to retain their popularity and power, and some of which after the lapse of centuries are, by means of translations, at this hour extending their intellectual and spiritual dominion. As in the instance of the bones of the old prophet, when the dead body was let down into his grave and was immediately revived by contact with them, so do these books continue to give forth a vitalising influence. When this is the case, it will generally be observed that the work contains an unusual amount of the essential truth of Scripture which operates as a preservative spice or salt; that, along with this, the author has transfused into it an extraordinary measure of his own individuality and earnestness, of his higher and better self, thus stamping it with originality and freshness; and that genius or high talent, in some of its many forms, is linked to religious thought. As in the example of the antediluvians, the great vital force accounts for the longevity. To this rare class of religious compositions belongs "The Imitation of Christ," by Thomas-à-Kempis.

The earliest edition of this religious treatise carries us back through nearly four centuries, or a hundred years beyond the Reformation. In the intervening ages, it is affirmed to have been translated into sixty different languages, and to have passed through 1800 editions, and probably to have been more read than any other religious book, the Bible alone excepted. And that it has in no degree been indebted to external circumstances connected with its composition for the hold which it retains of human interest, may be concluded from the fact, that its authorship was, for many ages, the subject of as much discussion as that of the celebrated letters of Junius, and that the controversial works which have been expended on this one subject have occupied a hundred times more space than the original work itself. It became a national question between the learned schools of different countries; and universities ranged themselves on the side of opposite claimants. The theologians and literary men of France generally contended that Thomas-à-Kempis was merely the transcriber of the book, and that John Gerson, a famous chancellor of the University of Paris, was its real author. Others put forward the name of John Gersen, whose name has been found attached to one manuscript; but one is strongly tempted to suspect that this is only a slight misnomer for the Chancellor. The German and Flemish writers who entered the lists in this long-pending discussion, declared themselves on the side of À-Kempis, and were ultimately supported by the powerful authority of the Sorbonne. The external evidence on the side of the two principal claimants seems nearly equal; but not to speak of a very distinct line of unbroken tradition, the internal evidence turns the scale in favour of À-Kempis; for Gerson was never the inmate of a monastery, which Thomas-à-Kempis was for seventy years, and the whole composition bears the indubitable mark of monastic life, and evidently comes from the pen of a solitary, though kind-hearted ascetic.

Only the scantiest fragments of information have been gathered regarding the life of this singularly eminent devotional writer. Like some other of our greatest names in literature, he is known almost entirely by his book. He is reported to have been born in the year 1380, at Kempen, a little walled town in the Duchy of Cleves. Beginning his theological studies at the age of thirteen, he assumed the habit of the Augustine monks at the age of twenty-five, joining himself to a society of this Order in the Monastery of Mount St. Agnes, of which he eventually became sub-prior. In this monastery he lived for seventy years, and was distinguished for his humility, his diligent study of the Scriptures, his ascetic severity of life, his moving eloquence of speech, as well as for the length of his vigils and the fervour of his prayers. And it was amid the lonely vigils of Mount St. Agnes, after he had long passed the middle period of human life, that his "Imitation of Christ" was slowly written, originally in the somewhat barbaric Latin, which was the common language of learned devotion in those days.

The title, "The Imitation of Christ," which has evidently been adopted from the first chapter, does not accurately designate the entire work. It might with more propriety be represented as descriptive of the inner life of a good man in his struggles against sin, and his efforts after the highest attainments in sanctity, and as designed, by the meditations and the holy maxims with which it is thickly strewn, to assist and encourage others in similar contemplations and earnest soul-conflicts. In all this, there is much of conscious or unconscious autobiography. We may imagine him, like Savonarola in his cell at Florence,

> With looks commercing with the skies,
> His rapt soul sitting in his eyes.

The whole work, however, is circumscribed by the conditions of a formal and entire separation from the outer world, so that there is scarcely any reference in it to social and domestic duties, proving how inaccurately it has been designated "The Imitation" of Christ, who was reproached by his enemies for the freedom and frequency of his intercourse with men, "the friend of publicans and sinners." But within its own circle, as I have thus described it, as reflecting the earnest aspirations of a devout spirit after the good and pure, the communion of the individual soul with itself and God, this work of À-Kempis is by far the most precious devotional treatise that preceded the great religious literature of the Reformation, at least since the time of the Confessions of St. Augustine. The principle which forms the undertone of the whole composition, is the duty and happiness of the complete subjection of our own will to the divine will; and the quaint lines of Bishop Ken have well expressed its condensed spirit:—

> His will entire, he to God's will resign'd,
> And what pleas'd God, pleas'd his devoted mind.
> Thrice happy saint, remote from haunts of ill;
> Employed in hymn, and dispossess'd of will.

We have touched, in what we have just said, on one principal defect of the work,—a defect clinging indeed to all the devotional literature that is the growth of convents,—that it reflects only the religion of contemplation and solitude. The retirement commended in the teachings of Scripture, and by the example of Christ and his Apostles, is temporary and not perpetual, voluntary and not votive,—retirement in order to intercourse with men, and vigorous and devoted action for God when in the midst of them. John the Baptist was in the desert as the fit preparation for his appearing unto Israel; and Paul retired for a season into Arabia, but it was as part of his divine education for his going forth as the great missionary to the Gentiles. Jeremy Taylor, who wrote in a more favoured age than À-Kempis, has put the case not more happily in language than in discriminating thought, when he has said, "Solitude is a good school, and the world the best theatre. The institution is best there, the practice here. The wilderness hath the advantage of discipline, but society furnisheth the opportunities of perfection." Had the vigils of À-Kempis been alternated by social intercourse, and the culture of domestic virtue in family life, his piety would not have been less heavenly, but it would have been more human and genial, and would have touched human nature at far more points. The devotion of a monastery, even when like that of Thomas-à-Kempis it is most sincere and ardent, reminds us of a lamp burning in a place where it is abundantly fed with oil, but not duly sustained by a fresh and healthful atmosphere. Open the windows and let in a fuller stream of air, it will not extinguish the lamp, but will certainly make its flame purer and stronger.

Unquestionably, too, this remarkable work is also defective, through not bringing into greater prominence than it does the great central Christian motives and helps to holy living. It would indeed be unjust to À-Kempis to say that they are not there; but for the great purpose that he aims at in his book for himself and others, they are not sufficiently outstanding and diffused. In the place which they occupy, they remind us of the towers of public buildings and the village spires in North Holland, as descried by one when sailing on the Zuyder-Zee, scarcely appearing to rise above the flat surface. À-Kempis deals too exclusively in rules and self-inspection, and in a somewhat too vague and abstract contemplation, when he should be looking forth into the sunlight of divine truths, and laying open his bosom to their life-giving warmth. Compare the joy of Luther's religion with the sombre piety of the Augustinian recluse, and you will soon see the difference. On the one there too often falls the cold shadow of the convent-wall; the other is strong in his evangelical freedom, and his healthy happy spirit seems constantly to live within sound of the song of the angels at Bethlehem. We are even prepared to concede that there are passages in which contrition is tinged with asceticism, in which the author appears to do battle quite as much with the instincts of the creature as with the depravity of the sinner, and in which the self-abnegation which he commends and practises has a nearer affinity to that of Madame Guyon and the Mystics than of Christ and his Apostles.

But when we have made these exceptions, "The Imitation of Christ" remains, in our estimate, a great and wondrous book still, standing out, like all great works, with the stamp of originality upon it, bringing the reader into intimate fellowship with a mind of uncommon natural powers that is aiming after seraphic purity, and elevating him into a region of thought into which it is impossible for a mind of any discrimination and religious susceptibility to pass, without coming forth wiser, humbler, and holier. That book must indeed have rare and solid excellences of some kind, which has kept hold of the interest of Christendom for 400 years.

It is remarkable how few of the characteristic errors of the papal system show themselves in the work. Whether À-Kempis formally rejects them or not, assuredly they do not form the pabulum of his inner life. So much has this been felt by Romanists, that in what professes to be a "Brief Summary of the Four Books of the Imitation of Christ," which we have seen, evidently prepared by some Italian ecclesiastic, a considerable measure of the alloy of Romish doctrine is quietly mixed up with the purer gold of À-Kempis, and the whole treatise dishonestly altered for the worse. It is noticeable regarding the greatest of the old masters in painting, such as Michael Angelo, that when they represent sacred subjects, they shake off, by a kind of instinct, many of the human accretions that have gathered around them, and are much more faithful than inferior painters to the simple Scripture facts; and something like this is true doctrinally in regard to the best of those devotional writers that ante-dated the Reformation. While, far from being uninjured by the superincumbent mass of error, their minds, like the roots of some vigorous tree, appear to have struck down to the richer and purer soil beneath, and to have drawn from it their chief nourishment.

"The Imitation of Christ" has a special value to the thoughtful student of Church history. For along with some other writings that appeared in those ages preceding the great revival of the sixteenth century, in which the simplicity of Christian doctrine was overlaid by the inventions of superstition, or superseded by the icy subtleties of the schoolmen, and vices and abuses of every form had grown rank and shameless within the pale of the visible Church, it proves that there were always men who did not partake of the sins and errors of the apostasy, but whose lives and writings were a constant protest against the surrounding evils. There was, in fact, a Protestantism before the Reformation, a stream of inextinguishable light which can be traced up through the darkness of the worst centuries. Bonaventura did much the same service as Thomas-à-Kempis, and Tauler's sermons and other popular writings, not without a vein of the "true evangel" passing through them and vitalising them, helped to keep from extinction the Church within the Church. God's hidden ones lived upon them in secret; and when the cry at length sounded throughout Europe, "Come out of her, my people," these were the men who first welcomed the sound, and not only stepped forth from their convents into the light of day, but into the intellectual and moral sunlight of a revived and restored Christianity.

We think, moreover, that a work like this has its special uses in times like ours, when the meditative element seems well-nigh excluded from the lives of so many Christians. If religion in those days suffered from a too continuous contemplation, have we not, in our days, passed into an opposite extreme; and while we wisely shun the cloister, do we sufficiently frequent the closet? And, if in one case the waters became stagnant, do they not as certainly in the other case become shallow? It will not do, even for the most strong-winged bird, to be always on the wing. A union of the solitude and self-scrutiny of men like À-Kempis with the action of the present age, would produce a form of Christian character more conformed to the Bible, and more perfect than either. There never was a period in which it was more needed that Christ should take us into the desert for a while that He may talk with us. Luther's practice of spending the three best hours of every day in solitary devotion, is far more wondered at by good men in these times than imitated. And, one kindred benefit likely to be derived from a discriminating acquaintance with this remarkable book, would be to make us more severe judges of ourselves, and so to feel less at ease and self-complacent; and to show us what so many persons with a Christian name appear to have almost forgotten, that the most intense and real, as well as momentous of all battles, is that which we wage within. The mower has always his whetstone near him when he is mowing; the devout Christian is wise who has the "Imitation of Christ" always within reach, to put a finer edge upon his spirit.

But what I believe has given its principal value to this book in the estimate of multitudes, is the wonderful beauty and heart-searching power of many of its detached sentences; there are barbed sayings in it which pierce you through and through; there are others which refresh you by their suggestiveness; and others still which express familiar truths with a conciseness and beauty that remind you of apples of gold in baskets of silver. You cannot read many pages without pausing over a sentence, as you would over a rare gem in some collection or cabinet. Indeed, there are not a few individual sayings which it would not be difficult to expand into a discourse without undue diffuseness; and we think we could even name sermons of some value with their open blossoms, of which the seed-thought had been found in Thomas-à-Kempis. Let us indulge in a few quotations, such as our own age might profitably ruminate.

"I had rather feel compunction than be able to give the most accurate definition of it." This may serve as a rebuke to the men who are more anxious to appear right than earnest to be righteous.

And the following might be useful as a check on the imprudence of many in these times, who are ever leading forth novices in religion to parade their experience: "How often has the growth of holiness been checked by its being too hastily made known and too highly commended. And how greatly hath it flourished in that humble state of silence and obscurity so desirable in the present life, which is one scene of temptation, one continual warfare."

"It would be but reasonable to expect that the fervour of our affections and our progress in holiness should have advanced higher and higher every day; but it is now thought to be a foundation of comfort and even of boast, if a man at the close of this mortal life is able to retain some degree of his first ardour."

"We must be particularly on our guard against the first assaults of temptation, for the enemy will be more easily subdued if he is resisted in his first approaches and not suffered to enter the portals of our hearts."

When Sir James Stephen says: "A scriptural mind is the best interpreter of Scripture," he only reproduces what our author had written four centuries before: "Every part of the Holy Scriptures must be read by the same spirit by which it was written."

And when he thus counsels us, "In the morning and in the evening examine thy behaviour, what thou hast that day been in thought, word, or deed; for in all these, perhaps, thou hast offended God and thy brother," we are thankful to holy Herbert for having turned the vigorous prose into quaint verse,—

> Sum up at night what thou hast done by day;
> And in the morning what thou hast to do.
> Dress and undress thy soul, mark the decay
> And growth of it: if, with thy watch, that too
> Be down, then wind up both; since we shall be
> Most surely judged, make thy accounts agree.

When again he remarks that "it is unprofitable and vain to be dejected or elevated by the anticipation of that which may never come to pass;—what other effect doth thy extreme anxiety about the events of to-morrow produce than the accumulation of anguish upon anguish?"—we are reminded of Howe's denunciation of the utter folly of "causing ourselves to suffer a thousand times beforehand in imagination, what we may only be called to suffer once in reality." The following sentences reflect much of the spirit of the whole book: "When self is once overcome, the conquest of every other evil will be easy. This is the true victory, this is the glorious triumph of the new man! And he whose sensual appetite is kept in continual subjection to his spirit, and his spirit in continual subjection to the will of Christ, he is this mighty conqueror of himself and the lord of the whole world."

These are a few samples of those wedges of gold, those sayings of sanctified wisdom with which the treasury of this ancient book is replenished. It would not, indeed, be very difficult to bring forth other sayings to which we could not give an unqualified approval, and some from which we must entirely dissent. But Thomas-à-Kempis must be judged by the circumstances in the midst of which he lived, and which cast their influence upon him; and so judged, he will be a man wondered at. Had he flourished in the more favourable times which followed the Reformation, the greatest imperfections of his book would have been absent. He would still, indeed, have been the man of meek-eyed contemplation. We can imagine him in England, in the days of the Commonwealth or of the Restoration, finding congenial spirits in such men as George Herbert or Bishop Ken, walking with Jeremy Taylor in his half exile on the shores of Lough Neagh, and even visiting the humble dwelling of the great Puritan, John Howe, listening for hours to his divine philosophy, and thanking him a thousand times for his great work, in which the highest forms of human thought blend so richly with meditative devotion: "A Good man is the Temple of God."

ANDREW THOMSON.

A PRAYER.

ETERNAL Son of God, most high,
To Thee I raise my voice, my cry;
My supplication hear:
Of God true God, and Light of light,
Disperse the shadows of the night,
And let the day appear.

Behold, the night is now withdrawn,
The day appears with lovely dawn,
And spreads its purple round:
The woods, and fields, and flocks rejoice;
The birds awake with grateful voice,
And all harmonious sound.

Yet shades of ignorance cloud my breast;
With mists of error still opprest,
It longs for clearer day;
Arise, O purest Light! arise,
Remove the gloom which dims my eyes,
My darkness chase away.

Dissolve the cold which chills my heart,
The warming beams of light impart,
Enliven every power:
Oh! let the dew of grace distil;
My soul with heavenly virtues fill
And guard it every hour.

G. B.

A VERY REMARKABLE DINNER-TABLE.

HAD the Apostle James seen such a sight as a band of invalids and poor sick children cared for and fed in a large and crowded city, he would undoubtedly have been delighted, and most likely would have adduced it as an example to those whom he reminds that sending away a starving brother without giving him that which is needful for the body, doth not profit (James ii. 15, 16). Certainly the soul is more than the body, and the life is more than meat; and he who supposes that he has done the highest service by giving a poor man a good dinner, ought to look again at the Lord's Prayer, which shows by the order of petitions that daily bread is not the first thing to be asked for. But, on the other hand, the fact that it is one of the petitions, shows that bodily food stands in close connection with man's highest spiritual concerns. It is quite true that you cannot serve God without faith; but it is equally true that you cannot serve Him without food. Experience has taught that continuous scantiness of food, as a rule, is as injurious to man's spiritual life as continuous excess. It is very well to preach the Gospel to the poor, but there are many poor people upon whose hearts your words fail to take effect, because their bodies lack the commonest nourishment. Those Christians who advocate teetotalism aver that drinking must be abandoned before the Gospel can do its work. This statement may be questioned by some, but I do not scruple to aver that the pangs of hunger must be satisfied before any good can come of spiritual teaching.

To feed and clothe the poor so that they may be the better for your charity, is not an easy task. An indiscriminate run of free dinners may be made a very hurtful thing to the poor themselves. There is a vast number of the lowest class who do not care for work. Their number would increase tenfold if they were made sure of their dinner being provided for them.

The founder of "The Invalids' Dinner Table," G. M. Hicks, Esq., was fully convinced of these truths when he started the little institution at Woburn Buildings. "This," he wrote in a circular, "is not an attempt to feed the poor of a district, any more than it is to relieve all the idle vagrants who prey upon the charitably disposed of every neighbourhood." He perceived the true character of Christian charity as distinguished from communistic philanthropy or mere sentimental compassion. Desirous as charity is of lessening the heavy burden that presses upon the shoulders of the poor, it tries at the same time to increase their strength for bearing the burden. This certainly cannot be effected by taking it from their shoulders altogether. The poor must know that to them as well as to the rich it is said "that every man shall bear his own burden" (Gal. iv. 5). If from some reason or other the poor man's strength proves unequal to the weight he has to carry, charity will step in, but only to give him time and opportunity to gain more strength. The end which true charity always aims at is to make those whom it succours independent of its help as quickly as possible. "We have helped you now," said Ambrosius, the bishop of Milan, to the poor whom he had assisted from the church funds—"we have helped you now, hoping that you will never come to us again for help, but that others will go to you."

One of Mr. Hicks's circulars bears the heading: "Help the poor to help themselves." There are poor people who would rather help themselves than be helped, but who from some reason or other find themselves at the foot of a steep hill which they cannot get over without a lift from a friendly hand. Such a hill is sickness. It not only deprives the poor man at once of his bread, but also of the power to earn it for many days. The hospital provides him with everything he wants, as long as he is within its walls. Sad cares for his wife and family, whom he left without support, disturb his mind and retard his recovery. Still, the thought comforts him that he himself at least is no burden to them, and he hopes that, what with being helped by friends and relatives, and what with doing some work herself, his good wife will manage to get through during his absence. But that consolation is taken from him when, by-and-by, the physician declares him to be cured, and he leaves the house. Here begins the most trying period in the poor man's life. It is true he is cured, but he is not restored. He is still as weak as a child. Glad as he is at being spared to return to his wife and children, yet he walks, or rather staggers home with a depressed spirit. Instead of being a support to his good wife, he will for some time to come be a burden to her, for he cannot with his weak body begin to work again. What he wants now is good substantial food, which, under God's blessing, would bring him round again soon. But where to obtain it? At home he expects to find a family as much in need of a good dinner as himself, and alas! as little able to get it. No wonder that these reflections sadly mar his happy feeling at his recovery, for he sees himself now on the edge of that inclined plane which hurries the honest poor down to the abyss of pauperism.

The painful position in which such convalescent working people find themselves, attracted the attention and sympathy of a benevolent Christian lady as early as the year 1859. She particularly desires her name to be unknown, but it ought at least to be known, that "The Poor Invalids' Dinner-Table" which she established in November, 1859, and which is now located at 66, Earl Street, Lisson Grove, N.W., was the first charity of that kind founded in London. It provided about 5000 substantial hot meals in two years. It not only excited the admiration, but also the imitation of other benevolent persons, and a second "dinner-table" was spread to the poor invalids in 1861, at 65, Upper Ebury Street, Pimlico; which was soon followed by a third one at 5, Poplar Place, Moscow Road, Bayswater. That at Pimlico provided not less than 5798 dinners in the first year of its existence.

Mr. Hicks was the fourth whose sympathy with the poor led him to address himself to a work of this kind. Tavistock Square, the place of his residence, and the neighbouring squares, do not seem places in whose vicinity much poverty could be found. Still, you have only to walk a few steps across Euston Road, and you will find yourself in a labyrinth of back streets, lanes, closes, passages, and courts, crowded with working and non-working people from the basements up to the fourth and fifth stories. Half a mile south of Tavistock Square are the dens of St. Giles, and a little towards the south-east are the shambles and rag stores of Clare Market, and between these again is Drury Lane, with its horrible-looking closes branching off right and left. If a dinner-table were to be spread for all the poor invalids of these neighbourhoods, I believe that many of the squares between Oxford Street and Euston Road would be filled.

It was not an easy matter to find a suitable place in this district large enough to admit a good number of guests at a time, and so respectably located that it could be visited by gentlewomen with propriety. At length, about the close of 1861, Mr. Hicks was so fortunate as to find a room on the ground floor of a house in Woburn Buildings, together with the basement, which served for a kitchen. It was hired for 10*s.* a week. A respectable woman was found, who, as matron, would superintend the preparing of the food, and the attendance of the guests. Furniture was bought both for the room and the kitchen. And thus Mr. Hicks and his kind-hearted partner in life, who is not second to him in zeal for this good cause, were able to commence a work of charity by which as many as 13,300 poor invalids, and 2700 poor sick children, have already enjoyed the blessings of a nutritious well-prepared dinner, or of various other comforts as prescribed by their doctors.

Woburn Buildings is a quiet, respectable-looking little thoroughfare, the entrance to which is from Euston Square. Walking a few yards up the street, you notice on your right hand a broad window, on which are the words, "The Invalids' Dinner-Table." You open the glass door, and you find yourself at once in the dining-room. It is an oblong place, measuring about 30 feet by 14. There is plenty of light, for there is a broad window in the back as well as in the front of the room. But you wonder how there can be sufficient room here for from 30 to 40 guests, and for the ladies who come to distribute the food and speak a kind word to the poor sufferers. Nor would it have been possible to find sufficient space for all this, had not a mechanical contrivance helped them out. This was the first dining-room I ever saw, in which there was no dinner-table. Not that the guests hold their plates on their knees. They place them on a broad board before them, which being covered with a white table-cloth, looks like a table, but is in reality the back of the form upon which they are sitting, which is by means of two iron bars connected with the form in such a manner, that if turned one way it lies horizontally before the faces of the people, and if turned the other, stands perpendicularly behind their backs. Thus this wonderful board may be looked upon as symbolic of the double object of the place, now offering food to the hungry, and again offering support to the infirm. The room is brightened up here and there by pictures hanging on the walls. The benevolent visitor who enters the place, is reminded by an inscription opposite the door that "Blessed is he that considereth the poor and the needy;" and the guests are told by another inscription on the wall that they are cordially "welcome" to their repast. Next to the door is a large glass case, containing a miniature representation of a fish-pond, surrounded by rocky scenery, and throwing up little jets of water from its centre. While these pleasing objects gratify the sight, the ear is regaled by melodious tunes which from time to time sound forth from a musical box.

Thus Christian love proves ingenious in contriving what may promote both the health of the sufferer and the comfort of the poor. Nor is the opportunity neglected of reminding them of the one thing needful. At the close of the dinner, a portion of Scripture is read, and as the place is open to the poor of all denominations, it is left optional to every one either to stay or to withdraw.

The "Dinner-table" is intended for invalids, but the term is broadly interpreted, and includes aged infirm people, and indeed all who are past work. To prevent as much as possible the intrusion of such as do not deserve support, no guest is admitted without a ticket. These tickets are sold at forty for one guinea to parties known to Mr. Hicks and his friends. Many tickets, however, are presented to district visitors, Bible women, and charitable societies. The invalid who is favoured with such a ticket, has to bring it to the matron at nine o'clock the next morning; and she, according to the number of tickets thus received, prepares the dinners, which are to be ready at half-past twelve. The tickets which those persons hand in are white. Each of them entitles the bearer to a plentiful meal, consisting of bread, meat and vegetables, and a mug of porter; or, if the latter should not be taken, to a double allowance of bread. And provision is also made for such invalids as are too ill to attend. They send in a green ticket, and their dinner is sent to their homes. When I visited the place, at dinner time, I saw women, boys, and girls coming in with baskets to get them filled with the desired nourishment for their home-bound invalid relatives. Nay, whatever is required to restore the invalid to full health and vigour is supplied if ordered by the doctor. A red ticket provides the holder with medical comforts, such as sherry, port, brandy, beef-tea, arrowroot, &c., the value of which, however, must not exceed sixpence.

Now it must be observed that if you take forty tickets for a guinea, one shilling goes to the printing expenses of the tickets, &c., while the full amount of the remaining twenty shillings is given in food, without any deduction whatever for rent or management. That is to say, you may rest assured that the poor invalid to whom you give a sixpenny ticket really receives its full value in food. Nay, it appears from the balance-sheets that each ticket costs Mr. Hicks a halfpenny more, viz.:—

The Wine-merchant's account	. .	$\frac{3}{4}d.$
,, Baker's	,, . .	$\frac{1}{2}$
,, Brewer's	,, . .	$\frac{1}{2}$
,, Butcher's	,, . .	$3\frac{1}{2}$
,, Greengrocer's	,, . .	$\frac{1}{2}$
,, Oilman's	,, . .	$\frac{1}{2}$
,, Coal-merchant's	,, . .	$\frac{1}{4}$
		$6\frac{1}{2}d.$

Mr. Hicks's system requires, however, that his poor guest pay something. He must add twopence out of his own pocket to every ticket which he hands to the matron. From these twopences the rent of the house, the salaries of the officials, &c., are paid. Of course, if you find that the poor invalid whom you desire to benefit with a ticket is not able to pay even so much as twopence, you may supply him from your own pocket; but this should be done as seldom as possible, being against the principle of the system. Mr. Hicks has shown a correct insight into the nature of true charity, as well as a real knowledge of the character of the poor, by requiring them to submit to a small sacrifice on their own behalf. Experience has shown that poor people, on the whole, never appreciate what costs them nothing. They think they may safely waste that which they have obtained so cheap and so easily. Support wholly gratuitous is apt to make them careless, inert, and ungrateful, inasmuch as it tacitly implies a declaration on your part that you consider themunable to do any thing whatever for themselves. If, on the contrary, you show that you expect them to do something, you raise their self-esteem and stir their energy. You say to them as it were: "I will provide you the food, but you must pay for the cooking of it. There is not an infinite distance between you and me, as if I were everything and you were nothing; but we join hands together as friends and fellow labourers for one and the same good object."

The excellent effect which this dinner-table produced upon the invalids who enjoyed it, was soon noticeable. It was found not only that many a convalescent workman was speedily enabled to resume his work, but that many an invalid was actually restored to health,—a good substantial meal having proved the best possible medicine that could be given to him. This good result led Mr. Hicks to turn his attention to the sick children of the poor. He resolved some eighteen months ago to add a dinner-table for these little folks to that of the adults. It was not a new idea, however, for several years previously the Hygienic Institution of France had recommended dinners for poor children, expecting the best results, even though they should be given only at intervals of many days. And the celebrated French poet, Victor Hugo, had carried the suggestion into practice in the Island of Guernsey. And following his example, a poor child's dinner-table was opened at Clare Market Colonnade, London. Then other little dinner-tables sprang up here and there, making Victor Hugo rejoice, and inducing him to write as follows :—"I am glad to see that my poor little mustard-seed germinates and springs up. My seed is a trifle, but your crops are excellent. I have sown it ; you cultivate it that it may bear fruit. I congratulate you, and I thank you for the poor. I have pledged myself before my own conscience to try the means which were indicated to me as conducive towards curing and preventing disease—I have succeeded. The health of my forty little ones progresses encouragingly," &c.

Mr. Hicks's plan met with the most cordial sympathy of his friends. The Rev. Canon Champneys, vicar of the parish, one of his staunchest allies in his work, wrote : "I know enough of the circumstances of the poor to be satisfied that an occasional good and substantial meal to their children would be a great boon and real good. I have made it my business to inquire into the causes why so many poor children are in bodily growth so far below their age, and in constitutional stamina often so weak that disease, when once it gets hold of them, so rapidly and fatally prostrates them. I am satisfied that among other causes deficient food, and especially the want of animal food, tends to create this state of body. I have no doubt whatever that a good meal of meat, if only once a week, would be a material help to them, and assist to form their constitutions, and to prepare them as they grow up for that work which must be their maintenance. I heartily wish success to this important addition to the Invalids' Dinner-Table. It is indeed a valuable leaf added to that already useful Table."

The children's dinners are twice a week—on Monday and Thursday, at five minutes before twelve. They end at half-past twelve, when the dinner for the adults begins. It is a pity that the children's dinners are a little in the way of those of the adults. Fewer of the latter come on those days, as they do not like to wait till the children are done. But this cannot be helped for the present, want of space making it impossible to appropriate a separate room for the children. It was an affecting and yet cheering sight to witness some thirty of those poor little creatures merrily waging war with knife and fork against everything eatable on their well-filled plates. In the back part of the room, Mrs. Hicks and a few other ladies were busily engaged distributing the meat which the servant brought up from the kitchen. The musical-box chimed in with its cheerful tunes. There was more perfect order than could have been expected in any school. What struck me particularly was the cleanness of the children's hands. "Do you get them to wash their hands before they come to the table ?" I asked Mrs. Hicks. "By no means," was the answer ; "but when a child comes with dirty hands, one of the ladies, in a gentle way, speaks to it, and we find that that is sufficient to make it come tidy afterwards." The appearance of the little guests was really that of poor and invalid children. The dress of many a one was very torn and ragged. Many a one, too, looked very pale and feeble. But the eager appetite with which they emptied their plates showed that here they were under the medical treatment they stood most in need of.

The children's tickets cost only fourpence, and they only pay one penny towards the working expenses. The balance-sheet, however, shows that here again each ticket costs Mr. Hicks more than fourpence. During the eighteen months of the existence of the institution, 2700 dinners have been given to poor sick children.

The sympathy which this little charity at Woburn Buildings meets with among the friends of the poor, may be seen from the numbers who have subscribed for tickets or favoured the institution with donations. Their number amounted to nearly one hundred in 1864. They purchased no less than 5075 tickets, of which 1788 were sent in by the clergy of the district, 472 by the hospital of the district, 131 by medical gentlemen, 522 by the Bible Mission of the district, and 679 by societies for relieving the poor.

"And is this the only place where you get a hot dinner, or do you also have one at home sometimes ?" I asked a poor man of about thirty, whose pale emaciated countenance showed that he had just recovered from a severe illness.

"I never have one at home, sir. My wife is dead, and I have four little children."

"Ay," said an old woman of seventy, "you will be glad if you have a piece of bread for 'em, I'm sure. There is no thinking of such a thing as having a dinner at home for people like us, sir."

"Then you haven't one either, I suppose ?"

"Not on weekdays, sir. I'm alone. I have no children. I go out every day for a job. I am a charwoman, but I am too old. People want young, strong persons, you see. But the servants sometimes allow me to do a little bit of work for them for a penny or two and a piece of bread. I always try to save enough to buy a few bones at the butcher's on Saturday evening, and have 'em cooked on Sunday. But it isn't much, sir."

An old woman was standing bashfully in the doorway. On noticing me she dropped a curtsey. Seeing that she had not the courage to come forward, I beckoned her to take her place at the table. There was plenty of room, for there were not many guests that day. She had come rather late, and waited patiently like a child till the good matron placed her dinner before her. She looked round, as if inquiring whether there was anybody to say grace ; but perceiving that she had come too late for that, she rose, and, lifting her folded hands upward, said with an audible voice : "We praise Thee, O God our Heavenly Father, for this blessing, and for all the other blessings which Thou givest us from time to time, through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen."

Was it for show she did this ? Was she an old hypocrite ? It seemed not so, for all was done with the greatest possible simplicity, and there was an expression of truth on her honest-looking face which greatly pleased me. I thought I would put a few questions to her about her prayer—but no, I changed my mind. I just looked round the room as if I had taken no notice of the prayer at all. Then, after a few minutes, I resumed my conversation with the other woman who told me that she was seventy-one.

"And what is your age?" I asked of the woman who had said grace.

"Sixty-nine, sir; if the Lord spares my life, I shall be seventy at Christmas."

"Have you a hot dinner at home sometimes?" I asked.

"Oh no, sir, never," she answered with a smile, evidently amused by the contrast between the reality and my supposition.

"Have you any children?"

"I have, but they are married and poor like myself, and live a far distance away. I have been a widow for these last fifteen years. I have earned my bread by selling toys at the houses. And I am trying to do so still. You see my basket over there under the bench. But I am getting too old now. I cannot walk now as far as Camberwell, and Kingsland, and Stoke Newington. There is many a day I do not earn more than a penny or twopence. Then I buy a ha'p-orth of coffee and a ha'p-orth of bread. That's a penny, sir. And that's sometimes all I get a-day."

"That's not too much, certainly," I said. "I wonder you look so well then."

"The Lord sustains me, sir. I always find, when I am hungry, that prayer has a wonderful effect. It takes away my hunger. I say to the Lord; 'Now Thou knowest what I am. Thou hast made me. Thou canst give me bread or make me that I don't want it.' And then, sir, I always feel fresh strength to go on."

These words of the good woman, uttered in all the simplicity of a child-like faith, struck me. I never witnessed such an illustration of the text: "Man shall not live by bread alone, but by every word of God."

"Do you know that there is a glorious supper for you in prospect?" I asked.

She understood directly what I was alluding to. It was not a strange subject to her mind.

"Yes, I know," she answered, with a beam of joy on her face. "It won't be long before I see it, sir. I am nearly seventy now. The Lord will not leave me long here. What a blessing it is, sir, to know that there is a rest for the people of God!"

Other guests came in. I inquired of the matron about this woman.

"I believe she is a very good woman," she said; "but exceedingly destitute. I often saw her in winter standing, basket on arm, in the snow. To tell the truth, she has no right to be here, for she brought no ticket. But I made up a plate for her from the little bits which the children left yesterday. And she is as thankful for it as if it were the richest dinner in the world, poor thing."

I did not ask to what denomination the woman belonged: Mr. Hicks, though himself a "thorough Churchman," has made the basis of his work as wide as possible. "Charity," he said to me, "admits, in my view, of no distinction of creed, and I have done my utmost to enlist the sympathies of all classes in the common bond of helping others."

This is the true Gospel spirit. And if anyone wishes to see what a source of blessing and comfort a man influenced by that spirit may be to the poor and the sick, the languid child and the feeble grey-headed man, let him pay a visit to the Invalids' Dinner Table at Woburn Buildings, St. Pancras.

JOHN DE LIEFDE.

A FLY-LEAF.

MRS. BERTRAND was very much like almost all the other women in her village, her district, I might almost say her county—not to speak of the whole world—for, in point of fact, women do resemble each other much more closely than you might suppose at first sight; and, as for that, so do men. Outward differences of rank merely exercise an external influence,—at bottom the heart is the same in peasant and in prince.

Mrs. Bertrand, then, had lived the life of women of her class in general. As a child she had loved dolls, and played at dressing herself out; as a young girl she had gone to dance on the village green, to laugh with her friends, to listen to the neighbours' gossip, which was often of a very unedifying character; and as a married woman she had brought up four children, and expended during that process no small amount of scolding, slaps, and strong language. With her husband she had of course had sundry little squabbles, but nothing more. For the rest she had been a very industrious woman, putting by a few shillings every year in the bottom of an old stocking kept in a corner of an old cupboard, the key of which was carefully concealed.

She had never been in the habit of borrowing from her neighbours, having observed that two generally played at that game, and that, where one had things of one's own, it was much better to make them suffice than to run the risk of having them borrowed in their turn. In her household everything showed economy, except indeed a little personal finery. She had a tendency to boast of having so many gowns, so many sacks of corn—only the fund of shillings never got talked of, her husband knowing nothing of it. Hers was a vanity tempered by avarice. One little incident will help to the understanding of her character. She had had left to her certain silver forks and spoons. She never dreamed of using them: to use them, would be to wear them out. She would gladly have turned them into money; but then, besides the probability that the silversmith would cheat her, she had been warned that she would get nothing for them but the mere weight of the metal. Thus finding herself as it were forced to keep them, she determined at least to turn them to some purpose by displaying them, and so enhancing her own importance; and consequently they were arranged on the chimneypiece behind a grating, and she took great delight in showing them off. But then, again, came the fear of tempting burglars by such an open appearance of wealth, and this led her to repeat her own triumph by invariably saying to admiring gazers: "Aye, they're very fine are they not? but don't go and fancy that they are real silver."

As she grew old, Mrs. Bertrand determined to take care of her spiritual interests. She had long been in the habit of attending church and going through the forms of religion. But all this had cost her next to nothing, and she thought that the time was now come when she must really make a few more serious sacrifices to secure heaven.

One day a stranger turned in for some refreshment (the Bertrands kept a public-house) and fell a chatting with her husband. The good woman dosed asleep, and chanced to dream of that very paradise that she had been planning to make sure of. She dreamed that she was dead, but felt just as well as usual, and was on a journey from earth to heaven, during which she thought over all that she was likely to find in her new abode. Already her imagination pictured to her a great and magnificent palace, in which there was room for an immense crowd. A venerable form was seated on a throne of gold, in a vast hall containing long tables set out with a sumptuous repast. Everything was the very best! One could sit long at that festival, and one's appetite never failed; and meanwhile wondrous things took place, impossible to describe—suns, stars, passed, like a display of fireworks, before wondering eyes. After that the inhabitants tranquilly reposed on soft silken couches, gorgeously attired in jewels. In short, there was everything there that heart could wish—songs, music, plays, promenades, dances, feasts; everything, in short, that one had longed for while on earth, only all were far more beautiful now, and, besides, they were to last for ever! Such was the heaven that Mrs. Bertrand kept picturing to herself in her dream while journeying on towards heaven. At last she got there, and, oh! lamentable surprise! she found nothing, absolutely nothing, that she expected to find. She asked for something to eat. An angel replied, that in heaven "they hunger no more." She called her husband. A seraph informed her that in eternity there is neither marriage nor giving in marriage, but that all are as the angels. She heard singing, and felt inclined to join; but discovered that they were chanting the very hymns she had found so tedious on earth. She drew near to a group of the blessed, and they were praying. She showed herself, did all she could to attract attention: not a glance was turned towards her, all were absorbed in the praises of the Lord. She tried to speak of what she had left behind in the world—of her house, her wealth, her plate: no one listened to her. Although all the inhabitants of heaven seemed happy, not one had the least sympathy with her, and very soon she found out that she was quite out of place. Everyone there was occupied with something external to self: she cared for self only. Everyone was made happy by sacrifice and devotion: she had no taste for any but personal enjoyment. The glory of God absolutely effacing all other glory, even Mrs. Bertrand's, she was thoroughly bored, and her only anxiety was to get away. Her disappointment actually woke her, and she was no less surprised than relieved to find herself on earth, in her own house, with her silver plate shining safe opposite to her, and by the side of her husband, to whom the stranger before mentioned was talking on religious subjects.

"As I have before pointed out to you," said the latter to Mr. Bertrand, "even if God were willing to admit you into heaven, you, in your present state, would decline to enter. Do you suppose that people eat and drink in heaven? Not so: immortal bodies have no need for nourishment. Do you expect that your praises will be sung there, your wealth talked about? By no means. If you are praised in the world, it is by some one who does not know you well; if your riches excite attention, it is only because they are envied by others. But what would be the use of them in heaven, where the saints have need of nothing? No: to love our brethren, to adore our God, to contemplate his glory, obey his commands, and live holily in his sight—these are the joys of Paradise. Now you see plainly that these pleasures do not suit your taste, and, as I have before said, even were God willing to bestow them on you, you could not know what to make of them."

"But if so," chimed in Mrs. Bertrand, thoroughly awake, "what is the use of making so many sacrifices on earth in order to gain heaven?"

"Of no use; for those sacrifices are with you mere matter of calculation: you want to purchase heaven in exchange for a few trumpery shillings! This is a mockery, an insult. God is not a broker, as you make Him out to be. What need has He of your silver and gold? That which He demands is your heart, and your heart is just what you cannot give Him."

"Why not?"

"Because you have already given it to Satan."

"How so?"

"By your avarice, your vanity, your love of self-indulgence, which is sin."

"Why, by your account, I am one of the reprobate."

"No doubt of it, if you continue as you are now."

"What must I do, then?"

"First of all, you must confess that you are absolutely worthless, and that to the present day all your works have been prompted solely by selfishness or fear."

"How—my charities even?"

"Yes, your charities; you have only bestowed them through dread of perdition."

"Then, according to you, I have done nothing good?"

"Nothing!"

"What must I do, then?"

"You must repent, pray, cry for mercy, till God takes compassion upon you. When you have sincerely confessed your sins, when you have wept over them, when you believe yourself lost, then it is that Jesus will come and save you, for He himself has said that He is come to seek and to save the lost. Now, do you believe yourself lost?"

"Not exactly."

"Very well, then, you are not one of those that Jesus came to seek."

"But for all that——"

"No: since you are not lost, there is no need that you should be saved."

"Still——"

"No: for Jesus himself has declared, 'I came not to call the righteous but sinners to repentance.'"

"But yet——"

"No, no: since you are so good, a Saviour cannot be necessary for you."

"But I must own to you that I begin to think all this is well worth thinking about."

"No doubt it is, and, above all, well worth praying about. Whosoever seeketh findeth, not fortune indeed, but salvation; and to him that knocketh there is opened, not a palace, but heaven; for salvation and heaven are not of men, but of God."

THE GRACE OF HOPE.

Sister to Faith and Love! sweet grace,
I woo thee to my breast;
O come, and, with thy lovely face,
Smile all my fears to rest.
For, sooth to tell, thine influence well
Can cheer the mind oppress'd;
And I, indeed, that influence need,
For I am much distress'd.

Yes, thou art fair, and much I love
To dwell in peace with thee;
Then come, and never hence remove Till I shall cease to be.
When I depart, this beating heart
No more will need thine aid,
But will, I trust, join yonder host
Of just men, perfect made.

In vain my feeble heart would strive
To sing the joys of heaven;
Eyes cannot see, nor hearts conceive,
The pleasures God hath given.
But this we know, God will bestow
A store immensely great,
In realms of bliss, where Jesus is,
And endless, glorious state.

O grant to me, my gracious Lord,
This grace, this hope divine;
And let me feel my heart assured
That I indeed am thine.
Most cheerfully my days will fly,
When Hope the hours shall gild;
My parting breath, in pangs of death,
Shall bless Thy mercy mild. S.

THE STORY OF NAIN.

(From a newly-discovered Manuscript of Edward Irving's.)

Our Lord having fulfilled his commission to the town and neighbourhood of Capernaum, where He had done many mighty works, and held many doctrinal and instructive discourses, both in the synagogue and in the open plain, passed on to another corner of the great harvest-field, which is the world, there also to scatter the seed of life eternal. And most like to a traveller bound on a celestial message to the souls of men, He hastened to another town, where He might have numerous audiences of the people, and large scope for his ministry of health to the bodies and his ministry of salvation to the souls of men. In this, as in everything else, He should be the example of his ministering servant, to whom the scenes of silent nature, with all their picturesque beauty and sublime grandeur, should be as nothing, and all the sentimental musings which are sung and said over them should be as the voice of the idle wind which sighs among their solitudes, while he hastens on to the dwellings of immortal souls, to populous villages and the sickly alleys of crowded cities, to impart to the famished and perishing people the word of life with which he is commissioned from the Prince of Life. A man, the countenance of a man, though it be fierce and savage as the rough wilderness and hard as the flinty rock—the countenance of an immortal man is the true scene to awaken the lively emotion of a minister of Christ. Thereto let him address his weightiest discourse; over that image of God in ruins let his melancholy musings wander; to repair that wreck, let him bring his heavenly means; and to quicken it with divine life, let him prophesy from morn to eve.

In one day our Lord journeyed on foot from Capernaum to Nain—a distance, I should judge, from the best information I can obtain, of not less than twenty or thirty miles, attended by many of his disciples and much people. For we know, that as He went along his custom was to drop into the ears of the people words of wisdom, and parables containing the deep mysteries of his kingdom, so that the multitude followed Him to hear and learn more of his doctrine and to witness larger demonstrations of his power. He had not yet ventured to expound unto these Galileans the mystery of eating his flesh and drinking his blood which scattered them abroad; the first feeling of curiosity still lay fresh upon their minds; their hope that He would fulfil their idea of Messiah still lingered in their hearts; He had not discovered the unworldliness of his kingdom, and the spirituality of his discipline, and they pressed on his heels in multitudes and hung upon his lips with earnestness.

And never until Christ come again shall men have such evidence of the divinity of their Teacher, as was prepared for this company which attended his journey from Capernaum to Nain. For the Father, in consideration of the weakness of their faith, had prepared a scene whereby to glorify his Son in their sight, and in the sight of the people of the plain to which He came; and, that He might be received with due honour into the town, it was done without the gate, in the presence of a great concourse of the townsmen.

Amongst the Jews in those times, as in Eastern countries still, the cemeteries of the dead were generally without the walls of the town, because from the great respect which they paid to the bodies of the dead, and from certain superstitious notions concerning the resurrection, they were careful not to molest for a long time the graves of the departed; so that their burying-grounds were of much larger extent than ours, and not included within the walls of fenced towns. Another custom also is necessary to be known, concerning the habit in which they bore the body to its long home. The bier was borne upon the shoulders of men, and upon it lay the corpse of the deceased, attired in its grave-clothes, with the face exposed to view until it came to the place of burial, which by the Jews was called the house of the living. Then the lid of the coffin was nailed down, and the body consigned to the earth, with many words and acts significant of the resurrection, concerning which it is not needful to speak particularly.

As the Lord approached the gate of the city with the multitude of disciples and followers who had borne Him company from Capernaum or joined Him by the way, they were carrying forth to the common burying-ground the body of a young man, the only son of his mother, who was a widow, and much people of the city was with her. It is the severest trial which death can inflict, the death of an only son. To a widowed mother it is doubly severe, and to a mother in Israel the shock was embittered manifold. For in Israel, to have a son was to have a personal interest in the Promised Seed; and to be without a son was to be cut off from that sweetest, noblest expectation. Upon the deceased youth all the affections of a mother's heart had centered, and in him all the widowed affections of a wife had taken refuge, with which the religious feelings of maternal dignity had entwined themselves; and he had grown up to manhood under her anxious, careful eye. From their attendance, we may judge he was highly honoured and beloved of his townsmen; and haply the mother was entering into the honours and occupations of her son, forecasting many a scheme of maternal fondness, living in him and living for him, and in him renewing the hopes of her youth,—when at once the staff of her age is taken away, and the consolation of her widowhood is cut off, and her memorial is perished from the earth, and the glorious hope of a mother in Israel is gone from her for ever, and she is left forsaken and forlorn. The Lord saw her as she went weeping by the bier of the deceased; He needed no interpreter of her sad calamity, and her sad calamity needed no advocate in his breast. "When He saw her, He had compassion on her, and said unto her, Weep not. And He came and touched the bier: and they that bare it stood still." A moment of great wonder and awful surprise to the mother, the mourners, and the multitude. They are stopped in their short and solemn journey by a stranger, who forbids the bereaved mother to weep, and lays his hand upon the bed whereon the body of the deceased reposed. Fit prelude of tenderness and dignity to the mighty act which follows, and ready summons to the attention of the multitude; which being held in mute amazement and swelled in deep expectation of what was to follow, the Creator and Lord of life, and the Redeemer from death, then gave forth his solemn word into the ear which had been for days sealed by death: "Young man, I say unto thee, Arise!" The lifeless clay heard the voice of the Word of God, and arose. That which was numbered with the clods of the valley was again numbered with the sons of living men. The ear stopped by death awoke to the voice of man, and the eye sealed by death opened to the light of heaven, and the stiffened joints resumed their living power, and the bloom of health reanimated the pale clay, and the soul from its unknown sojourn came back to its desert habitation, to possess it once more with quickening life,—all at the bidding of a man, of one of the sons of men. But he cannot be of the sons of men whose voice could speak to things that are not, as though they were. That was not the voice of man which the disinherited clay and the disembodied soul at once obeyed. It was the same Voice which said, "Let there be light, and there was light"—the Power by which all things were created out of nothing, in whom is life, and who came to destroy death and him that had the power of death, and who said concerning Himself, "The hour is coming, and now is, when the dead shall hear the voice of the Son of man; and they that hear shall live;" "For as the Father hath life Himself, so shall He give the Son to have life in Himself."

There are two such mighty acts recorded in the Old Testament: one done by the hand of Elijah upon the widow of Zarephath's only son, who gave him harbour when Israel afforded him none; the other done by the hands of Elisha upon the only son of the Shunamite woman, who made for the Prophet a chamber in the wall, and entertained him with bread so oft as he passed on his way. These two acts of raising the dead were done by prayer unto God, and in dependence upon his divine power, and are to be regarded as singular dispensations of his grace, whereby He rewarded the singular kindness of those two women unto his servants, and magnified the Prophets in their sight and in the sight of all the people. There is another instance mentioned in the book of Acts, wherein Peter, after kneeling down and praying, raised Tabitha from the dead.

In all these cases the servants of God sought and found help of Him, taking no strength or glory unto themselves. But in this case of the widow's son of Nain, and in that of the daughter of Jairus, our Lord proceeded, without any confession of inability or request for help, to do that which belonged to Him, and was proper to Him in his own right, and was always present to Him. In his own name and in his own power, He said to them both, "I say unto thee, Arise;" but his Apostles said, "In the name of Jesus of Nazareth, I say unto thee, Arise." And when the people wondered at their power, they said, "Ye men of Israel, why marvel ye at this? or why look you so earnestly on us, as though by our own power or holiness we had made this man to walk?" Not only did Christ in his own name work the works which He wrought, but the Apostles wrought them in his name also. By which we are to understand that He is the resurrection and the life, as He declared to the sisters of Lazarus before raising him from the dead. On which occasion it is to be remarked that He addressed these words to the Father, "Father, I thank thee that thou hast heard me;" but immediately added, "And I knew that thou hearest me always: but because of the people which stand by I said it, that they may believe that thou hast sent me." That is, He referred these, as He did his other acts, to the Father, that the people might believe that He had come from the Father, but in doing so declared his continual and immutable union with the Father. "I am in the Father, and the Father in me." "The words which I speak, I speak not of myself; and the Father which dwelleth in me He doeth the works." The Apostles suspended their power from Christ; Christ identified his with the Father, did the works in his own name, and desired the people to regard them as demonstrations that the fulness of the Godhead dwelt in Him bodily. In the same manner He says, "I have power to lay down my life, and power to take it up again;" while the Apostles refer his resurrection to the mighty working of the Spirit. For in truth there was in Christ a manifestation of the Godhead. He was the Word; and besides being the Word, he manifested the Father and the Spirit. So that the Father declared Himself by Him, and the Spirit showed Himself in Him. And while He asserted his own divinity, He taught and manifested the divinity of the Father and the divinity of the Spirit, and is our way unto them and their way unto us—in all respects the mediator between us and God. The burden of revelation lay upon his shoulders; the clouds and darkness which covered the throne of the Father, and hid it from the eyes of mortals, waited till He should dispel them; the Spirit also could not come until He should have opened the way through death, and ascended unto the right hand of God. So that he is well called by the Apostle "the author and finisher of our faith," and well entitled Himself "the Alpha and the Omega, the beginning and the ending, which is, and which was, and which is to come, the Almighty." Such is the doctrine which groweth out of this speech unto the dead and inanimate clay, "Young man, I say unto thee, Arise."

"And he that was dead sat up, and began to speak." He raised himself on the couch on which he was stretched, and began to speak, thereby giving immediate testimony unto both the eyes and ears of all the people that he was as truly living and in the possession of all his faculties, as the foregoing instant they had known him to be dead, and were proceeding with him to the silent chambers of the dead. "And he delivered him to his mother." This sense of power and tenderness is very sweet in all the actions of our blessed Lord, and is another testimony to the divinity of his being; so that I know not of the three which to admire the most, the almighty power, the sublime majesty, or the tender feeling of the act. He laid his hand on the bier and said, Young man, Arise. And he that was dead sat up and spake. There is the almighty power and sublime majesty of the act, but that almighty power and sublime majesty were only, as it were, the means by which the divine compassion testified itself. He had compassion upon the mother, and said unto her, "Weep not;" then touching the bier he awoke her son from the sleep of death, and delivered him unto his mother. The impulse, the movement which called forth the divine action in the bosom of the Son of Man, was compassion to a sorrowful woman of whom He knew nothing but her sorrow; and the divine action accomplished not its end until the tears of the mother were dried up and her lost son restored to her arms. Therefore, the thing to be admired is the end for which the deed was done, the tender and compassionate feeling of the Lord for one of the sorrowful daughters of Adam, undistinguished by anything, as hath been said, but the greatness of her sorrow.

What was there in that woman that is not in any of the daughters of the people of this land? or what was there in her sorrow that is not in the sorrow of every afflicted mother? And what was there in the sorrow of Jairus for his daughter, that is not in the sorrow of any of the fathers of the people of this land? Let every afflicted father and every afflicted mother, with all the sons and daughters of affliction, know of a surety that the same Saviour who had pity upon this desolate widow, will have pity upon them, to bind up their broken hearts and comfort their mourning. And in the day of our troubles let us make known our sorrows unto Him who can be touched with the feeling of our infirmities, and was in all points tempted like as we are. He who, unsought, had compassion upon the widow, had already compassion upon us, and He who wept over the tomb of Lazarus his friend, weepeth with all his friends in their distress, and will bring them consolation. Nay, and He who wept over the stony-hearted and bloody-handed Jerusalem, weepeth also over his enemies and his persecutors, praying his Father to forgive them, for they know not what they do. What less can we say, therefore, than this: that He who raised the son of the strange woman, and stopped the fountain of her troubles by his almighty power, hath for us all—yea, for the most prodigal and the most wicked hath He a most tender compassion, which moved him to empty Himself of glory and of power, yea, and of life itself, and to humble Himself to the dust of death? That death was to do for as many as believe that which this act of power and mercy did for the widow of Nain: to restore to them, not a son that had been lost, but to restore to themselves their own glory that had been lost; and to quench, not one fountain of sorrow in their hearts, but every fountain of sorrow, and to bring in an everlasting peace, giving what the world cannot give, nor the prince of the world take away. These acts of mercy and grace were but as the slow and infrequent drops before the plentiful summer shower for which the thirsty earth was longing, or the few ripe ears of corn before the harvest, or the early clusters of ripe grapes before the vintage. The harvest which is to feed the world's famished soul with fatness, the vintage which is to replenish it with fulness of joy, was accomplished in the death of Christ, wherein the Prince of Life emptied himself and exhausted his power in the sight of the world, that the world might be filled with life. And having passed into the realm of death, where sin and Satan are absolute, He stripped them there in their citadel of strength, and put them to shame, spoiling the spoiler, and leading captivity captive, so that the heavenly host which sung the overture of our redemption at his birth, with the words, "Glory to God in the highest; peace on earth, good will to the children of men," might have sung its finish in the words "O death, where is thy sting? O grave, where is thy victory?" Therefore, all who believe in his name have a constant fountain opened of consolation, to which in all their distresses they have a free access, and to which let their souls hasten that they may be filled with joy and gladness. And specially in trials and afflictions may they be assured of the compassion of their Lord. For He is then very near unto them, and desireth that they should take everlasting consolation to themselves. If to this woman, whom there is no reason to believe that He had ever seen, or known anything of her works, He should have, out of mere feeling for her loss and pity of her lamentation, extended this grace, then why should any one doubt or hesitate to entreat Him with the voice of their weepings and the aspect of their calamities, that He may dispense unto them the consolation whereof they stand in need? But how much more his people, who have entered into covenant with Him, whom He hath justified while yet they were enemies, to whom all trials are sent for the very end that they may profit by them, all afflictions that they may be chastised out of sin and promoted to greater holiness! May the Lord bless this instance of his tenderness, that it may prove life for the dead to as many as are still numbered with the dead—dead in trespasses and sins. And as the uncalled and unsanctified are aptly represented by the young man who lay stretched upon the bier; so the living and sorrowful mother may be represented by those whom God hath quickened with the principle of everlasting life; for it is not less fitting that we should cry with heavy lamentation over our lifeless brother, or sister, or parent, or friend, than she did over her lifeless son. And surely the Lord will more tenderly regard the spiritual weepings and lamentations of his spiritual people, than the natural weepings and lamentations of those who are not his people. Therefore, as many as the Lord our God hath called, we would entreat, by the love which Christ bore to the ungodly for whom He died, that they would bear a love to their unquickened brethren, and entreat the Lord for their sakes, that the Lord may say unto them, "Awake, thou that sleepest; arise from the dead." And they shall arise and speak the discourse of living men, to the salvation of their own souls, the edification of our faith, and the glory of God.

THE MOTHER OF THE WESLEYS.

In St. Mary's Church at Haseley, a small Warwickshire village, "Samuel, sonne of John Anslye and Judith his wife," was baptised on the 27th of March, 1620. Left early to the sole care of his mother, young Annesley grew up with grave and reverent habits, reading twenty chapters of the Bible daily, dreaming of martyrdom, and letting the conviction of his call to the Church shape itself so persistently in his mind that, in 1644, he was ordained, "probably according to the Presbyterian form." His first parish received him with spits, forks, and stones, and even threats of murder, moved apparently by pathetic remembrance of his predecessor, who danced, drank, and made merry with them week-day and Sunday. The young rector was not to be dealt with in this fashion. "I am resolved," he said, "to continue with you, until God has fitted you to entertain a better." A few years taught them to value his ministry quite as much as his sincerity, and enabled him when he resigned his cure to keep his vow. Then he moved to a small London parish, held the Evening Lectureship at St. Paul's, and, in 1658, was presented by Richard Cromwell to Cripplegate. The Act of Uniformity drove him from the Church; but, upon the Declaration of Indulgence, he licensed a meeting-house in Little St. Helen's, Bishopsgate Street, and assembled a large congregation, to which he ministered till his death. He was a man of fine presence, and gracious and winning manner; a most zealous preacher, preaching two or three times every day without fatigue; temperate in his habits, and temperate in his opinions. He could not identify himself with any of the parties of his time; and was as hearty in calling Cromwell "the arrantest hypocrite that ever the Church of Christ was pestered with," as in denouncing the King, when preaching to the Commons. He wrote no controversy, but "charmed with his godliness." Besides the tenth that he devoted to God, his purse was always open for widows, and sick and starving ministers. In his family he was strict, earnest, and a man of remarkable fervency and faith in prayer. And his family was almost a congregation. When Manton had baptised one of the children, he mentioned to a friend that Annesley had "two dozen, or a quarter of a hundred." The beauty and accomplishments of the daughters and the repute of their father made the minister's house in now decaying Spital Yard, a place of note and pleasant resort. Nonconformist pastors and raw young students, city men and "wealthy lovers," were to be met with there, with Defoe, and Dunton the bookseller, who were both members of the congregation. And among other guests of the time was a young student at Mr. Veal's, in Stepney, by name Samuel Wesley.

Wesley was the son of an ejected vicar, whose life was worn rapidly to the grave by persecution. He was thrown from early life into close association with the Nonconformist party, used to write out Charnock's sermons, and listened to Bunyan. Clever, and with a gift of rhyme, he was encouraged to write lampoons on Church and State, and was pitched upon to answer some invectives published against the Dissenters. It was during the preparation for this latter task that he saw reasons to change his own opinions, and, commencing by abjuring the politics of his party, he ended by abjuring the party itself. With forty-five shillings in his pocket he walked to Oxford, entered himself at Exeter College, and left it an extreme partisan of the Church and State he had lampooned.

Dunton is bold to say that one of Annesley's daughters attracted him to St. Helen's even more than her father's preaching; and another daughter seems to have had as much share in attracting Wesley to Spital Yard. Susanna Annesley may have had a fair share of the family beauty, but her kindred have only noticed the worth and beauty of her character. She had an intellect above the average, a strong decisive mind, and a spirit of investigation. She formed her own opinions and scrupled at no trouble in discovering the truth. Her reading was grave and solid, as might be expected in so grave a household, and questions of theology had more interest for her than the creations of fiction. She lived in a time of keen controversy and championship. Disputes on the doctrine and order of the Church absorbed men's minds. The conversation among her father's guests was always drifting in that direction, and she soon found herself drawn into the current. The Socinian controversy first drew her attention, with the untoward result of unsettling her faith in the doctrines of the Gospel; and before she recovered from this she examined the claim of Church governments. Wesley's influence may be traceable in the conclusions she reached on both subjects. He was familiar with the theological investigation she had unwarily begun; and she blessed God that "by him she was first drawn off from the Socinian heresy." He was in the heat of his own dissatisfaction with Nonconformity, and before she was thirteen she firmly embraced the Church of England. She was ruled in this as in all else by the highest sense of duty, and her religious life was one of principle and not emotion. "When I was young," she says, "and too much addicted to childish diversions, I used never to spend more time in any matter of mere recreation in one day than I spent in private religious duties." It is a characteristic feature, consistent with the gravity of her character, and with all that is known of her in after-life.

Wesley had held a London curacy for a year, a chaplaincy on board a man-of-war for as long; and on returning to London, in 1689, seems to have been married to Susanna Annesley. He was a curate on thirty pounds a-year, and though in a twelvemonth he received the living of South Ormsby, in Lincolnshire, it was but twenty pounds better. The rectory was "a mean cot, composed of reeds and clay;" and there came "one child additional per annum." The rector rose betimes in the morning and wrote his metrical "Life of Christ;" wrote also a treatise on the Hebrew points; and did such work as offered for his brother-in-law, Dunton the bookseller. With much writing and thrifty management, seven years passed fairly over. The Marquis of Normanby, his patron, had asked for him an Irish bishopric, but Queen Mary contented herself with accepting the dedication of the "Life of Christ," now completed in nigh eleven thousand lines, and published with sixty copperplates. Then a more substantial benefit came, though not from royal favour, and the living of Ormsby was exchanged for that of Epworth, in the same county. Epworth, or the Hill Farm, is a small market-town in the centre of the so-called Isle of Axholme. The parishioners were mostly yeomen and small farmers, primitive if not barbarous in their ways. There was no extravagant living: the women wore their mothers' gowns, and the men never appeared in an entirely new suit of clothes. The maid dressed in linsey-woolsey, rose up to her spinning in the morning at three, and had forty shillings a-year. The parish was worth four times the last, and much household economy was possible. But there were heavy drawbacks. The men of the Isle were lawless. They vented their displeasure in a rough savage way: they burned crops, stabbed cows, maimed watch-dogs, and put coals in the thatch. Wesley provoked their enmity in election times, and was called, on the steps of his own church, rascal and scoundrel; was forewarned of a design to murder him; and when Mrs. Wesley lay exhausted after her confinement, they "kept drumming, shouting, and firing," until at last the baby was killed in the nurse's fright. There was but one Presbyterian and one Roman Catholic in the parish, yet the congregation was of the thinnest, and the communicants seldom above twenty. "Monsters of men-children were brought to baptism, whose manful voices disturbed and alarmed the whole congregation." The tithe corn was stolen in open day: and gross immoralities were the habits of the place. Then there were accidents. The barn fell down: a third of the parsonage was burnt: his "entire growth of flax" shared the same fate; and in 1709 the house was utterly destroyed by fire. "I was not in a condition," Mrs. Wesley writes, "to climb up to the windows, neither could I get to the garden door. I endeavoured three times to force my passage through the street door, but was as often driven back by the fury of the flames. In this distress I besought our blessed Saviour for help, and then waded through the fire, naked as I was, which did me no farther harm than a little scorching my hands and my face." One child, "a lovely boy, six years old," lay asleep. No help could be rendered; and when he was missed his father could but kneel in the hall "in an agony of prayer." The child woke and ran to the window. No time was to be lost. "I will fix myself against the wall," some one cried; "lift a light man and set him on my shoulders." As the roof fell in, John Wesley was caught in friendly arms, and Methodism gained its founder as a brand from the burning. The next day among the ruins the rector picked up a solitary scorched leaf of his Polyglot, on which there was nothing legible but Vade; vende omnia quæ habes, et attolle crucem, et sequere Me—"Go; sell all that thou hast; and take up thy cross: and follow Me." With these disastrous losses, with his mother dependent on him, and apparently with the steady addition of a child per annum, it is little wonder he was poor. In the spring of 1701 they could only reckon up six shillings; in 1726 they had but five pounds to last them from May-day till harvest. The children were only half-clothed, the rooms half-furnished. "Tell me, Mrs. Wesley," said Archbishop Sharp, "whether you ever really wanted bread?" "My lord, I will freely own that I never did want bread. But then I had so much care to get it before it was eat, and to pay for it after, as has often made it very unpleasant to me. And I think to have bread on such terms is the next degree of wretchedness to having none at all." Yet, even to sustain such wretchedness money had to be borrowed, and not always from easy creditors. A vindictive man of the Isle had Mr. Wesley arrested for a paltry debt that a few hours' delay would have cleared, and the rector found himself in a debtors' cell in Lincoln Castle. It is true he but changed his parish. "I have leave to read prayers every morning and afternoon here in the prison; and to preach once on Sunday. I am getting acquainted with my brother jail-birds as fast as I can." Yet the poverty remained. "Thank God," he says, when he was nearing seventy, "I creep up-hill more than I did formerly;" and he can say no more. His largest debts were paid, but when he died his chattels had to be set off against the remainder. The shadows of such a life are deep, and the picture of such life-long embarrassment, and of a cheerful, helpful, and most Christian man, carrying such weary burden with him away into dim old age, is harsh and melancholy. But there were gleams of light across it, pleasant bits of sunshine that relieved the gloom.

His study was his castle and the debtors' cell could not cut him off from the memories of books. Collating the Pentateuch, or writing vigorous Latin dissertations on the Book of Job, or penning epitaphs and epithalamiums, his heart was kept light and his mind had rest from care. "A learned man," Pope calls him, writing to Swift; Lord Oxford bears him the same testimony; and his wife, with a judgment that even affection did not make partial, laments that "a man of his brightness and rare endowments of learning, and useful knowledge in the Church of God, should be confined to an obscure corner of the country." His diligence and faithfulness as a pastor softened the hostility of his parishioners, and many of them died happy before him. He was three times elected a member of Convocation, and the months he spent in London at those "Convocations of blessed, blessed memory," were a bright change from the monotony and unkindness of Epworth. As his children grew up, and the boys went to college, he maintained a constant correspondence; in Latin occasionally, if there was anything they wished to confide to him without troubling their mother; and these Westminster boys turned out excellent scholars. But his great blessing was his wife. She is as beautiful a type as we have of a godly English mother. Her life never leaves the impression of haste or neglect. With so large a family, so little to live on, and a husband who was neither thrifty nor extravagant, she contrived leisure for occupations to each of which others would have given their lives. An hour each morning and evening, and occasionally at noon, were devoted to communion with God and prayer. Before the morning worship of the household, she sought the same intercourse, and would not even then walk in the open air, "because it discomposed her head. Though the lamp of devotion is always burning, yet a wise virgin will arise and trim before going forth to meet the Bridegroom." When her eldest son was in suspense about his scholarship at Oxford, she wrote: "If you can possibly, set apart the hours of Sunday afternoon from four to six to beg God's favour in this great affair, which time I also have determined to the same work." At least three times a day she examined her conscience, and omitted no opportunity of retirement. There is "nothing in the disposition of your time," she wrote to John, "but what I approve, unless it be that you do not assign enough of it to meditation." She laid down rules for her own conduct, and nothing could better characterise it. "If you desire to live under the continual government and direction of the Holy Spirit, preserve an equal temper." "It always argues a base and cowardly temper to whisper secretly what you dare not speak to a man's face. Therefore be very cautious in speaking of these three sorts of persons, namely, the innocent, the dead, and the absent." "In telling a story, be careful to speak deliberately and calmly; avoiding immoderate mirth or laughter on the one hand, and uncharitableness and excessive anger on the other, lest your invention supply the defect of your memory." It was the custom to drink rounds of healths, and she set herself against it for the sake of others, by resolving she would "drink not the third glass;—which thou canst not tame."

Her aspirations were profound; her sense of God clear, reverent, and holy. "If to esteem and have the highest reverence for Thee, if constantly and sincerely to acknowledge Thee, the supreme, the only desirable God, be to love Thee,—I DO LOVE THEE! If to rejoice in Thy essential Majesty and Glory, if to feel a vital joy overspread and cheer the heart at each perception of Thy blessedness, at every thought that Thou art God, and that all things are in Thy power; that there is none superior or equal to Thee; be to love Thee,—I DO LOVE THEE! If comparatively to despise and undervalue all the world contains, which is esteemed great, fair, or good; if earnestly and constantly to desire Thee, Thy favour, Thy acceptance, Thyself, rather than any or all things Thou hast created, be to love Thee, —I DO LOVE THEE." "The fault," she says again, "is in myself; and I attribute all mistakes in judgment and errors in practice, to want of faith in the blessed Jesus." "O, my dear Charles," she wrote to her son, "when I consider the dignity of his person, the perfection of his purity, the greatness of his sufferings, but above all, his boundless love, I am astonished and utterly confounded; I am lost in thought. I fall into nothing before Him."

Charles Wesley had reason to know much of this devout temper of his mother. Like her other children he had received from her the greater part of his early education, for she considered that her life was first devoted to them. From their infancy they were brought under her firm method and principle. Their rising, midday sleep, and bedtime, nay, their rocking in the cradle, were regulated to the moment. At seven they were prepared for bed; at eight they were left in their rooms awake; "there was no such thing allowed as sitting by a child until it went to sleep." Their food was governed by laws as peremptory; and they "dared not refuse" what was set before them. When they were a year old, they were "taught to fear the rod, and to cry softly." Their will was to be mastered; "I insist upon conquering the will of children betimes, because this is the only strong and rational foundation of a religious education . . . . The parent who studies to subdue it in his child, works together with God in the renewing and saving a soul." If a child has to be corrected, she maintained it must also be conquered. But, as cowardice and fear of punishment often lead children into lying, whoever, when guilty, confessed a fault, was not beaten. None of the children were reprimanded or beaten twice for the same fault, nor upbraided with it if they amended; and every act of obedience was noticed with encouragement. But life was not cheerless in the midst of such strictness. "I take Kempis," Mrs. Wesley says, "to have been an honest, weak man, who had more zeal than knowledge by his condemning all mirth or pleasure as sinful or useless, in opposition to so many direct and plain texts of Scripture;" and the lonely house and the poverty seem to have been steadily brightened by the gay spirits of the children. When a child's fifth birthday was past, it took its place in the school-room, and from nine till twelve, and two till five, learnt the alphabet, a feat that was accomplished in one day by every child but two. This much won, the next step was to spell the first chapter of Genesis,—a task never given up till it was mastered. "I wonder at your patience," said Mr. Wesley. "You have told the child twenty times the same thing." "Had I satisfied myself by mentioning the matter only nineteen times, I should have lost all my labour." The school opened and closed with the singing of a psalm: and nothing—visiting, nor business, nor accident—was allowed to interfere with its routine of six hours; with the result, among others, that the children could read better in a quarter of a year "than the most of women can do as long as they live." Nor was courtesy neglected. Rudeness to one another or to the servants was never passed over. Promises were to be strictly kept: gifts bestowed could not be reversed; and the rights of property were adjusted and guarded even to a pin. Before they could speak, their grace before meal was asked by signs. The Lord's Prayer they said morning and evening, and to this, short prayers were added as they grew older; and as they came to boyhood and womanhood, she determined to give them as thorough training in religion, as in other branches of learning. She prepared a manual on natural theology; a treatise on the doctrines of the Gospel, founded upon the Apostles' Creed; and an analysis and exposition of the Ten Commandments. Having their origin in the need of some elder child, they successively came to be the text books of the family, and the basis of a thoroughly sound knowledge of religious truth. That it might not be mere learning of religious books and sound doctrine, she arranged for conferences and prayer with the children. "On Monday, I talk with Molly; on Tuesday, with Hetty; Wednesday, with Nancy; Thursday, with Jacky; Friday, with Patty; Saturday, with Charley; and with Emilia and Sukey together on Sunday." When the family assembled in the new rectory after the fire, she added to the former rules, that after school on each day "the eldest child took the youngest that could spell, and the second the next; and so with the rest, until they passed two and two into private rooms, where they read a chapter in the New Testament, and the Psalms for the evening of the day." Nor did these influences cease when the children left home. Her son John describes the calmness with which his mother wrote letters, while surrounded by thirteen children; and her letters to them "are probably such as no other mother ever wrote." A single extract addressed to her son Samuel, an exemplary, but not then a Christian lad, must suffice. "I have a great and just desire, that all your sisters and your brothers should be saved as well as you; but I must own, I think my concern for you is much the greatest. What! you, my son! you! who was once the son of my extremest sorrow, in your birth and in your infancy, who is now the son of my tenderest love; my friend, in whom is my inexpressible delight, my future hopes of happiness in this world, for whom I weep and pray in my retirement from the world, when no mortal knows the agonies of my soul upon your account, no eye sees my tears, which are only beheld by that Father of spirits, of whom I so importunately beg grace for you, that I hope I may at last be heard! Is it possible that YOU should be damned?

Oh, that it were impossible! Indeed, I think I could almost wish myself accursed, so I were sure of your salvation. But still I hope, still I would fain persuade myself, that a child for whom so many prayers have been offered to Heaven, will not, at last, miscarry." Pleading, that for tenderness and solemnity could scarcely be surpassed, and that must have been felt by her son as an echo of the Epworth schoolroom, as well as the frankest outburst of his mother's heart.

A spirit so active within the family was sure to be active without. One of the rector's journeys to London left the parish to a lazy and helpless curate; and Mrs. Wesley, watchful and prompt, saw the danger to the children, and held an evening service for them and the servants at the rectory. It oozed out among the neighbours, who asked to attend, and being permitted, brought others, with whom "she sang psalms, read prayers, and also a short sermon." As many as two hundred crowded in, and others left for want of room: people who had not been to church for years became regular worshippers, and the habits of the place changed for the better. Mrs. Wesley was led into this reluctantly, and only by that supreme sense of duty that marked her life. She doubted if it was proper for a woman "to present the prayers of the people to God;" she would "fain have dismissed them before prayers, but they begged so earnestly to stay that I durst not deny them." Inman, the curate, was of another opinion, and with one or two men of the Isle sent up a protest to the rector against such irregularity and conventicle-worship of the rector's wife. Mrs. Wesley's defence closed with so forcible an appeal that her husband refused to interfere. "If you do, after all, think fit to dissolve this assembly, do not tell me that you desire me to do it, for that will not satisfy my conscience; but send me your positive command, in such full and express terms as may absolve me from all guilt and punishment for neglecting this opportunity of doing good, when you and I shall appear before the great and awful tribunal of our Lord Jesus Christ."

Mr. Wesley was now wearing old. To compose his Dissertations on Job had cost him the palsy and the gout. The stream of rhyme that had flowed at two hundred couplets a day was dried up. He was wasted, changed, sometimes unable to preach. An accident, by which he was thrown out of a wagon, and a serious illness, were heavy shocks to his constitution. And he had some fear of death. But as his end drew nearer the fear ceased. His last words were full of fire. "Let me hear you talk of heaven: nothing is too much to suffer for heaven." To his youngest son: "Be strong. The Christian faith will surely revive in this kingdom. You shall see it, though I shall not." "Are you not near heaven?" whispers his son John. "Yes, I am." "And with a cheerful countenance he falls asleep, without one struggle or sigh or groan."

"I am heard," said his widow, "in his having so easy a death, and my being strengthened to bear it." Most of his daughters were married. His eldest son was a clergyman; John was a college tutor; Charles had no income. They were bound to their mother by no common attachment, and, as far as they could, they would assure her comfort. Her first resting-place was with her daughter Emilia, who had opened a school at Gainsborough. Another daughter received her at her husband's parsonage in Salisbury. In 1739 she went to London, and found her last resting-place at the Foundery in Moorfields, where her son John had begun to preach. She had already given him and Charles sanction to join Oglethorpe's ill-starred expedition to Georgia. "Had I twenty sons," she had said, "I should rejoice that they were all so employed, though I should never see them more." But on learning the circumstances of their trials she vehemently protested against their return. She had already lost her firstborn. "I somewhat marvelled," she wrote to Charles, "that Jacky did not inform me of it before he left, since he knew thereof. But he was unacquainted with the manner of God's dealings with me in extraordinary cases, which indeed is no wonder; for though I have so often experienced his infinite power and mercy in my support and inward calmness of spirit, when the trial would otherwise have been too strong for me, yet his ways of working are to myself incomprehensible and ineffable. Your brother was exceedingly dear to me in his life, and perhaps I have erred in loving him too well. I once thought it impossible for me to bear his loss, but none know what they can bear till they are tried. As your good old grandfather often used to say, 'That is an affliction that God makes an affliction.'"

Her youngest daughter followed, "full of thankfulness, resignation, and love;" and the widow was soon to rejoin her husband. She was never as strong in body as in mind. The want of proper clothes and food occasioned her repeated sickness. She was once confined to her room for many months. "I have many years," she says, "suffered much pain and great bodily infirmities." As she drew on to old age her infirmities strengthened their hold. In the July of 1742, John Wesley hurried up from Bristol, to find his mother "on the borders of eternity." The next morning she said, on awakening, "My dear Saviour! art Thou come to help me in my extremity at last!" Her son and his five surviving sisters sang round her bed. "It was just four o'clock. She opened her eyes wide, and fixed them upwards for a moment. Then the lids dropped, and the soul was set at liberty, without one struggle or groan or sigh. We stood around the bed and fulfilled her last request, uttered a little before she lost her speech—'Children, as soon as I am released, sing a psalm of praise to God!'"

Eight days after, an innumerable company of people came to bury her in Bunhill-fields. "At the grave there was much grief when Mr. Wesley said, 'I commit the body of my MOTHER to the earth.'" The same Mr. John Wesley then stood up and preached the funeral sermon. "It was," he says, "one of the most solemn assemblies I ever saw or expect to see on this side eternity." She had written her husband's epitaph, and her son now wrote hers, "on a plain stone at the head of her grave." She had come back to where she started. The girl who had heard the Nonconformist pastors in her father's house in Spital-yard, now slept with the Nonconformist dead. There were occasional curious links of coincidence between her life and her husband's. Their maternal grandfathers were both eminent Puritan divines, both active members of the Westminster Assembly, and each a John White—his a clergyman and hers a lawyer. They themselves were both the children of ejected ministers. Each of them left the party of their fathers and served in the Church which their fathers had forsaken. Each of them, about the same time, was touched by a missionary impulse. The story of Ziegenbalg and Plutscho led Mrs. Wesley to pray more for the Epworth people, to speak to them with more warmth, and to begin with her own children. Mr. Wesley, for one hundred pounds per annum, and forty for his curate, "would venture his life" among the heathen from St. Helena to the furthest east, "inquire into the state of Christianity in all our factories and settlements, and endeavour to bring over some of the Brahmins and common people to the Christian religion." Whether this sound Churchman, had he been spared, would have yielded his sympathy to his sons, and established a last coincidence by alliance with Nonconformity in his old age, is but conjecture. But if Methodism claims the last days of his wife, there is a touching incident by which it claims something also of him.

Seven years after his death, seven weeks before his wife's, "a grave man, little of stature, in full canonicals," stood on his tombstone in Epworth churchyard and preached there for eight successive summer evenings to dense and ever denser crowds. "Near forty years," John Wesley says, "did my father labour here; but he saw little fruit of his labour. I took some pains among this people too, and my strength also seemed spent in vain. But now the fruit appeared. There were scarce any in the town in whom either my father or I had taken any pains formerly, but the seed sown so long since now sprang up, bringing fresh repentance and remission of sins." A new religious movement had sprung up, destined to waken the religious life of England, and to found a vast Church, and of the first fruit that was gathered the seed was sown by the patient hand of the old rector of Epworth. Nor was this the only mark he left upon it. His gift of rhyme developed in his son Charles into a worthier faculty. The poet of Methodism became the poet of the Church, and hymns of Wesley will be sung as long as there are hearts in England to love Christ.

But the mother of the Wesleys left a deeper mark. The method and order of her own mind stamped the new revival. Her influence was daily and secretly moulding her son. The principles he had drawn from her lasted him through life. She has more claim to be linked with Methodism than giving it its founder—the claim of that clear sense, vigorous intellect, supremacy of duty, and firm conscientiousness, that meditative piety and holy living, that made her a noble woman, and that helped to make John Wesley a noble man, the man he was.

A SUNDAY MORNING'S MEDITATION.

BY A BUSINESS MAN.

Welcome to my heart, most precious day of rest! Life here below is wearisome. It is like a wilderness where the hills are very steep and the ways are very rough. It is like a noisy, bustling market, where incessant turmoil tells upon the nerves; and endless excitements and disappointments weary the soul. I hail thee, precious day of rest, for I long to sit down for a few moments—alone with my God and myself—to breathe, and to gather fresh strength for the rest of my journey.

Will that journey be a long one?

Thou alone knowest, Lord, in whose hands my breath is, and whose are all my ways! Perhaps this is the last Lord's day which is allotted to me to spend on earth. It is true, I am not old yet. I am still in what is called the prime of my life. But what is life's strength? It is Thy will and pleasure alone, O my God! When Thou sayest, "Return, ye children of men," even the strongest disappear like a vapour. How many a one is perhaps now resting in his grave, who this day week was buoyant with health and vigour. How little, perhaps, did they then think that they were spending their last Sabbath on earth! Perhaps many of them desecrated the day in calculating the profits of the enterprises, or in anticipating the pleasures of the dissipations, which the new week was to bring them. And now they are buried, with all their enterprises and pleasures, in the deep dark pit of death! And so, perhaps, not many days hence, my wife, my children, and my friends, may walk to the fresh grave in which I shall be sleeping my long sleep till the great day dawns.

Suppose it should be so. Is that a reason for depression of mind? Oh, I remember the time when the mere thought of it would have made me perfectly miserable. It was when I did not know Thee, Jesus, my Lord, Son of the living God! It is true I had heard of Thee from my childhood, and I could tell Thy life's wonderful story, and I bore Thy name. Yet I knew Thee not. Thou wert a stranger to my heart, which was full of this world's pleasures, hopes and prospects. Oh, I could not then bear even so much as the thought of death, because life—alas! this poor, short, perishable life—was my all and all, my heaven and my God. But stranger as Thou wert to me, yet I was no stranger to Thee. Thou knewest me, though I knew Thee not, neither cared to know Thee. Thou knewest me in my folly, in my blindness, in the foolhardiness with which I could dance on the brink of an abyss, and sleep, like Jonah, in the sight of the approaching judgment. Thou knewest me, and Thou hadst compassion on me. So Thou touched me with the finger of Thy grace, and awoke me out of my lethargy, and Thou opened my eyes to make me see that what I called life was death, and that Thou, and Thou alone, art Life. Since then, I have learnt to think of death without trembling, for through the grave's dismal shade I behold Thy glorious form, Jesus, Resurrection!

O Thou First-born of the Dead, this day is Thy ever-returning, never-waning birthday. All creation, radiant with wonder and delight, proclaims, "The Lord is risen indeed! He was dead, and, lo, He liveth!" Save for that, creation would be one immense frightful grave! Whatever doctrine may have been doubted or contested, the doctrine of death never was. Take away Christ, and the human eye cannot discover one thing in the universe which does not end in death and destruction. Replace Christ, and that same human eye now armed with faith's wonderful glass, beholds nothing which does not speak of the new heavens and the new earth; which is not symbolic of Him who maketh all things new; which is not prophetic of the glorious resurrection with which the creature one day is to rise out of the bondage of corruption.

Oh, how can man be so blind as not to see that glorious Day-spring from on high which hath visited us in the darkness of our night! Nay, how can he be so stubborn as to refuse to see it, while he is fostered by its warmth, and nourished by the fruits which it makes to grow! Oh, ye blind philosophers, who deny Christ while enjoying the blessings of Christianity, ye who now boast of your knowledge and civilisation, wherein would you differ from the heathen, but for Christ and his church? Have you never put to yourself the question, how is it that the Church, sprung up from a dozen poor ignorant fishermen, has exercised such a wonderful regenerating power upon the life of mankind—a power of which your knowledge and civilisation are only faint results? Do you not see that the Church would be powerless and hopeless, were she not the bearer of Life from the Dead? And what was it which enriched her with this all-quickening, all-conquering power? Her faith. She has seen Him who was crucified and died, was buried and rose again. She has seen Him ascend into heaven, and she now sees Him seated there upon his throne, crowned with honour and glory. You cannot see it, because you do not believe it. But the Church of God believes it, and this faith of hers is the answer to your question, how it is that she can conquer the world. She is the fulness, the body, the bride of Him that filleth all in all. He liveth in her, He speaketh through her, and it is by her that He has strewn over the world those jewels of wisdom, knowledge, and civilisation with which you boastfully adorn yourself, being ignorant that they are only refuse, when compared with that exceeding and eternal weight of glory which He has prepared for his people, and which you despise.

But let me not ask how man can be so blind, for I was once as blind myself, and if I see now, it is only through the grace of God. Next to the unfathomable depth of the riches both of the wisdom and knowledge of God, man's natural aversion to Christ is the greatest mystery. Can we conceive of any object so loveable as Christ? And yet is there any object which man in his natural state hates so much? Oh, I remember how thoroughly I disliked Him! Not only his church and chapel, his hymns, his organs, his sermons, his bible, but Himself! To go into my closet, to lock the door, to kneel down in the dust at his feet, to speak to Himself face to face as if there were not a being in the universe besides Him and me, to open my life's book, to disclose my heart's innermost chambers, and to discuss the question what He was to me, and what I had been to Him—Oh, I remember how I used to flee from the mere idea of this! The slightest allusion to it would make my spirit miserable.

What was the reason of this? An instinctive feeling told me that my first step in a new course would be a death-blow to everything I had hitherto called life. I perceived that my own life and Christ's could never go together; that each absolutely excluded the other. My life's principle was to make myself the beginning and the end of everything. In opposition to this Christ cried, "I am the Alpha and Omega!" than which nothing is more unbearable to human nature, in its fallen state. When through sin we cut the vital artery which connected us with the heart of God, we set ourselves up as independent fountain-heads of life. We became like gods, living in ourselves, through ourselves, for ourselves, desiring to be dependent upon no being but ourselves, and trying to make every being dependent upon us. And ever since then the term "human nature," has obtained a meaning opposite to what it had originally. When God created man in his own image, after his likeness, and breathed into his nostrils the breath of life, human nature and divine nature were two different degrees of one and the same life, so that the one could not help being the image of the other, so far as the finite can resemble the infinite. After the fall, on the contrary, human nature and divine nature became two opposite lives, the one having disconnected its vital principle from the other, to live a life of its own. This is our innate pride, which, since no life can live apart from God, must necessarily end in destruction. The only way of escape is to return to God, to the Rock from which we were hewn, the Root from which we sprang. Yes we must—but with shame on our faces, with the confusion of shame on our lips, with the feeling of shame in our hearts, saying, "Lord, we had a name to live, but we were dead! We were dead in trespasses and sins, loathsome in Thy sight because of the leprosy of our form; yet we walked about as if we were kings, decking ourselves with ornaments, and swelling our breast with pride."

Here lies the true cause of our natural aversion to Christ. His appearance amongst us opened up the only possible way through which we can return to God, but it is a way of the deepest humiliation, because a way of truth—humiliation, not of the body, neither of the garment, but of the heart. To confess that we have been wrong—how difficult is it to human nature! But to confess not only that we have been wrong, but foolish, wicked, faithless, and godless—how impossible is it to human nature, except through the grace of God! Yet to come to Thee, O crucified Son of Man, what is it but such a confession? Why should we go to Thee at all, if it were not for salvation from sin and guilt, from everlasting death and destruction? Gold and silver Thou givest not. Thou wert poor when on earth; even the beasts of the field, and the birds of the air, were richer than Thou wert. Fame or name Thou givest not, for Thou wert despised and rejected of men, and didst breathe Thy last on a tree of shame, between two malefactors, as if Thou wert the worst of all. But what Thou givest is a body broken for sin, and blood shed for iniquity. What then, if we go to Thee, are we doing but just acknowledging that we need that body because we are sinners; that we need that blood because our iniquities are gone over our heads? Oh, how I perceived the deep humiliation implied in that acknowledgment! It was, to my mind, like pronouncing a verdict of total bankrupcty upon my whole life, upon all I had been and thought and done! It was to me like dying, for my life's garden was such a bright, blooming Paradise in my eyes!

And yet an inward voice whispered in my bosom that there was not one flower in that garden, however bright-looking, that could stand the close inspection of the eye of God. For virtuous and irreproachable as my life might appear in the sight of men, nay, noble and highly moral as it appeared in the estimation of those who knew me well, yet I felt that, if probed to the very core, all true and really good principle would be found lacking. I could not have analysed even the best of my actions, without finding that selfishness had been its leading motive. To honour myself, to benefit myself, to please myself, was from my earliest childhood the object of all my thinking, doing, and striving. To this end I had loved my friends, helped my neighbours, and even performed my religious duties. How different, Lord! was Thy life! Thou, too, didst perform Thy duties as a man: didst love Thy friends, didst help Thy neighbour, didst attend the temple and the synagogue, but it was to honour God Thy Father, to please Him, to promote the glory of his name, to have his will done on earth as it was in heaven. Thou didst not seek Thine own honour. Thou didst not seek Thine own life, but wert prepared to lose it by the most shameful of all deaths, if only Thy Father's will would be fulfilled. Oh, what remained of all my highly-praised virtue and righteousness, when I compared them with Thine! I covered my face with my hands. All my life's flowers drooped, as if blighted and withered. Idolater was my true name. I had spent all my life in worshipping my own miserable self, as if it were God and the centre of the universe.

Hadst Thou been like me, Thou couldst never have risen from the dead. Selfishness cannot rise again; its only prospect is to die and be buried. It never can find a place in the region of light and life, however bright the glory it adorns itself with. It must go down to the realm of darkness and death, because it is hell-born. But Thou, Emmanuel! wert love; therefore Thou wert life. It was impossible that Thou shouldst be holden of death. Thou must come out of the dark prison of hell again, because Thou wert heaven-born. Thy resurrection has declared Thee with power to be the Son of God. Oh, the grave is God's great crucible for testing the spirit. How was it that not one of the great geniuses who set the world wondering after them ever rose from the grave? They all loved their own selves. How was it that He in whom we "saw no beauty that we should desire Him," burst the bands of death and rose victorious? He loved God; He loved men; He loved when none else loved, and all round was hatred and contempt.

Yes, Thou didst speak the truth when Thou saidst that Thou wert come into this world for judgment. As long as I knew Thee not, I could not judge myself; I could only measure myself by myself, and I always came out pure in my own eyes. But from the moment I saw Thee, I could drop down at Thy feet and cry, "Depart from me, for I am a sinful man, O Lord!" Thou didst not pronounce the judgment; Thou only didst show Thyself in the beauty of Thy holiness, in the glory of Thy love—and the judgment was there. I was frightened at my own form. I had been like an Ethiopian, walking in the shades of night, and thinking that I was bright and white like the angels of the resurrection. But Thou, Sun of Righteousness, arose—and oh, how manifest did it become, that I was black from the crown of my head to the sole of my feet! No; Thou didst pronounce no judgment. Thou didst not condemn. Thou didst not curse. Thou didst only stand before me with the smile of love on Thy face, and the joy of salvation in Thine eyes. Yet I felt judged at once and for ever. Condemned was my past life which I had lived without God and without love. I saw the wounds in Thy hands; they ought to be in mine. I saw Thy crown of thorns; it ought to press upon my head. No, Thou didst curse not me; but I felt what the tree upon which I saw Thee hanging spoke. I learnt the immensity of my debt, but not from the lips of a judge—no, from the immensity of the ransom paid down by Thee! Not until I saw my salvation, didst Thou permit me to know the depth of my destruction. Thy love was too strong for me. Hadst Thou come to me with the law and its curse, verily I should, in despair, have taken up my armour to fight Thee. But Thou camest with grace and truth, not as a lion, but as a slain lamb, meek and lowly in heart, and I was disarmed—I bowed my head—I had nothing to say save this, "Show me a place at Thy feet, my Lord and my God! I am Thine henceforth by the right of Thy love's conquest."

How difficult it is for anyone living without Christ, to believe that Christ's yoke is easy, and his burden light! Yet no master is so kind as He of whose commandments it is said with so much truth, that they are "not grievous." To serve two masters is hard work; to try to live two lives at a time is dreadful labour. But when once the choice is fixed, and fixed for ever,—when our own will is broken and our own life is killed, then nothing can be so delightful as to be left alone with Him whose meat it was to do the will of his Heavenly Father. There can be no hardship in the service of love, for the work which love does is exactly the work it desires to do.

It is true it may be a painful work to the flesh, it may be the bearing of a heavy cross and the drinking of a bitter cup. But heaviness is heaviness no more, when there is delight in bearing, because there is the conviction that it is good and necessary, and required for the pleasure and honour of a beloved one. That which makes a yoke grievous and a burden painful, is the unwillingness of the heart to bear it. To sit day and night in a dull dreary room by the cradle of a sick child, is like sitting in a prison cell to the careless, light-minded, pleasure-loving young servant; but the mother of the child would not for all the treasures of the world exchange the spot for the most charming place in creation. She would feel miserable anywhere but here. What is the key to this mystery? Love. Love has its own tastes and appetites, peculiar to itself and unintelligible to every one else. Love can even hanker after pain and thirst after suffering. "I have a baptism to be baptised with," thus it speaks, "and how am I straitened till it be accomplished?"

This explains the mystery of the Christian life. It looks, to those who do not live it, like a life of mere sacrifice and suffering, of dulness and melancholy. It is, on the contrary, the only life in which there is true peace and happiness, and where no misery is possible to those who live it. The cause of this is love. "We love Him because He first loved us"—this is the motto which explains everything. The Christian life is not an engagement by contract between a master and his servant. It is the union of two hearts—that of the Saviour with that of the saved—by the enduring ties of the most intimate love. It is compared to the marriage tie in the Epistle to the Ephesians. It is not a mere agreement in opinion, in plans or purposes, in doctrines or rites. It is a transmission of the life of the one into that of the other, the one thinking henceforth with the thoughts of the other, and feeling with the heart of the other. "I live not," the saved one says, "but Christ liveth in me, and the life which I now live in the flesh I live by faith in the Son of God, who loved me and gave Himself for me." Here the one does the will and the work of the other, not from reflection and calculation, but from the instinctive impulse of the new nature. Both natures are alike, breathing one and the same atmosphere, that of the Spirit of God. They have the same appetites and aversions, feed upon the same meat, and rejoicing in the same delights.

How can that wonderful union be brought about? Only by faith in the sin-atoning sacrifice of the Lamb of God. Not by faith in that doctrine as a doctrine, but by faith in the thing which that doctrine signifies. Thou camest from Heaven, Lord, to save me. It was my sins which Thou didst bear in Thy precious body upon the tree. It was the penalty of my crimes which Thou didst suffer. Thou didst undergo all that shame, those pains, those agonies of death, those horrors of the dark valley, because Thou didst love me. Thou didst descend into the deep abyss and didst burst the doors of the grave, to open up a way out of the prison for me, because Thou didst desire to see me in Heaven, saved from everlasting ruin, plucked out of the hands of the terrible murderer, restored to God as a lost child to his father.

How can man believe all this with his heart, and at the same time continue to live his own life? A Being who has done all this for me, cannot but take possession of my whole heart, and become the root of a completely new life, which will henceforth live and move only from love towards Him. Such a faith is not merely the knowledge of a doctrine, but the experience of the power of unspeakable facts. Through that faith I look upon the history of Jesus as upon my own history. In Bethlehem I see Him born with whom my true life was to take its beginning. On the cross I see Him die with whom my old life was crucified, killed, and for ever buried. In Joseph's garden I see Him rise as the First-born of that wonderful family of which I shall appear as a later-born member. This is my biography. I have none of my own; I have only one in Christ. For what I have besides is not biography, but nekro-graphy—a record of death.

Oh, Jesus—Saviour! when will Thy nature's holy, heavenly instinct act so immediately within me, that at each moment Thy will and work shall be done long before my own old nature has time to reflect? It is not Thy fault, that so often Thy will is left undone, and so many a work spoiled. It is my fault, because I am slothful in keeping my members which are on earth subdued in mortification. Through faith and love, Thou art born and formed in me; but, alas! that form cannot yet come to its full growth, from its being hedged in by the thorns of my mortal nature. Sin has not my heart. Thou hast it, as Thou knowest. But sin has often still my thoughts, my habits, my passions. Help me, oh Thou quickening Spirit, to expel it entirely. Take Thy scourge of cords, and thoroughly purify Thy temple! I cannot rest as long as there is one fibre within me which does not thrill with joy at the beckoning of Thy finger. For within me, as everywhere else, Jesus, Jehovah, my Saviour, my all, Thou must be King of kings, and Lord of lords!

THE GOLDEN OPPORTUNITY.

A Story told to a Child.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "STUDIES FOR STORIES."

I.

Not many things have happened to me in the course of my life which can be called events. But of one great event, as I then thought it, happened when I was eight years old. On that birthday I first possessed a piece of gold.

How well I remember the occasion! I had a holiday, and was reading aloud to my mother. The book was the "Life of Howard, the philanthropist." I was interested in it, though the style was considerably above my comprehension; at last I came to the following sentence, which I could make nothing of; "He could not let slip such a golden opportunity for doing good."

"What is a golden opportunity?" I enquired.

"It means a very good opportunity."

"But, mamma, why do they call it golden?"

My mamma smiled, and said it was a figurative expression; "Gold is very valuable, and very uncommon; this opportunity was a very valuable and uncommon one; we can express that in one word, by calling it a golden opportunity."

I pondered upon the information for some time, and then made a reply to the effect, that all the golden opportunities seemed to happen to very rich people; or people who lived a long time ago; or else to great men, whose lives we can read in books—very great men, such as Wilberforce and Howard; but they never happened to real people, whom we could see every day, nor to children.

"To children like you, Orris?" said my mother, "why, what kind of a golden opportunity are you wishing for just now?"

My reply was childish enough.

"If I were a great man I should like to sail after the slave ships, fight them, and take back the poor slaves to their own country. Or I should like to do something like what Quintus Curtius did. Not exactly like that; because you know, mamma, if I were to jump into a gulf, that would not really make it close."

"No," said my mother, "it would not."

"And besides," I reasoned, "if it had closed, I should never have known of the good I had done, because I should have been killed."

"Certainly," said my mother; I saw her smile, and thinking it was at the folly of my last wish, hastened to bring forward a wiser one.

"I think I should like to be a great lady, and then if there had been a bad harvest, and all the poor people on my lord's land were nearly starving, I should like to come down to them with a purse full of money, and divide it among them. But you see, mamma, I have no golden opportunities."

"My dear, we all have some opportunities for doing good, and they are golden, or not, according to the use we make of them."

"But, mamma, we cannot get people released out of prison, as Howard did."

"No, but sometimes, by instructing them in their duty, by providing them with work, so that they shall earn bread enough, and not be tempted, and driven by hunger, to steal, we can prevent some people from being ever put in prison."

My mother continued to explain that those who really desired to do good, never wanted opportunities, and that the difference between Howard and other people was more in perseverance and earnestness than in circumstances. But I do not profess to remember much of what she said, I only know that, very shortly, she took me into my grandfather's study, and, sitting down, began busily to mend a heap of pens which lay beside him on the table.

He was correcting proof-sheets, and, knowing that I must not talk, I stood awhile, very quietly watching him.

Presently I saw him mark out a letter in the page, make a long stroke in the margin, and write a letter d beside it.

Curiosity was too much for my prudence; I could not help saying—

"Grandpapa, what did you write that letter d for?"

"There was a letter too much in the word, child," he replied; "I spell 'potatoes' with only one p, and I want the printer to put out the second."

"Then d stands for don't, I suppose?" was my next observation; "it means don't put it in?"

"Yes, child, yes—something like that."

If it had not been my birthday I should not have had courage to interrupt him again. "But, grandpapa, 'do' begins with d, so how is the printer to know whether you mean 'do,' or 'don't?'"

My grandfather said "pshaw!" turned short round upon my mother, and asked her if she had heard what I said?

My mother admitted that it was a childish observation.

"Childish!" repeated my grandfather, "childish! She'll never be anything but a child—never; she has no reasoning faculties at all." When my grandfather was displeased with me, he never scolded me for the fault of the moment, but inveighed against me in the piece, as a draper would say.

"Did you ever talk nonsense at her age—ever play with a penny doll, and sing to a kitten? I should think not."

"I was of a very different disposition," said my mother, gently.

"Aye," said the old man, "that you were. Why, I wouldn't trust this child, as I trusted you, for the world; you were quite a little woman, could pay bills, or take charge of keys; but this child has no discretion—no head-piece. She says things that are wide of the mark. She's—well, my dear, I didn't mean to vex you—she's a nice child enough, but, bless me, she never thinks, and never reasons about anything."

He was mistaken. I was thinking and reasoning at that moment. I was thinking how delightful it would be if I might have the cellar keys, and all the other keys, hanging to my side, so that every one might see that I was trusted with them; and I was reasoning, that perhaps my mother had behaved like a little woman, because she was treated like one.

"My dear, I did not mean that she was worse than many other children," repeated my grandfather; "come here child, and I'll kiss you."

My mother pleaded by way of apology for me—"She has a very good memory."

"Memory! aye, there's another disadvantage. She remembers everything; she's a mere parrot. Why, when you, at her age, wanted a punishment, if I set you twenty lines of poetry, they'd keep you quiet for an hour. Set this child eighty—knows 'em directly, and there's time wasted in hearing her say 'em into the bargain."

"I hope she will become more thoughtful as she grows older," said my mother, gently.

"I hope she will—there's room for improvement. Come and sit on my knee, child. So this is your birth-day. Well, I suppose I must give you some present or other. Leave the child with me, my dear, I'll take care of her. But I won't detain you, for the proofs are all ready. Open the door for your mother, Orris. Ah! you'll never be anything like her—never."

I did as he desired, and then my grandfather, looking at me with comical gravity, took out a leathern purse, and dived with his fingers among the contents. "When I was a little boy, as old as you, nobody gave me any money."

Encouraged by his returning good humour, I drew closer, and peeped into the purse. There were as many as six or eight sovereigns in it. I thought what a rich man my grandfather was, and when he took out a small coin and laid it on my palm, I could scarcely believe it was for me.

"Do you know what that is, child?"

"A half-sovereign, grandpapa."

"Well, do you think you could spend it?"

"O yes, grandpapa."

"'O yes!' and she opens her eyes! Ah, child, child! that money was worth ten shillings when it was in my purse, and I wouldn't give sixpence for anything it will buy now it has once touched your little fingers."

"Did you give it me to spend exactly as I like, grandpapa?"

"To be sure, child,—there, take it,—it's worth nothing to you, my dear."

"Nothing to me! The half-sovereign worth nothing to me! why, grandpapa?"

"Nothing worth mentioning; you have no real wants; you have clothes, food, and shelter, without this half-sovereign."

"O, yes; but, grandpapa, I think it must be worth ten times as much to me as to you; I have only this one, and you have quantities; I shouldn't wonder if you have thirty or forty half-sovereigns, and a great many shillings and half-crowns besides, to spend every year."

"I shouldn't wonder!"

"And I have only one. I can't think, grandpapa, what you do with all your money; if I had it I would buy so many delightful things with it."

"No doubt! kaleidoscopes, and magic lanterns, and all sorts of trash. But unfortunately you have not got it: you have only one half-sovereign to throw away."

"But perhaps I shall not throw it away; perhaps I shall try and do some good with it."

"Do some good with it! Bless you, my dear, if you do but try to do some good with it, I shall not call it thrown away."

I then related what I had been reading, and had nearly concluded, when the housemaid came in. She laid a crumpled piece of paper by his desk, and with it a shilling and a penny, saying, "there's the change, sir, out of your shoemaker's bill."

My grandfather took it up, looked at it, and remarked that the shilling was a new one. Then, with a generosity which I really am at a loss to account for, he actually, and on the spot, gave me both the shilling and the penny.

There they lay in the palm of my hand, gold, silver, and copper; he then gave me another kiss and abruptly dismissed me, saying that he had more writing to do; and I walked along the little passage with an exultation of heart that a queen might have envied, to show this unheard-of wealth to my mother.

I remember laying the three coins upon a little table, and dancing round it, singing, "There's a golden opportunity! and there's a silver opportunity! and there's a copper opportunity!" and having continued this exercise till I was quite tired, I spent the rest of the morning in making three little silk bags, one for each of them, previously rubbing the penny with sand-paper, to make it bright and clean.

Visions and dreams floated through my brain as to the good I was to do with this property. They were vain-glorious, but not selfish, but they were none of them fulfilled, and need not be recorded. The next day, just as my lessons were finished, papa came in with his hat and stick in his hand; he was going to walk to the town, and offered to take me with him.

It was always a treat to walk out with my father, especially when he went to the town. I liked to look in at the shop windows, and admire their various contents.

To the town therefore we went. My father was going to the Mechanics' Institute, and could not take me in with him, but there was a certain basket-maker, with whose wife I was often left on these occasions: to this good woman he brought me, and went away, promising not to be long.

And now, dear reader, whoever you may be, I beseech you judge not too harshly of me; remember I was but a child, and it is certain that if you are not a child yourself, there was a time when you were one. Next door to the basket-maker's there was a toy shop, and in its window I espied several new and very handsome toys.

"Mr. Miller's window looks uncommon gay," said the old basket-maker, observing the direction of my eyes.

"Uncommon," repeated his wife; "those new gimcracks from London is handsome sure-ly."

"Wife," said the old man, "there's no harm in missy's just taking a look at 'em—eh?"

"Not a bit in the world, bless her," said the old woman; "I know she'll go no further, and come back here when she's looked 'em over."

"O yes, indeed I will; Mrs. Stebbs, may I go?"

The old woman nodded assent, and I was soon before the window.

Splendid visions! O the enviable position of Mr. Miller! How wonderful that he was not always playing with his toys, showing himself his magic lanterns, setting out his puzzles, and winding up his musical boxes. Still more wonderful, that he could bear to part with them for mere money!

I was lost in admiration, when Mr. Miller's voice made me start.—"Wouldn't you like to step inside, miss?"

He said this so affably, that I felt myself quite welcome, and was beguiled into entering. In an instant he was behind the counter. "What is the little article I can have the pleasure, miss—"

"O," I replied, blushing deeply, "I do not want to buy anything this morning, Mr. Miller."

"Indeed, miss, that's rather a pity. I'm sorry, miss, I confess, on your account. I should like to have served you, while I have goods about me that I'm proud of. In a week or two," and he looked pompously about him—"I should say in less time than that, they'll all be cleared out."

"What, will they all be gone? all sold!" I exclaimed in dismay.

"Just so, miss, such is the appreciation of the public;" and he carelessly took up a little cedar stick, and played "The blue bells of Scotland" on the glass keys of a plaything piano.

"This," he observed, coolly throwing down the stick, and taking up an accordion, "this delightful little instrument is half-a-guinea—equal to the finest notes of the hautboy." He drew it out, and in his skilful hands it "discoursed" music, which I thought the most excellent I had ever heard.

But what is the use of minutely describing my temptation. In ten minutes the accordion was folded up in silver paper, and I had parted with my cherished half-sovereign.

As we walked home, I enlarged on the delight I should have in playing on my accordion. "It is so easy, papa: you have only to draw it in and out; I can even play it at dinner time, if you like, between the meat and the puddings. You know the Queen has a band, papa, to play while she dines, and so can you."

My father abruptly declined this liberal offer; so did my grandfather, when I repeated it to him, but I was relieved to find that he was not in the least surprised at the way in which I had spent his present. This, however, did not prevent my feeling sundry twinges of regret when I remembered all my good intentions. But, alas! my accordion soon cost me tears of bitter disappointment. Whether from its fault, or my own, I could not tell, but draw it out, and twist it about as I might, it would not play "The Blue Bells of Scotland," or any other of my favourite tunes. It was just like the piano, every tune must be learned; there was no music inside which only wanted winding out of it, as you wind the tunes out of barrel organs.

My mother coming in some time during that melancholy afternoon, found me sitting at the foot of my little bed holding my accordion, and shedding over it some of the most bitter tears that shame and repentance had yet wrung from me.

She looked astonished, and asked "What is the matter, my child?"

"O mamma," I replied, as well as my sobs would let me, "I have bought this thing which won't play, and I have given Mr. Miller my golden opportunity."

"What, have you spent your half-sovereign? I thought you were going to put poor little Patty Morgan to school with it, and give her a new frock and tippet."

My tears fell afresh at this, and I thought how pretty little Patty would have looked in the new frock, and that I should have put it on for her, myself. My mother sat down by me, took away the toy, and dried my eyes. "Now you see, my child," she observed, "one great difference between those who are earnestly desirous to do good, and those who only wish it lightly. You had what you were wishing for—a good opportunity; for a child like you, an unusual opportunity, for doing good. You had the means of putting a poor little orphan to school for one whole year—think of that, Orris! In one whole year she might have learned a great deal about the God who made her, and who gave his Son to die for her, and his Spirit to make her holy. One whole year would have gone a great way towards teaching her to read the Bible; in one year she might have learned a great many hymns, and a great many useful things, which would have been of service to her when she was old enough to get her own living. And for what have you thrown all this good from you and from her?"

"I am very, very sorry. I did not mean to buy the accordion; I forgot, when I heard Mr. Miller playing upon it, that I had better not listen; and I never remembered what I had done till it was mine, and folded up in paper."

"You forgot till it was too late?"

"Yes, mamma; but O, I am so sorry, I am sure I shall never do so any more."

"Do not say so, my child; I fear it will happen again, many, many times."

"Many times? O mamma! I will never go into Mr. Miller's shop again."

"My dear child, do you think there is nothing in the world that can tempt you but Mr. Miller's shop?"

"Even if I go there," I sobbed, in the bitterness of my sorrow, "it will not matter now, for I have no half-sovereign left to spend; but if I had another, and he were to show me the most beautiful toys in the world, I would not buy them after this, not if they would play of themselves."

"My dear, that may be true; you, perhaps, would not be tempted again when you were on your guard; but you know, Orris, you do not wish for another toy of that kind. Are there no temptations against which you are not on your guard?"

I thought my mother spoke in a tone of sorrow. I knew she lamented my volatile disposition; and crying afresh, I said to her—"O mamma, do you think that all my life I shall never do any good at all?"

"If you try in your own strength I scarcely think you will. Certainly you will do no good which will be acceptable to God."

"Did I try in my own strength to-day?"

"What do you think, Orris? I leave it to you to decide."

"I am afraid I did."

"I am afraid so, too: but you must not cry and sob in this way. Let this morning's experience show you how open you are to temptation. To let it make you think you shall never yield to such temptation again is the worst thing you can do; you need help from above; seek it, my dear child, otherwise all your good resolutions will come to nothing."

"And if I do seek it, mamma?"

"Then, weak as you are, you will certainly be able to accomplish something. It is impossible for me to take away your volatile disposition, and make you thoughtful and steady, but 'with God all things are possible.'"

"It is a great pity that at the very moment when I want to think about right things, and good things, all sorts of nonsense comes into my head. Grandpapa says I'm just like a whirligig; and besides that I can never help laughing when I ought not, and I am always having lessons set me for running about and making such a noise when baby is asleep."

"My dear child, you must not be discontented; these are certainly disadvantages; they will give you a great deal of trouble, and myself too; but you have one advantage that all children are not blessed with."

"What is that, mamma?"

"There are times when you sincerely wish to do good."

"Yes, I think I really do, mamma; I had better fold up this thing, and put it away, for it only vexes me to see it. I am sorry I have lost my golden opportunity."

And so, not without tears, the toy was put away. The silver and the copper remained, but there was an end of my golden opportunity.

II.

My birth-day had been gone by a week, and still the shilling and the penny lay folded in their silken shrines.

I had quite recovered my spirits, and was beginning to think how I should spend them, particularly the shilling, for I scarcely thought any good could be done with such a small sum as a penny. Now there was a poor Irish boy in our neighbourhood, who had come with the reapers, and been left behind with a hurt in his leg.

My mother had often been to see him; while he was confined to his bed, she went regularly to read with him, and sometimes she sent me with our nursemaid to take him a dinner.

He was now much better, and could get about a little. To my mother's surprise she found that he could read perfectly well. One day, when she met him, he "thanked her honour for all favours," and said he should soon be well enough to return to old Ireland.

As we walked home one day my mother said to me—"Orris, if you like, I will tell you of a good way to spend your shilling. You may buy poor Tim a Testament."

I was delighted, and gave my immediate assent. "Well then," said my mother, "that is settled. I should have given one myself to Tim, if you had wished to spend your shilling in something else. And now, remember, you must not change your mind; papa is going to the town to-morrow, you may go with him and get one then."

To-morrow came, and with it a note to me from my two cousins, saying that they were coming over to spend the afternoon with me, and see my Indian corn, and my tobacco plants, which I had planted myself.

I was very proud of my corn, and still more proud that my cousins should think it worth while to come and see it, for they were three or four years older than myself, and did not often take part in my amusements.

By dint of great industry I finished my lessons an hour earlier than usual, and ran into the garden to see how my corn looked. Old gardener himself admitted that it was beautiful; the glossy green leaves fell back like silken streamers. and displayed the grain with its many shades of green, gold, and brown.

I thought how delightful it would be if I could build a kind of bower over against it, in which my cousins could sit and admire it at their leisure. There were some hop plants growing just in the right place: I had only to untwist them: and there was a clematis that could easily be pressed into the service.

I set to work, and with a little help from him, soon made two or three low arches, over which I carefully trained the flowering hops, and mingled them with festoons of clematis. The bower seemed to be worthy of a queen at the least; and no doubt it was really pretty.

I was just carrying some pots of balsams in flower to set at the entrance, when my father came up. "Well, Orris," he said, "mamma tells me you want to go to the town. Be quick, if you do, for I am just ready to start."

"Just ready! O papa, surely it is not one o'clock? If I go this bower will never be finished by three."

"Certainly not, we shall scarcely be home by three but why need it be finished?"

"Don't you remember, papa, that Elsie and Anne are coming!"

"Oh, I had forgotten that important fact. Well, then, if they are to sit in this bower, I think you must stay at home and finish it; you can go with me some other day."

Now my father knew nothing about the Testament, or he would doubtless have given different advice. While I hesitated, anxious to stay, and yet afraid not to go, my mother drew near, and I thought I would leave it to her to decide.

"The child wants to finish her bower, my dear," said my father; "therefore, as it is not particularly convenient to me to have her to-day, she may stay at home if she likes, for, I presume, her errand is of no great consequence."

My mother made no answer; in another moment he was gone, and I was left with a long hop tendril in my hand, and a face flushed with heat and agitation.

I thought my mother would speak, and advise me to run after my father, but she did not; and I went on with my work, conscious that her eyes were upon me.

Presently, to my great relief, gardener came up, and asked her some questions about the flower-beds. She went away with him, and I breathed more freely, comforting myself with the thought that I could easily buy the Testament another day.

I worked faster than ever, partly to drive away reproachful thoughts. The little bower was lovely, it was scarcely high enough for me to stand upright in, but it would be delightful I knew for us to sit under. Gardener had been mowing, and when I had brought a quantity of sun-dried grass, and spread it thickly over the floor, I thought my bower an eighth wonder of the world. My cousins came shortly, and confirmed me in this opinion; they spent a very happy afternoon, seated under it, and, but for remembering the Irish boy, I might have been happy also. We were very quiet till after tea, and then I am sorry to say that our high spirits quite carried us away; we got into mischief, and my share of it was throwing an apple into the greenhouse, and breaking two panes of glass. This was on a Saturday.

On Sunday no one mentioned either this or the Irish boy; but on Monday, just as I had finished my lessons, I saw my father pass the window, and ventured to ask mamma if he was going to the town, and whether I might walk with him.

"Why do you wish to go, Orris?" she inquired.

"To buy the Testament, mamma, for poor Tim."

"He is gone," said my mother; "he went away early this morning."

I put on my garden bonnet, and went out, with a curious sensation, as if, when I did wrong, all circumstances conspired to punish me. I turned the corner of the greenhouse, and there stood my father, looking at the broken panes.

"Orris," he said, "did you do this mischief?"

"Yes, papa."

"This is the third time it has happened. I have repeatedly forbidden you to play in this part of the garden."

"I am very sorry, papa."

"Your sorrow will not mend the glass, and I am afraid it will not make you more obedient another time."

He spoke so gravely that I knew he really was displeased. After a pause, he said:—

"Have you got any money?"

"I have a shilling, papa, and a penny."

"It will cost more than that to repair this damage; I shall be obliged to claim forfeit of the shilling."

I wiped away two or three tears, and produced my little silk bag, he turned it over, and bit his lips; perhaps its elaborate workmanship made him understand that a shilling was much more for me to give up than for him to receive.

"Is this all you have got?" he inquired.

"Excepting the penny, papa," I replied; and, child as I was, I perfectly understood his vexation at having to take it from me. He remained so long looking at it as it lay in his palm, that I even hoped he would return it, and say he would excuse me that once. But no, he was too wise; he put it at last into his waistcoat pocket, and walked away, saying:

"I hope this will make you more careful another time."

He went towards the house, and I watched him till he entered. Then I ran to my bower, sat down upon the dried grass, and began to cry as if my heart would break.

Repentance and regret, though they may be keenly felt by a child, are not reasoned on very distinctly. I had often been very sorry before, but whether for the fault, as distinct from the punishment, I had scarcely inquired. I was heartily sorry now, not only for my disobedience and because my father had forfeited the shilling, but because I saw it had vexed and hurt him to do it,—not only because I had preferred pleasure to duty, neglected the opportunity for doing good, and lost it,—but because the feeling, if not the words, of St. Paul pressed heavily upon my heart, "When I would do good, evil is present with me."

I was still crying, when on a sudden, looking up, I saw my father standing before me, and watching me with evident regret. My first impulse was to say,—"O, papa, I was not crying about the shilling."

He beckoned to me to rise out of my bower, and said, "Then what were you crying about, my little darling?"

I tried not to sob; he led me to a garden seat, and took me on his knee. Then, with a great many tears, I told him all that I have now, dear reader, been telling you, and ended with a passion of crying.

"O, papa, do teach me to be different, and to wish the same thing when I am tempted that I do when no pleasure tempts me. Pray teach me to do good."

"My dear child, God is teaching you now."

"What, papa! when my golden opportunity is gone, and my silver opportunity has come to nothing."

"Quite true; but then you are doubly sure now—you know by ample experience, do you not?—that of yourself you can do nothing."

I was so convinced of it, that I was verging on an opposite fault to self-confidence. I was almost doubting whether any assistance that I could hope to have would make me proof against temptation.

But now was my father's "golden opportunity," and he availed himself of it. Although I cannot remember his words, their influence remains to this day. Certain sensations and impressions connected with that wise and fatherly conversation return upon me often, even now. It conveyed to my mind the idea that this weakness itself was to be my strength, if it made me depend upon a stronger than myself —that this changeable disposition would make more precious to me the knowledge that "with God is no variableness, neither shadow of changing."

When he ceased to speak, I said with a sorrowful sigh, "And now, papa, there is only one penny left of all my opportunities?"

"Well, my darling," he replied, "it is possible that you may do acceptable good even with that. Remember what our Saviour said about the cup of cold water."

"Yes," I said, "but the person who gave the cold water had nothing better to give; he had not a cup of milk, or a cup of wine, which he first wasted and threw away."

"My dear, you need not inquire into that; you might have done better: but as there is still something to be done, 'Do it with thy might.'"

When I was quite calm again, and almost happy, he sent me into the house to play at ball. As I passed the kitchen door, a poor old woman whom my mother used sometimes to help turned from it, and I heard the housemaid say, "Mistress has just walked out, and I cannot say when she will be at home."

She was hobbling away when I bethought me of my penny; took it out of its bag, and pulling her by the cloak, offered it to her.

At first she did not seem to understand me, but when she saw my copper opportunity, which was as bright as sand-paper could render it, she gave me just the shadow of a smile, and taking it in her skinny hand, said, "I thank you kindly, my pretty."

"Poor old creature," said the housemaid, "that will buy her a trifle, mayhap; she and her husband are going into the workhouse to-morrow."

I passed into the house penniless, but in a subdued and humble state of mind. The lessons I had had were not without good effect; but it cannot be expected that I can remember much of the working of my mind. I only know that time did pass, that I went to bed, got up, said my lessons, and had my play for a long time, perhaps a fortnight. At the end of about that time my little sister, Sophy, and I went out one day for a long walk, with Matilda, our nurse, and took a little basket with us to put flowers in, and blackberries if we should be so fortunate as to find any.

We walked a long way, till Sophy was tired, and became clamorous to sit down; so Matilda led us to the entrance of a little wood, and there we sat and rested on the steps of a stile. There was a cottage near at hand: presently an old woman came out of it with a kettle in her hand, and I recognised her as the woman to whom I had given my penny. She hobbled to the edge of a little stream which flowed close to our seat, and dipped her kettle in, but did not notice us till Matilda called to her.

"How are you, Mrs. Grattan, and how's your old gentleman?"

"Thank you kindly, girl, we be pretty moderate," was the reply. "He"—and she pointed with a stick to a field opposite, where several men were at work—"He be among them, picking up stones—Ha! ha! he be as blithe as a boy!"

"We was all very glad up at the Grange, to hear of your good luck," said Matilda, in the loudest tones of her cheerful voice, for the old woman was rather deaf. "Our mistress was main glad, I'll assure you."

"Ah, very kind on you all. How be the old gentleman?"

"Quite hearty."

By this time she had reached us, set down her kettle, and taken her place beside Matilda. I was busily plaiting straw, but I listened carelessly to their conversation.

"And so you got your rent paid and all," said Matilda, turning her eager black eyes on the old woman. "What a good son Joe is to you."

"Ah, that he be, dear," was the reply; "that he be; wrote he did, so pretty, 'My dear mother,' he says, 'don't you go for to think I shall ever forget how good you was to me always—for I shall not,' he says——"

Matilda's eyes flashed and glistened: she took a particular interest in this young man, though I did not know that till long afterwards.

"Tell us how it all was," she said, quickly.

"Why you see, dear, he was not my own: but I did as well as I could by him; and he be as fond of me like, ay fonder, than he be of his father."

"Yes, I know," said Matilda.

"Well, dear—I went to Mr. T.'s house" (my father's) "and I was very down at heart—very, I was; for Mr. Ball, he'd been that morning, and says he, 'It signifies nothing that you've lived here so long,' he says—'if you can't pay the rent.' I says, 'Mr. Ball, will you please to consider these weeks and weeks that my poor old man has been laid up wi' rheumatize?' 'But,' he says, 'I can put in younger and stronger than him; and besides that,' he says, 'I know you owe money at the shop, over all you owe to my employer.'"

"He was always a hard man," said Matilda.

"Well dear, he says, 'It ain't no use my deceiving of you, Mrs. Grattan, but I must sell you up, for,' says he, 'the money I must have, and you must go into the workhouse; it's the best place by half for such as you;' and, dear, it seemed hard, for, I'll assure you, we hadn't a half-ounce of tea, nor a lump of coal in the house, for we was willing, my old man and me, to strive to the last to pay our owings, and we was living very hard."

"How much did you owe?" asked Matilda.

"Over three pounds, dear; and then the rent was four. I hadn't one halfpenny in the house; I paid the baker, Thursday was a week; t'other four was for the doctor, and we was hungry and cold, we was; but, the Lord be praised, we aint now."

"Ah! Joe's a good son."

"As good as ever breathed, dear; but we hadn't heard from him of a long while, by reason his regiment was up the country, but you'll understand I didn't know that till I got his letter. And so we was to be sold up, and go into the house. I fretted a deal, and then I thought I'd go and tell your missis: she be a good friend;—but deary me! I owed such a world o' money;—only, thinks I, she'll be main sorry to hear we must go; and a body likes somebody to be sorry."

"Ah, to be sure they do," said Matilda.

"But she was out, and so I got nothing—only this child, bless her! she runs up and gives me a penny; but, deary me! thinks I, what's a penny to them as owes £7, 2*s*.? But, thinks I, my old man and me, we won't cry together in the dark this last night. So I walked on to the town with it, to buy a half-penny candle of Mr. Sims, at the Post-office. I was half way there from my place, and when I got into the shop, 'Sit you down, Mrs. Grattan,' says he, for he saw I was main tired; 'I haven't seen you of a long time.'

"'And that's true, Mr. Sims,' says I, 'for it's little enough I have to lay out, and the shop t'other side of the turnpike be nigher.'

"Well, I sat me down; maybe a quarter of an hour after I'd bought my candle, and just as I was a going, in comes Mrs. Sims, and, says she, 'Is that Grattan's wife?'

"'Ay,' says he.

"'Well,' says she, 'I reckon you remembered to give her that letter.'

"'A good thing you spoke, my dear,' says he, 'I should have forgot it—that I should.'

"If you'll believe me, I trembled like a leaf, to think I should so near have missed it. 'Be it a letter from the Indies?' says I.

"'Ay,' says he, 'that it is, and nothing to pay on it; and it's marked "to be left at the post-office till called for."'

"Well, dear, I took it home, and waited for my old man to come home, by reason I can't read, and about dusk he comes in, and we lights the candle, and my old man he read it right out, for he's a fine scholar. And there was two five-pound notes inside, bless him; and, says he, 'Mother, I've got made sergeant, and now I shall send to you regular."

"Well, I've heard no better news this many a day!" said Matilda.

"It was good, dear. Well, I paid the doctor, and when Mr. Ball came next day, says I, 'There's the money, sir,' and he stared. 'Indeed,' he says. 'I am surprised, but them that pay can stay.' So you see, there's money to spend, more money, dear, when we be laid up with the rheumatize." Upon this she laughed with genuine joy, and, taking up her kettle, wished Matilda good afternoon, and hobbled away.

And I knew, though it had never occurred to the old woman, that all this happiness was owing to my penny! If she had not had it to spend, she would not have walked to the post-office; if she had not walked to the post-office, she would not have got her son's letter—that precious letter which had saved her from misery and the workhouse.

How happy I was as we walked home; I seemed to tread on air, and yet I knew of how little value the penny really was, it was only my having been permitted to give it under such peculiar circumstances that had made it such a worthy and important coin.

The lesson taught me by these little events I did not easily forget, and I think their moral is too obvious to need elaborately enforcing. It may, however, be summed up in few words.

First, Do not expect that in your own strength you can make use of even the best opportunity for doing good.

Second, Do not put off till another day any good which it is in the power of your hand to do at once.

And thirdly, Do not despond because your means of doing good appear trifling and insignificant, for though one soweth and another reapeth, yet it is God that giveth the increase; and who can tell whether He will not cause that which is sown to bear fruit an hundred-fold; who can tell whether to have even a penny to give under certain circumstances may be to have, not a Copper, but a Golden Opportunity!

POINTED WORDS HEARD AT KING'S CROSS.

[One Sunday forenoon, a middle-aged man stood in the open space before the carriage entrance to King's Cross railway station. He had a little Bible in his hand, and a crowd of about two hundred people round him. He preached from Acts xvii. 30: "And the times of this ignorance God winked at; but now commandeth all men every where to repent." And this is the substance of what he said, taken from the notes of one who happened to hear him.]

How kind it was of our blessed Saviour to send St. Paul to tell the Athenians how to escape from their state of sin and misery! The Apostle stood on the top of a hill, when he uttered the words which I have read, as I am standing here now to speak to you. Of course I do not presume to put myself on a level with that great servant of Christ, but I have the same message to you that he had to the Athenians. It is a message of love. It proceeds from the unfathomable mercy of that great God who created all of us, in whose hands our breath is, and whose are all our ways. It is the glad tidings of the salvation of lost sinners through Him who paid our debts with his blood, and opened up the way to God by his resurrection.

What was it the Apostle said to the Athenians? "The times of this ignorance God winked at; but now commandeth all men every where to repent." What cause for rejoicing it would have been to the Athenians had they understood those words and believed them! They and their fathers had been ignorant from time immemorial. From their childhood they had been sinning against God, drawing iniquity with cords of vanity and sin as it were with a cart rope. The day was not far distant when they would have to appear before God as their judge—when they would have to give an account of all their thoughts, words, and deeds to Him into whose hands it is a fearful thing to fall. But behold the compassion and grace of that merciful God. He knows that they will not be able to answer one out of a thousand questions. He knows that He must doom them to everlasting misery if they appear before his tribunal in their present condition. He knows that they are impotent to atone for even one of their countless transgressions. There is no hope for them, unless the mighty God himself comes to their rescue. But, He has come—He has provided a stream in which they may wash away their sins—He has offered to them a spotless robe to cover all their iniquities. Jesus came into this world to bear their penalty,—He, the Lamb of God, came to take away the sins of the world! And now in God's sight the past with all its darkness, ignorance, sins, and crimes, is buried in oblivion. Represented as it were in the person of his Apostle, He stands before them, his hand stretched out to them for reconciliation. "Come unto me," He cries, "and be saved. Turn away from your former paths and give yourselves up to Me. Let us be friends, for I love you. Be My children, and I will be your Father, and you will live and not die."

Well now, what is repentance? The word means, in the language in which the Apostle spoke, to change one's mind or heart. It does not mean merely a change in the outward conduct, but a complete alteration of the inner man. Suppose a drunkard, when he finds that his bad conduct brings him into disgrace and into the hands of the police, alters his way of life, and becomes of regular and respectable habits, but continues in his heart an enemy to God and a friend of worldly pleasures—people who do not know the heart, will say that that man has repented. They will call him a converted man. But God will not call him so. In the sight of God, who knows the heart, that man is still walking in the way of darkness and ignorance, because there is no true hatred of sin in him, because there is no love to God, no delight in divine and heavenly things. But suppose that, upon thinking over his past life, he becomes ashamed of it—sees that his whole course of conduct has been a disgrace, not only in the eyes of men, but of God; that not only his drunkenness and dishonest practices, but all his thoughts, words, and deeds have all his life long been bad and wicked;—suppose, on his realizing this, he becomes distressed, because he has so long and so recklessly dishonoured God his Creator, and ruined his own soul. In this state of alarm he locks himself up in his closet, and throws himself at the feet of Christ, who he believes has died for the sins of the world; and pours out his heart before that merciful Saviour. He tells that Saviour all about his past life, and says to Him that he regrets having been such a transgressor. He asks for mercy, and that all his sins may be blotted out by the blood of the Cross. He tells the Lord that he has resolved to begin a new life, and he entreats Him to give him the power of carrying that good resolution into practice. He gives up his heart to Jesus and rises from his knees as a friend, henceforth, of that mighty Saviour.

Now, though there are many among us who never return thanks to God for his benefits, but dishonour Him by their sinful lives, yet He continues every day to cause his sun to rise upon them, and to fill their mouths with the gifts of his hand. Truly, this is enough to show that He winketh at our sins, and that He does not punish us as we deserve. But oh, let us bear in mind that this cannot possibly continue for ever. There must be an end to it, for God is not a God to be mocked at, and if his goodness does not lead us to repentance, what else can we expect but a terrible doom at the approaching day of retribution?

Just look, my friends, at that wall over there covered with large bills. Do you see that one with the figure of an immense hat? It reminds me of a story which may illustrate my subject. In the days when princes were invested with unlimited sovereignty, and could dispose of a man's life according to their pleasure, there was a prince in Italy who was one of the most merciful that ever ruled a nation, but at the same time was a terrible punisher of wickedness when once he rose to do justice. Among his servants there was one who abused his goodness by numerous transgressions, not only against the rules of the palace, but also against the laws of the State. He was an oppressor of the poor, quarrelsome with his fellow-servants, and neglectful of his duties to his master. The prince had several timee kindly but seriously rebuked him, but as the servant found that punishment never followed, he became impudent and reckless. One day he allowed his passion so to get the better of him, that he caused a fellow-servant's death. He entreated his master's pardon, and the prince forgave him once more. This token of mercy, instead of softening his heart, made him more regardless still. He now thought that he could do anything, so one morning he ventured to appear before his master with his hat on. The prince, in a calm voice, asked him why he thus came covered into his presence. The answer was that he had caught a cold. His master's patience was now exhausted. "I will take care," said he, "that you never catch a cold again. Call the officer of the guard." The servant soon came back with that personage. "Take that man to prison," the prince said, "and order the executioner to nail his hat to his head." One of the prince's friends expressed his surprise at this severe sentence, since the servant had been pardoned for more serious crimes. The prince took a goblet, and having half filled it with water, requested his friend to put an apple into it. This made the water rise to the brim. The prince, thereupon, told his friend to drop in a coin. This made the water to run over. "How is it," the prince asked, "that the small coin caused the water to run over, whereas the large apple raised it only to the brim!"

My dear friends, the long-suffering of God is very great, as we may learn from the history of the Jewish nation, whose iniquities He bore with for centuries, "rising early and protesting, saying: Obey My voice." But there is a limit to that long-suffering, and when matters have risen to such a height as to cause the cup of God's patience to flow over, that same God, who is "slow to anger," proves a God of "great power," who "will not at all acquit the wicked." This also is shown by the history of the Jewish nation. They obeyed not, nor inclined their ear, but walked every one in the imagination of his evil heart, and therefore God gave them into the hands of their enemies, and scattered them abroad among the nations. And who can sum up the miseries to which that unhappy people have been subject since! Let us not suppose that God, because He winks at the times of our ignorance and rebellion, does not keep account of our transgressions. There is a fixed time, up to which He allows sinners to proceed, hoping that they will turn at his frequent warnings and urgent admonitions; but if they continue rebellious, and proceed beyond that limit, there is an end of patience, and justice steps in to do its awful work.

I beseech you, dear friends, let us not allow things to go so far as that. If our conscience tells us that we are walking in ways in which Jesus cannot walk with us, let us not suppose that those ways may, after all, end in peace, because they look so pleasant for the present. Let us not depend upon the testimony of our own deceitful hearts, for we are short-sighted beings, and when we walk in a way that leads through a paradise, we cannot see the fearful wilderness which is lying beyond. Let us rather depend upon the testimony of Him who sitteth upon the circle of the earth, whose eyes are in every place, and who knows as well what will follow as what is present. If it were possible that a life without Jesus could end in happiness, it might not be so necessary for us to repent. But it is absolutely necessary for our happiness to have Christ, and if we have Him not, every step we take is a step nearer to destruction. It is not merely better to be with Jesus than to be without Him, but to be without Him is death. And there is no true life but in Him. He is the ark, and out of it there is not one inch of ground which the deluge will not destroy.

My eye has just caught that hoarding over there. I see several persons reading the bills pasted on it, while one man is taking notes of the contents in his memorandum book. Now, what is the impression which those advertisements produce upon the minds of the readers? I am perfectly persuaded that they have not the slightest doubt as to the truth of all they read. They do not doubt for one moment but that they can get a hat for such and such a price at such and such a shop. They are quite assured that there is a fire and life insurance office in such and such a street, which was established fifty years ago, and has paid out so many thousand pounds. If one of those people resolve to insure his house, he will take an omnibus to-morrow morning and tell the conductor to put him down at the corner of that street, for he is perfectly sure that he will find the office there, though he never saw the place. Now, how is it that that man is so certain? There is but one answer possible to the question. He believes the bill. It contains a message to every man who reads it; and he places confidence in that message. He never saw the parties from whom that message comes; he does not even know their names; yet he puts his trust in their word; he is assured that they do not deceive him.

Now, dear friends, what else is the blessed Gospel of our Lord Jesus Christ but just such an advertisement? And if we, without the slightest hesitation, believe the message of mortal men whom we never heard of before, why do we not eagerly receive the message of God our Creator? And what else does He require of us, but just that we simply believe his word? Perhaps there are some amongst us who scruple to come to God, because they think their sins are too great. But is it not distinctly written that He winketh at the times of our ignorance? Why, then, should you not rely upon that assurance, and come "just as you are, without one plea?" Or perhaps there are some amongst us who say, "I am not sure this is a message for me. I do not find my name mentioned in it." There is a bill over there, on which, in colossal types, a public meeting is advertised, and which all are invited to attend. What would you think of a man who said, "I hesitate to go there, for I am not quite sure this invitation is for me; I do not see my name mentioned in it?" Is not the message of God a message to all men? And are you not a human being? Has God not ordered the message to be proclaimed every where? Well, then, it must be his will that it shall be proclaimed at this King's Cross, just at the moment when you are standing here, that you may hear it.

Perhaps if I were to ask you whether you believe the Gospel, you would all with one consent answer: "We do." And so it is. The Gospel tells us that sin is destructive, and we believe it. Only we allow ourselves to make one exception: "our sins are not destructive." And the Gospel tells us that Jesus is the only Saviour, and we believe it, but again with this exception, that we can save ourselves if needs be. Alas! my friends, this is the great evil that gnaws at the life of Christendom: we believe the Gospel in its general tendency, but not with special application to ourselves. Oh yes, when we look at society at large, at its sins, its worldly-mindedness, its wars and strifes, we exclaim: "Why doesn't the world repent! What must matters come to if they go on in this way!" But we seldom say: "I must repent. My way is wrong." And yet society at large will never turn until every individual turns, without heeding what society ought to do. Did you ever see the Volunteers drilled? Then you must often have observed how a whole rank which was walking in a certain direction would in a moment turn and walk in the opposite direction. Each man turned himself, not minding what his comrade did, and thus the whole row was turned.

I see a baker's shop at the opposite side of the road, and a public-house here on my left. Suppose a man comes up to the public-house with a shilling in his pocket. He has a wife and family, and they are nearly starving. Now undoubtedly he ought not to go in. He ought to turn his back upon the public-house and walk straight to the baker's. Suppose you tell him to do so, but he refuses, and goes to the bar, and comes out deprived of both his money and his wits. How could he act so foolishly? Did he not believe that you spoke the truth to him when you reminded him that he was ruining himself and his family? Yes, there was something within him which told him that you were perfectly right,—from previous sad experiences he well knew the misery which he was about to cause. Yet, notwithstanding all this, he went on recklessly. And how could he do so? Two causes led him to it, one sensuality and the other self-deception. Sensuality, which made him grasp present enjoyment at the expense of future misery. Self-deception, which made him hope that for some unknown reason the future misery might not happen, or at any rate might not be so very bad. In the same way do sinners go to the world to have a draught from its sweet but poisonous cup, while they despise the wholesome bread which is from heaven.

Do you see that funeral establishment over there? What a sad thing it is that there should be need for such places. Death has settled amongst us. We have called it to come to us, to dig our graves, and to make us weep. All this is the consequence of our ignorance, of our disobedience, of our rebellion. But behold, what a kind, gracious God is ours! "Repent," He says, "and it shall all be put right. Come to me and I will conquer death, and wipe the tears from your eyes." Now let us not shut our ears and hearts to that voice of love. Jesus loves you, though you may have been careless about Him hitherto. Do come to Him and you will find that there is no happier place than at the feet of that adorable Saviour.

NOTES FOR READERS OUT OF THE WAY.

The publication of the fourth Report of the Royal Commissioners on the Employment of Children in Trades and Manufactures has startled the country with another of those revelations of social slavery which are from time to time horrifying all kind-hearted and Christian people. When the Commission was appointed, it was known that in various branches of industry the evils prevailed which the Factory Act had put a stop to in the great manufactories; but the successive reports of the Commission have revealed a state of things infinitely worse than was formerly dreamt of. As new processes come into use, it would seem, there is sure to grow up under their shadow a horrible crop of cruelties, which the unhappy workers are too feeble to remedy, or even to make publicly known. In thoughtful minds, the fear increases that the development of our manufacturing system will prove more and more destructive to the working population, unless the legislature shall become far more vigilant, and employers far more considerate, not to say philanthropic. The Report in question deals chiefly with the metal manufactures, and a prominent place is given in it to the Sheffield grinders. It is known that their employment is about the most destructive of any to human life, the steel-dust entering their lungs, and usually proving fatal before the middle period of life. Yet it is found that it is common for children to enter on this employment as young as nine; most begin it before the age of ten; some as young as eight, or even seven. One of the Assistant Commissioners found a child engaged at it at the age of six. The ignorance of these young persons is at once ludicrous and deplorable. A boy of eight did not know who Jesus Christ was, or if He was a man; had never heard about Him. A polisher, aged 16, who could write a little, believed Glasgow to be a state where the Indians lived. Scotland was the abode of strange people, but Scotchmen came from Ireland. He did not know the Queen's name, but he believed it was Mary. The Commissioners recommend some of the clauses of the Factory Act to be extended to the Sheffield trades, and that the use of fans to protect workmen from the steel dust should be made compulsory. Among other recommendations of the Report are these, that Sunday work should be abolished in furnaces and rolling mills, and that females should not be allowed to be employed on pit-banks, nor in coke-hearths, nor in the manufacture of glass. At the Social Science Congress at Sheffield the unhealthy and cruel character of many of the Sheffield occupations was brought out in a paper by Dr. Hill, who showed that in that town the deaths are annually 2000 more than they would be if due precautions were taken for the protection of life.

A Church Congress has been held in the city of Norwich, similar to that held last year at Bristol, attended by clergymen and laymen of the Church of England. Though in the main a High Church gathering, it was attended by not a few representatives of the other sections of the English Church, some of whom took a pretty conspicuous part in its proceedings. The Congress was carried on by means of written papers and oral addresses and discussions on subjects partly affecting the Church of England, and partly relating to the community at large. Of the latter class of questions, we may specially notice the relations of Science and Scripture, and the subject of Preaching. The former of these was introduced by papers read by Dr. Pusey and Mr. Birks. Both papers strongly urged the duty of patient waiting for the solution of difficulties as yet unsolved, and rebuked the spirit that leaps to conclusions adverse to the Scriptures. In the course of the discussion that followed, the Earl of Harrowby mentioned an interesting circumstance in connection with the late Lord Lyndhurst. Calling on him a few months before his death, he found him sitting in his chair in extreme feebleness, with many books on his table before him. He said he had been reading many things on the Old Testament, and that he could not meet many of the difficulties that he encountered: all he could say was that his Saviour had said, he who would not believe Moses and the Prophets would not be persuaded though one rose from the dead. That was enough for him, and having that, he did not need to trouble himself with those discussions. The first paper, on "Preaching and its Adaptation to the Present Times," was read by Dr. Alford, who commented on the utter want of care taken to train ministers as preachers. He urged the modification of the formality that usually marks written sermons; great attention to the beginning and the conclusion; an average length not exceeding thirty minutes; and simplicity without childishness. Sermons addressed to children he had no faith in. Above all, unreality should be guarded against—sermons should express real feelings, and deal with the realities of life. He urged preachers to be simple and earnest in proclaiming their blessed Lord and Master, and to maintain that childlike faith, and that steady earnest church life that would not preclude the unbeliever from obtaining access to them, or show him that he met with no sympathy. The Rev. Daniel Moore, Rev. Edward Bickersteth, Rev. J. C. Ryle, the Dean of Ely, and others addressed the Conference on the same subject. Mr. Ryle dwelt on the special case of country congregations, mostly uneducated, the difficulty of preaching to whom was extreme. One of the most difficult positions possible to conceive was that of a clergyman who stood up in a pulpit of a country church on a summer afternoon, when the people were warm, and then endeavoured to keep them awake. He was strongly opposed to the notion that uneducated preachers were most adapted to uneducated people. The Gospel of Jesus Christ was not effete, and had lost none of its power; to strain after novelty of doctrine was not the way to get a real hold on the people.

The Nineteenth Conference of the Evangelical Alliance has been held at Hull. Among those who took an active share in its business may be mentioned the Hon. J. W. Van Loon, of Amsterdam, Supreme Judge of Holland; Rev. Dr. Bliss, of the United States, President of the Protestant College at Beyrout; Pasteur Revel, President of the Waldensian College, Florence; Pasteur Casalis, of Paris, and Pastor Beskow, of Stockholm. Some interesting information was communicated regarding the progress of the Gospel in Continental countries. M. Revel remarked that Italy formed at present one of the most favourable fields in the world for Evangelistic labours. At Brescia, for example, on the very borders of Austria, the ground had been broken by a colporteur, three years ago, selling a number of Bibles, and now there were sixty-five communicants. At Florence they were printing an edition of the "Pilgrim's Progress" of 10,000 copies, and other books of religious instruction. Pastor Beskow, of Stockholm, observed that a great revival was going on in Sweden, which might be said to have begun almost with the century. For himself, he had to preach every day. At first the people had been forbidden to hold prayer meetings, but they would not give them up, and by-and-by the restriction was removed. The Hon. J. W. Van Loon gave a somewhat dark account of the state of religion in Holland, but expressed the hope that the Alliance, by holding its next annual conference at Amsterdam, would help to promote the spiritual good of the country. Dr. Bliss, in speaking of the religious condition of Syria, referred to the importance of the recent translation of the Bible into Arabic, and to the purpose of the college with which he was connected, which was to train native ministers for the East. Among the most prominent of the miscellaneous papers read was one by the Rev. Dr. M'Cosh, Professor in Queen's College, Belfast, on the characteristics of the Broad Church and the Narrow Church in all denominations.

Some laymen of mark in England have been giving expression to their sentiments on the subject of missions to the heathen. Mr. J. D. Coleridge, M.P., in addressing a meeting at Exeter in connection with the Societies for Propagating Christian Knowledge and Propagating the Gospel in Foreign Parts, strongly urged the necessity of union on the great foundations of Christianity. "We live in a time when the very foundations of Christianity are assailed, not by open enemies but by men calling themselves, and from their hearts believing themselves, to be true Christians—men of genius and of learning, and men of chastened tempers and self-denying lives, men justly and greatly honoured and beloved, and against whom I should be ashamed to say a word except this—that if it be true that we and they differ about the foundation of Christianity, their genius and their virtue, their abilities and the loftiness and purity of their character make them all the more powerful and formidable opponents. That we are so at issue, is my very intimate conviction: and how are these men to be met? Not by personal abuse; not, forgive me for saying so, by public condemnation; not by imputation of bad motives, and not by any of the ordinary and more allowable arts of polemical controversy; but they are to be met by clearly, strongly, and perpetually teaching those simple matters of fact in the New Testament upon which all people profess to be agreed, and which, at least directly and in terms, have never yet been openly assailed." We presume that Mr. Coleridge means, not that the refutation of fundamental error is never to be resorted to, but that the inculcation of truth should be more relied on for the removal of unbelief and the production of faith. The Attorney-General, Sir Roundell Palmer, whose "Book of Praise" is so widely known and so much esteemed, addressed a meeting on Missions, at Atwick, near Hornsea, in Yorkshire, some evenings ago. His testimony to the connection of Christianity and civilisation was strong and emphatic. "What," he asked, "should we be this moment, if we were to depart from the Gospel of Christ? Why, we should be savages of a worse kind, savages armed with the knowledge which devils may possess, but without any of those gifts and graces which alone give value to empire, to power, to wealth, to arts, to civilisation, to anything which we have. Am I without authority, without evidence in saying so? Whether we look to ancient times or modern times, that proposition can be clearly proved. That which gives value to all the civilisation on which we pride ourselves, to all the wealth which we possess, to all our commerce, to all our arts, to all our power, is our Christianity alone. I say the proof is not difficult. Those who have read the account of the Christians and Romans at the beginning of St. Paul's Epistle to the Romans, will be able to understand that, in ancient times at all events, it was as I say; but it is so now also; for if we look abroad there are other civilised nations, not perhaps equal to us, not by any means so far beyond us as some suppose, without the Gospel. The Chinese are a civilised nation, the Hindoos are a civilised nation, the Mohammedans of Asia are a civilised people; but the horrible atrocities which prevail amongst them, the disregard of life, the want of natural affection, the abominable vices and crimes which prevail, are such that everyone must feel that civilisation on those terms is no gift of value to man. It wants the salt with which alone it can have savour." No less emphatic was Sir Roundell's testimony to Christianity as the only true basis of social prosperity—a position to which able writers of a certain class are now offering vigorous opposition: "If we desire to do good to mankind, it is not only our duty to endeavour to do it in this way, by extending the knowledge of the Gospel, but there is no other way in which it can possibly be done."

The year 1866 has long been looked forward to by interpreters of prophecy as one that would mark an important epoch in the downfall of the Papacy. When the Emperor of the French fixed on that year as the time when he would withdraw his troops from Rome, the expectation that some decisive change would take place then was greatly quickened. It appears, however, that the Pope and his advisers are bent on signalizing the year in a different manner. The 29th June, 1866, according to tradition, will be the 1800th anniversary of the martyrdom of St. Peter, and the Pope, it is rumoured, will celebrate the event by convoking all the catholic bishops of the church at Rome. It is plain that there is no lack of courage of a kind in the proceedings of the Vatican, for in addition to the Encyclical that lately astonished the world, denouncing all progress and innovations in church and state, an allocution has just been delivered which is levelled at Freemason brotherhoods and all secret societies. No one can tell what the next eighteen months will bring round in the history of Italy and the Papacy. It is, however, gratifying to find both that the civil government of the country gets more consolidated, and that streaks of evangelical light are shooting here and there over the firmament.

Among recent illustrations of the parable of the mustard-seed, the history of a Protestant mission in the island of Elba is one of the most remarkable. Some ten years ago, a vessel from that island entered the harbour of Nice. The captain, Cignoni, a respectable man and a zealous Roman Catholic, happened to be accosted one day on the quay by the well-known Francesco Madiai (whose persecution in Tuscany some years ago created so much interest), and asked to buy a Bible. As Cignoni did not know what that was, he naturally hesitated, but being told it was the Word of God, he bought it, and taking it home, showed it to a humble acquaintance, a mason named Quattrini. At first but little interest was felt in it, but as Quattrini proceeded, he became more in earnest; prayed for light from Heaven, and at last came to see and embrace the truth, without any human instrumentality. Meanwhile, Cignoni and his brother, in their voyages to Nice, became acquainted with Madiai, attended his religious meetings, and became like-minded with him; so that when at home, they and Quattrini and a few friends held similar meetings to read the Word of God. For some time this went on in secret, the Bible being concealed sometimes in a pit in Quattrini's garden, and sometimes in a hole made by him in the wall of his house. By-and-by, the Elba converts avowed their change of religion, and by the announcement created great consternation among their friends and the public. Still they held on; and in 1862, at their earnest request, an Evangelist was sent to hold meetings in the island. At Rio Marina, where the converts reside, he was received with great joy. The room where his meetings were held became crowded; and through the contributions of the people, which amounted to a considerable sum, and the aid of Christian friends, a neat church, capable of containing 250 people, was erected. There are now three stations where worship is held, and out of a population of 12,000, 500 are believed to have received the truth.

In the annals of missionary operations, an interesting event has occurred at Aberdeen, in the launch of a missionary ship, a beautiful new clipper barque, named the "John Williams," having been launched for the London Missionary Society. The ship has been built by subscriptions raised in the Sunday schools throughout the kingdom, and is intended to replace a vessel bearing the same name that was recently lost. An immense number of children and a vast miscellaneous assembly were present at the launch.

The presence of Queen Emma of Hawaii in England at the present time lends additional interest to a group of islands in which Christianity has achieved one of its greatest triumphs. This result has been accomplished mainly by the instrumentality of the American missionaries. A few years ago, Mr. Richard H. Dana, a distinguished lawyer, and member of the Episcopal Church in Boston, U.S., visited the islands; more recently he has published an account of his impressions. He bears the highest testimony, both to the character of the missionaries, and to the fruits of their labours. "It is no small thing to say of the American Board, that in less than forty years they have taught this whole people to read and write, to cipher, and to sew. They have given them an alphabet, grammar, and dictionary; preserved their language from extinction, given it a literature, and translated into it the Bible and works of devotion, science, and entertainment, &c., &c. They have established schools, reared up native teachers, and so pressed their work that now the proportion of inhabitants who can read and write is greater than in New England; and whereas they found these islanders a nation of half-naked savages, living in the surf and on the sand, eating raw fish, fighting among themselves, tyrannised over by feudal chiefs, and abandoned to sensuality, they now see them decently clothed, recognising the law of marriage, knowing something of accounts, going to school and public worship with more regularity than the people do at home, and the more elevated of them taking part in conducting the affairs of the constitutional monarchy under which they live, holding seats on the judicial bench and in the legislative chambers, and filling posts in the local magistracies."

A treaty has been completed and ratified between Great Britain and Madagascar, regarding which Mr. Ellis writes:—"It contains more in favour of the Christians than I expected," Lord Russell having taken care to introduce explicit provisions securing civil and religious freedom both to the missionaries and the native Christians. Mr. Ellis being on his way home, will bring explicit accounts of the progress and prospects of Christianity. Meanwhile, a missionary writes, that "although some members of the government may not be favourable to foreigners or to their religion, yet Christianity is spreading far and wide, and the seed scattered in the days of persecution is still springing up and bearing fruit in places where one would least of all have expected it. The government know that they cannot extirpate Christianity; that it has become a power which no force or ingenuity can destroy."

From China fresh accounts arrive of the progress of the mission at Amoy. In six months thirty-three members have been added to the church of the London Missionary Society, making a total in that city of 413 native Christians, there being also about the same number in connection with the English Presbyterian Mission. Some interesting facts are mentioned, showing the self-denying fidelity of some of the converts. A man of forty-six, who gained his living by selling gilt paper, used in idolatrous services, becoming a Christian, made up his mind, after much opposition by his relations, to abandon that business entirely and follow the Lord fully. Another convert publicly burned the implements by which he had made his living, as a maker of gambling cards.

Turning to the field of literature, an official announcement has appeared that the elaborate commentary on the Bible, commonly called "The Speaker's Commentary," is in steady progress. It was suggested by the Speaker of the House of Commons, and the work has been parcelled out among the most learned divines of the Church of England, who are now hard at work with their respective tasks.

The editorship of the British Quarterly Review, which since its commencement, more than twenty years ago, has been in the hands of the Rev. Dr. Robert Vaughan, has been resigned by that distinguished gentleman, who says that a man of seventy must not expect to be what he was at fifty. It has been throughout the chief literary organ of the Congregationalist body, though it has not confined itself to the advocacy of their predominant views Its literary character has always stood high, and its articles have been generally good, though hardly brilliant, and uniformly on the side of revealed truth. It is hereafter to be conducted by the Rev. H. Allon, of Union Chapel, and the Rev. H. R. Reynolds, Principal of Cheshunt College.

Of the theological works that have recently appeared, one of the most considerable, and certainly one of the most interesting and instructive, is "The Collected Writings of Edward Irving," in five large volumes. It is edited by his nephew, the Rev. G. Carlyle, and consists to a considerable extent of hitherto unpublished materials. A supplementary volume is promised, to include the best of his writings on prophecy. Mr. Irving's case is an instance of the benefit that sometimes arises from delaying for a generation the publication of a biography. The Life, by Mrs. Oliphant, has kindled the interest of the present generation in the remarkable preacher, and made thoughtful and Christian readers turn with avidity to his writings. In many respects these writings are more adapted to the present generation than to the last. Tendencies which were but in the germ when he lived, but against which he launched many a bolt of rebuke, are now in full blow, and the fearless exposure of their godless character and unprofitable results, which he made so eloquently, would be most useful to many at the present day. No man had ever a deeper dread of that tendency to the idolatry of the human—to enthrone man's will, intellect, imagination, interests, and passions, which asserts itself so strongly at the present day. No man ever showed more fearless boldness, more impassioned courage, in claiming for the one living and true God, the God of the Bible as well as of Nature, the honour and glory due to Him alone. The prophet-like character of the preacher; his identification of himself with his Master; his speaking like one having authority,—while no doubt it leads him often into affectation, and sometimes into presumption, gives, nevertheless, a noble and most refreshing tone to his eloquence, that contrasts finely with the timidity and feebleness of much modern religious teaching. It is almost needless to refer to the faults and errors of Irving, or to the strange opinions he held on some points of doctrine, and the wild speculations on Prophecy into which he was ultimately led. The sensible reader will not regard him as an authority either on the human nature or on the atonement of Christ. But Irving is an author who can well afford an abatement to be made from the value of his writings, without any fear of their being rendered valueless. To those readers to whom five or six large volumes are too formidable to read, or too expensive to buy, as well as to those who possess the whole, the publisher has done a favour by issuing a volume of "Miscellanies," consisting of some of the most valuable and characteristic pieces selected from his writings—ethical, social, doctrinal, practical, historical and prophetical, missionary, biblical, and critical. Similar in form to the well-known Selections from the writings of Ruskin, and those of Carlyle, this volume will be eagerly welcomed by many who will be pleased to find together so many of Irving's choicest gems.

NOTE.—We have to explain to our readers that circumstances have induced Dr. Hanna to substitute a series of papers on the Life of Our Lord for his Journal of a Tour through Palestine, advertised to commence in the present Part.—EDITOR.

"NO ROOM IN THE INN."

A CHRISTMAS ADDRESS.

THOUGH you know the Christmas story by heart, and hear it read again and again every year, yet it never ceases to strike you. No wonder; for it is not a second-hand tradition, under which your hearts can continue cold, or even begin to doubt. How inexhaustibly rich is it in matter for consolation, for instruction, for raising the spirit heavenward! How full of significance are all the features of the unparalleled picture! But let us, for the present, limit our attention to the last of these features. Mary lays her first-born Son, wrapped in swaddling-clothes, in a manger. This word is alone sufficient to tell us that that "holy thing which was born of her, and which was to be called the Son of God," saw the first rays of light in a stable. And why in a stable? "Because," the Evangelist writes, "there was no room for them in the inn."

"Because there was no room for them in the inn!" Not for them, and consequently not for Christ, whom this woman carried under her heart. Here we stop. The Evangelist does not comment. Nor is comment necessary. The fact speaks for itself, and leads us to feel much, and to think more.

No room for them in the inn! Poor deplorable inn! What an honour it denies itself! What a blessing it sends past its door! It does this in ignorance, but not without guilt. The person who locked his door upon Mary and Joseph under the cover of such words as these:—"Good folks, there is no room for you here, nor anywhere else, I think, for every inch is occupied in these busy days of the taxing. I would advise you to try and get under any roof. Perhaps you may be able to find an empty stable or pen somewhere:"—that man certainly knew not what he was doing, nor who they were whom he was refusing. But he must, at all events, have noticed Joseph's honest face, and observed the condition in which Mary was. And they undoubtedly told him how long a way they had come, and how they, too, came to be taxed, because they were of the house and lineage of David. All the same! "No room here," was the answer.

Alas! we know all about it. A numerous company of travellers, who come with a large suite and much luggage, often find room where the simple pedestrian who carried his own knapsack was told, hours before, that the house was quite full. And full as the inn at Bethlehem was, yet, with a little exercise of kind feeling, a corner might doubtless have been found for this humble couple from Galilee, especially for a woman in Mary's condition. But this kind feeling seems to have been lacking, so that if there were persons who might have found accommodation, or for whom room might have been made, this much is certain, that Joseph and Mary were not of the number. "For them," St. Luke says, "there was no room." An Apostolic pen writes: "Be not forgetful to entertain strangers, for thereby some have entertained angels unawares." We add: "And by being forgetful, others have sent away the mother of the Lord, and with her the Lord himself."

What must not Mary's heart have felt when she, the "mother of the Lord," found the inn of the city of David shut upon her! Before this it must have been as if the salutation of the angel was still sounding in her ears: "Hail, thou that art highly favoured, the Lord is with thee: blessed art thou among women;" or the exultation of her cousin Elisabeth: "Blessed art thou among women, and blessed is the fruit of thy womb. And whence is this to me, that the mother of my Lord should come to me? . . . And blessed is she that believed: for there shall be a performance of those things which were told her from the Lord." Those words had strengthened her faith; and faith, thus strengthened, had found power and utterance for praising God: "My soul doth magnify the Lord, and my spirit hath rejoiced in God my Saviour. For he hath regarded the low estate of his handmaiden: for, behold, from henceforth all generations shall call me blessed. For he that is mighty hath done to me great things; and holy is his name." Nor had she failed to experience that He continued doing great things for her. That which it was not in her power to tell to her beloved Joseph, the Lord himself had made known to him by sending an angel in his dream; and the man who "had been minded to put her away privily," now doubled his tenderness and care for her, not knowing what to do to make up, through love and reverence, for the innocent suspicion with which he had saddened her heart. The decree of Cæsar (God's way with her) had, in this her last month, called her to Bethlehem; to Bethlehem, that city which she of all the daughters of Israel, was the last to think of without being reminded of that word, "Thou Bethlehem Ephratah, though thou be little among the thousands of Judah, yet out of thee shall come forth unto me that is to be ruler in Israel, whose goings forth have been from old from everlasting." Far away in the south of Judah lay that city of David which was called Bethlehem. A long way it was from Nazareth in Galilee; a hard journey, across hills and valleys, for a woman in her state. But the Lord, to whom she had lifted up her eyes for help, had been her guide, "her keeper, her shade upon her right hand." "The sun had not smitten her by day, nor the moon by night," and with her Joseph she had reached the old royal city, their "own city," in safety. It is true, though it was their own city, yet they were perfect strangers in it; they had there neither a relative nor a friend, and they entirely lacked both the required outward appearance and the necessary recommendation to secure for themselves a good reception. But whenever, during their journey, anxiety rose in their minds, no doubt they said to one another in a voice of firm confidence, "The Lord will provide. In the mountain of the Lord it shall be seen!" But now—no provision was made. This, indeed, looked different from what Mary had described in her doxology, "He hath filled the hungry with good things; and the rich he hath sent empty away." Here the rich carried everything before them, while the needy one, though carrying the Salvation of the world under her heart, had to look on.

Such are the tests to which God puts the faith of his saints. But if those saints are Marys and Josephs, they neither complain nor marvel. In their humble-mindedness nothing can offend them. One moment they may receive a shock, and feel at a loss; in the next they take even the refusal of man as from the Lord. Very well, let the door of the inn remain closed against them; it will be all right with them when they are landed in the stable. They are sure to witness there as well as in the best inn, nay even more so, the realisation of that promise, "The Lord will provide. In the mountain of the Lord it shall be seen."

So it is. The words, "No room for you in the inn," remain to the account of the churlish unmercifulness which pronounced them, while to faith they are a cause of trial. But it is not long before the pious Galileans discover in all this a wise, holy, kind dealing of their Divine Guide. Here in this stable it is so quiet and peaceful; here they are alone with their God. No indiscreet eye spies them, and yet their discreet want finds what it desires. How happy do they deem themselves in this seclusion, when, soon after their arrival, the painful hour comes upon Mary, and the holy moment is there in which she is permitted to press "that Holy Thing which is born of her" to her bosom, to wrap it in swaddling-clothes, to lay it in the manger, prepared by her husband, with gratitude and veneration. And when by-and-by their solitude is broken and the low door is opened to let the shepherds in, whose honest, pious faces still reflect the heavenly glory which they beheld in the fields of Bethlehem; and when thereupon, with words never to be forgotten, they tell the words which were spoken to them, and the doxology which they heard from the lips of angels, surely this was not a scene for an inn! this was not a sight for profane eyes! Merely accidental, uncalled-for witnesses, would here have been in the wrong place. The Holy One of Israel hid this scene from the proud, and from the light-minded. The God of the humble and the quiet had destined it for his elect, and therefore brought them together in this quiet place, in this humble stable, and "shut them in."

Thus He makes everything work together for good, and in the end causes his Wisdom to be justified of her children. Thus He keeps back that which is apparently good, to give that which is really better instead. Thus the unmercifulness of men may be the means of leading his people to the experience of his most special love and care. As under the hospitable roof of cousin Elisabeth, so in the quiet corner of this dark stable, which is far better than any inn, the joyful anthem continues to rise: "My soul doth magnify the Lord, and my spirit hath rejoiced in God my Saviour."

In another respect still the wise love of God, as manifested in this dealing of his with Joseph and Mary, comes to light. Truly it would not have been good for them, nor would it have been proper, if such a tone as Elisabeth raised when exclaiming, "Whence is this to me, that the mother of my Lord should come to me?" had been protracted too long. That tone must give place to another. "No room for you in the inn," that was a more appropriate introduction to what now and henceforth was to be expected. Will it not be within a few weeks: "No room for this babe in Bethlehem. No safety in the whole land of Israel?" Oh, how rich in significance, how strikingly characteristic is this saying: "No room in the inn," for the history at the commencement of which it stands; for the whole history of the life, the sufferings, and the privations of the Prophet "without honour in his own country, without credit amongst his own kin;" of the Son of Man "who had not where to lay his head;" of the incarnate Word, who "came unto his own, but his own received him not;" of the Saviour of the world, who was not welcome to the world, whom Judea left to Galilee, whom Israel left to the heathen; whom the rich made over to the poor, the wise to the ignorant, the righteous to the publicans, the many to the few—just as the inn made Him over to the stable; but who takes that stable as his place, to fill with his presence and blessing, and make it resound with the hallelujahs of men and angels;—nay, who makes that obscure spot the starting-point of such wonderful works as only humble, suffering, self-denying love can perform, and of victories such as only that love can command.

If it is true that this was the first experience of Joseph and Mary, of the "highly favoured and blessed among women," who carried the Holy Thing of God under her heart, and that this experience was, as it were, symbolic and prophetic of what for his sake was in store for them; if it is true that refusal, repulse, dismission, were the peculiar lot and share of Him, who never announced Himself save to bring blessing and honour, then do not marvel, O you who are his disciples and followers, that yours is often the same experience. You know the words which He, stretching forth his hand toward his disciples, pronounced: "Behold my mother and my brethren; for whosoever shall do the will of my Father which is in heaven, the same is my brother and sister and mother." But closely akin to Him as you are, yet as He could not spare those painful experiences to his mother after the flesh, so neither can He spare them to you. As long as the world is the world, and wherever it is emphatically so, these experiences will be yours. If ye were of the world, the world would in you love its own; but now ye are not of the world, as your Saviour was not of the world, therefore the world refuses you as it refused Him. You are highly favoured of God; you follow your calling; you do your duty; you give to Cæsar the things which are Cæsar's, and to God the things which are God's; moreover, you carry a blessing with you which you desire to communicate, to pour out and to spread, and which nobody can do without: but you lack worldly recommendations, and cannot divest yourselves of that "unacceptable and alarming something" which characterises you in the eye of the world as it characterised the pedestrians of Galilee, especially the daughter of David, in the eye of the Bethlehem innkeeper, whose first thought was: "No room for you." Let the world alone. Pity the inns—I mean the circles, the families, the hearts in which there is no room for Jesus Christ, the Saviour of the world, the Redeemer of the soul! Alas! there are many such hearts, and manifold are the things that fill them. Here it is the care of the world, there the pride of life. With some it is their much learning; with some their great vanity; with some their numerous occupations—that unmanageable, indescribable thing which is called "business." Do pity them. Poor people they are, indeed. May they not be poor for ever! Do pray God that in due time, in his way, He may make room where there is no room as yet. But do not pity yourselves if you should try in vain to get their doors opened to Jesus. Depart with humility; depart in love; depart in faith. Be content where the Saviour is content, in a quiet humble corner, with the little ones in Israel, for whom, if it please God, even the stars in their courses will fight (Judges v. 20) to introduce a host of unexpected worshippers of Him for whom this world has no room.

But is it only hints and encouragements of this kind which I, as a servant of the Lord, have to administer while addressing a festival meeting from a Christmas text? Or is it not my duty also, with all the seriousness which love inspires, to put the question in the midst of this assembly:—How is it with you, my hearers, my fellow-professors of Christ, who with me celebrate this festival? Have you truly taken into your heart, into your house, into your life, Jesus Christ, the Saviour of the world, refused by so many? Have you let Him in with his Word and Spirit, with all his blessings, with all his virtues, as your Saviour, as your Regenerator, as your King and Lord, whom you thank, whom you serve? Have you Him, and do you keep hold of Him, with the hands and arms of faith and love? Have you made room for Him by removing everything that cannot be under the same roof with Him, and are you still, with a love which every day grows more attentive, occupied in removing one thing, and another, and another which you apprehend to be offensive and displeasing to Him? Or is the unhappy heart of any one of you still like the inn—the inn for all that comes and goes—where, one after another, all the lusts, all the cares, all the vanities, all the concerns, and all the hallucinations of the world put up, but where Jesus knocks in vain, and where there is "no room" for anything that comes from Him? Oh, poor, deplorable heart! How great is thy loss! This Jesus would bring rest where now there is nothing but restlessness; quietness and order where now there is so much ado! O, believe me, where the door is opened to Him, where He comes in and stays, there is "none other but the house of God, and the gate of Heaven." If then at this festival He "stands at the door and knocks," if his servant knocks to secure room for Him, I beseech you, open the door unto Him!

The relations which the souls of the children of man occupy with regard to the Saviour are various and manifold; and there are thousand gradations between a full acceptance and an absolute refusal. Oh, certainly, all those workings and movements of the heart towards the Saviour which evince a want of Him, which show that a voice within whispers, You cannot do without Him, though you will not yet go with Him—all these ought to be appreciated, for they may be highly blessed. Nay, I will not even despise the phenomenon by which persons who all the year round do not care for a Christian church or a Christian sermon, come to our public assemblies on Christmas-day, as if afraid to allow themselves to become complete strangers to Christ; as if the manger of the Saviour of the world contained something which they cannot help hearing say to them, "Do not leave me altogether out of sight! I am needful to you!" But, my friends, let no one deceive himself by taking these more or less important evidences of inward strife and struggle for evidences of true Christian life. Not until you live with and for Christ, and feel that you live through Him, is that life yours. That life cannot manifest itself save where "Christ dwells in your heart, and you are rooted and grounded in love; so that you are able to comprehend with all saints what is the breadth and length, and depth and height, and to know the love of Christ, which passeth knowledge, that ye may be filled with all the fulness of God."

May "He that is able to do exceeding abundantly, above all that we ask or think, according to the power that worketh in us," bring all of us to this fulness in Christ through his power! And "unto Him be glory in the Church by Christ Jesus, throughout all ages, world without end!"

A SABBATH IN ELBERFELD.

THERE are two methods, by no means incompatible with each other, of depicting a country, a people, or an age. You may give a comprehensive sketch of the whole, statistical, historical, geographical ; or you may photograph small sections on such a scale that the observer may be able to detect the minutest features of the landscape. Both are best ; and the most successful of recent historians, such as Macaulay and Froude, have woven their beautiful fabrics by throwing in alternate threads of comprehensive generalisation and of particular detail.

It is on the latter of these two lines that the subjoined sketches proceed. In this department the limited knowledge of the observer is scarcely a disqualification. If he has an eye, and keeps it open, it is not necessary that he should have at his finger ends all the facts and dates of a nation's history. Specimens from which you can learn the forms of foreign life may be successfully gathered by one who is himself only a learner. Moreover, first impressions possess an independent interest and value of their own, without respect to their absolute correctness. But enough by way of preface to warn the reader that he must not expect to find here a slice from the Encyclopædia, containing everything connected with the subject. The only value which the picture possesses is, that it is taken on the spot from first hand, lovingly studied, and truly rendered.

I shall introduce freely certain honoured names ; for, on the one hand, I shall have no occasion to say anything but good regarding them, and, on the other, what I shall say is strictly, severely true. I cannot do anything in novels. It is not my line. A painter may either copy a landscape as it lies in nature, or compose one that never existed ; and, for aught I know, there may be a place for imagination in sketches drawn with a dogmatic or practical aim ; but I am not acquainted with it. On the question whether the imaginary in this department can anywhere be good, I do not presume to pronounce an opinion ; but I entertain a decided conviction that everywhere a true narrative of fact is better.

On Friday, 20th September, 1860, I left Nurnberg, in the kingdom of Bavaria, travelling all alone, taking a ticket, in the first instance, for Bamberg, with the intention of making up my mind on the way at leisure, as to where I should go next ; for, truth to tell, a part of the deliciousness of solitary travel consists in the abandon regarding routes and places and times, which becomes possible when you have nobody's convenience to consult but your own. As I gazed somewhat listlessly over my outspread railway map, while the train was sailing along the dull plain in which the learned but sleepy Erlangen lies, my eye fell on the name of Elberfeld. This suggested a thought, and supplied an object. As the week was drawing to a close I had begun to cast about for the means of turning to some profitable account the only remaining Sabbath of my furlough. Elberfeld was associated in my mind with the earlier ministry of Krummacher, with sustained evangelical and missionary work, and with manifestations of revived spiritual life in more recent years. Thither, therefore, on the instant, I determined to direct my course, so as to arrive at my destination on Saturday evening. By an early start from Mainz, on Saturday morning, I could reach Cologne at four o'clock in the afternoon, without the necessity of taking the railway. Down the regal Rhine accordingly I went by steamer, enjoying its varied beauty and grandeur, as much as though I had never witnessed them before.

At Cologne, in company with two friends, Dr. and Mrs. Denham of Derry, whom I had met in the Rhine boat, I stepped into an open cab, in order to go and deposit my effects at once at the railway terminus. After we were seated and about to start, a gentleman, dressed in black, with a white cravat, made a signal to the driver and stepped into the empty seat. This did not take me by surprsse ; for I had observed a similar practice elsewhere on Prussian territory. A traveller sees a cab about to start, or meets one on the way, with not more than three passengers. Forthwith he hails the driver, and, without consulting the persons who have prior possession, jumps in beside them. Arrived at their common destination, the interloper pays his share of the hire and goes about his own business. The practice seems to afford scope for the kindly feelings of the people, and it certainly saves money and horseflesh. I suspect it could not be transplanted into this country. The climate is probably too cold for it.

I immediately entered into conversation with the stranger. In a few moments, and by a few questions, we reciprocally elicited from each other the information that he was a merchant and I a minister —albeit that, as regarded dress at that moment, he looked the Pfarrer and I the Kaufmann ; that his home was in Elberfeld, and mine in Scotland ; that we had both at the same time, about a fortnight before, attended the meetings of the Evangelical Alliance in Geneva, and were both making our way, leisurely and by somewhat circuitous routes, back to our homes. We were strangers no longer. Henceforward we were brothers. The card of Herr Karl Klein of Barmen was in my hand, with a cordial invitation to visit him at his house on the morrow.

Here is a phenomenon that deserves and will repay some careful study. We were diverse in profession, pursuit, fatherland, and language ; in almost everything we were diverse ; but there was one thing common, and that one thing dominated. We had One Lord, One Master, one hope. Christ became the bond of union between Christians. I am persuaded that this link binds hearts more firmly together than either the world or the Church is aware of. The examples of strife between Christians seem to bulk more largely and make more impression than cases of an opposite character. But as there were seven thousand in Israel who had not bent the knee to Baal, at a time when even a true prophet in his despondency deemed the apostacy universal; so, I believe, there are many thousands in Christendom who are united to their neighbours in love because they are united to Christ in faith, at a time when a scorning world and a desponding Church agree all too well in the erroneous belief that the religion of the age is destitute of power. There is in the religion of the age less of power to melt and weld human hearts into one than there should be; but there is more, much more, than scoffers allow, or faint-hearted disciples dare to believe. I am bound to testify, to the honour of the Lord and for the comfort of the brotherhood, that I have often found both at home and abroad, that the common name of Jesus removed mountains in a moment, and opened for me a broad path sheer into a brother's heart, when on other terms there would have been no access.

Here, too, on these waste sands of time, I mark the foot-print of the God of Providence. I believe I was led by a Father's hand to the spot where a brother was waiting to receive me. If you deny to me a providence in small things, you deprive me of a providence in all things. My creed in these matters coincides with that of Eliezer, slave and ambassador, when he was sent to seek a wife for Abraham's son, "I being in the way, the Lord led me." When an Ethiopian prince was returning from Jerusalem, through the desert, ill at ease and anxious, he lifted up his dark eyes, filled with gathering tears, from the parchment of Isaiah's gospel, and, lo, a speck on the far horizon! It increases apace; it takes the form of a man. A solitary traveller approaches, hails the First Lord of the Ethiopian Treasury, mounts into his waggon, and beginning at that scripture "preached unto him Jesus." There is a specimen of providence. God has said, Seek and ye shall find; the African was seeking in that desert, seeking the life of his soul; and the Spirit of God sent Philip away from his prosperous work in the city, to bear the water of life in his vessel to the thirsty soul in the desert. I don't believe that God ruled over all in those days, and has deserted the world in ours. I refuse to make a choice, as some teachers bid me, between God and the laws of nature. I hold to both. A dark world it would be to me if there were no ruler but the laws of nature; a poor consolation to tell me that the waves will be sure to beat upon my bark in strict conformity with the order of cause and effect; if I cannot look through the storm with glistening eyes and see "my Father at the helm."

In short, I was very happy when I met a Christian brother in a strange land; and my happiness was increased ten-fold by the belief which I enjoyed, that our steps were led on converging paths to the meeting-place by the ministry of the same Spirit who drew the Ethiopian into the desert of Gaza, and sent Philip to meet him there. "Whoso is wise and will observe these things, even they shall understand the loving-kindness of the Lord" (Ps. cvii. 43).

Arrived in Elberfeld, I made my quarters good till Monday in its best hotel. All comforts and respectabilities; but not so much quiet as was desirable, on account of certain Prussian officers holding headquarters there, and mustering from time to time their bands of landwehr, returning home from their autumn manœuvres.

A crowded train from Cologne, and much bustle in crossing the Rhine by the bridge of boats at Düsseldorf. Between Düsseldorf and Elberfeld we passed near Neanderthal, a place that bulks largely in the transactions of those philosophers who are busy tracing the pedigree of man up to a primeval age. In a cave at that place, in the year 1857, somebody found a skull which has played a distinguished part ever since in discussions regarding the antiquity of the human race. In the altitude of its arch, it seems, this skull is exactly a medium between that of the chimpanzee and that of average European humanity. It is the skull of an idiot, suggests a simple inquirer. No, reply the philosophers, it's the normal type of an ancient race of men. This Neanderthal skull is worth its weight in gold to the Simian philosophers, for they greatly need a middle spot, on which to plant a foot, between the ape and the man. It is a long leap over, and a stepping-stone is welcome. It is as necessary and as useful as Egypt was to the first Napoleon, on his way from France to India, and they seem to pounce upon it with equal zeal. Napoleon never reached India: and possibly honourable gentlemen, notwithstanding the aid afforded by this old German cranium, may never be able to prove to us that we are the lineal descendants of the chimpanzee. I cannot say that my equanimity is much disturbed by the researches of the comparative anatomists. I believe both in God and in man, with a faith that I think no real discovery will, and no pretended discovery should, shake. Let us have all the facts collected, and all the conclusions freely stated; and let time try all. The truth is great and it will prevail.

On Sabbath morning there was a great rain; gentle in its manner, but vast in its quantity. There had been no rain for many weeks, the ground was parched, and the floods were welcome; but in the meantime an unspeakable dulness pervaded the air and communicated itself to human spirits. The heavens were very dark, and men's hearts seemed sad; at any rate mine fell down to zero, as I sat in my solitary chamber on that dreary morning. But it was then and there that, if not for the first time, at least much more vividly than at any former period, the thought presented itself, that when the scorched ground obtains at length its much needed refreshment, the landscape is always dark, never smiling in the sunshine. No man is so foolish as to complain, while the thirsty land is drinking in the rain from heaven, that he cannot enjoy at the same moment the comfort of bright skies overhead. In the spiritual sphere, I suspect the line of experience runs close and parallel. While a Christian is getting what he has often asked from God, a refreshing by the Spirit from on high, I think he is not ordinarily light-hearted and cheerful. I suppose, in grace as well as in nature, the times of greatest refreshment at the root are not times of great brightness overhead. We do not fret under the cloud which hides the sun while it waters the earth; neither should the children of God think that all is going against them in time of sadness. Our Father the Husbandman does not often water his garden while the sun is shining. From causes known fully only to Himself, the water is more precious to the ground if the sun is veiled during the process. Only thoughtless children would complain that they cannot get the garden well watered from the sky without an interruption of the sunbeams. After long drought over a continent, the day in which rain comes is a dark dull day; in this aspect, God's goings in grace are like his goings in nature.

Rain more moderate. After breakfast made my way to the church, of which Krummacher was pastor. Entered early, long before nine, among the first. Took a seat in the gallery where it approached very near the pulpit. The congregation began to stream leisurely, steadily in. A man, who appeared to be a well-conditioned mechanic, took his seat in the pew immediately before me; and, observing that I was a stranger, addressed some questions to me. Nothing loth, seeing that conversation was permitted in the circumstances, I replied freely. Whereupon I was subjected to a catechising, which I thought more energetic than modest on the part of my new friend. Having learned that I was from Scotland, and that I was a minister there, he asked plumply if I were a Christian. I kept my composure, and answered somewhat meekly in the affirmative. "But are you a real Christian," he resumed, with most business-like coolness, "or only one in name?"

To this question I did not give a categorical reply; but in a somewhat round-about way expressed some of my views regarding the person and work of Christ, and the preciousness of his redemption. Thereupon, he grasped me by the hand, and became demonstrative in brotherly affection, as far as circumstances would permit; for by this time a large portion of the congregation had assembled, and the voices of the entered and the entering, accompanied by the organ, had begun to peal the opening hymn.

I was much interested in this incident: in an unexpected way, it revealed to me several features in the religious condition of the people. This colloquy could not have taken place unless there had been a good deal of positive earnest Christian life in the community; but neither could it have taken place unless there had also been a good deal of rationalistic infidelity in the neighbourhood, sheltering itself under hereditary Christian names, and national ecclesiastic organisations. Alas! the questions of this man, earnestly Christian, though not liberally educated, have a meaning in Germany which they would scarcely have in our own country. To be in the office of the Christian ministry is not in all cases there a security that the person even professes to believe that the blood of Jesus Christ cleanses us from all sin. But in many districts of Germany and notably in the Wupperthal, a living faith has sprung up, and a vigorous Christian work is prosecuted. The life that springs up and grows in the midst of death, generally displays both excellences and defects, fashioned by the circumstances. The piety is in these circumstances real and lively; but it is apt to run into a pietism which is neither safe nor winsome. In short, both the substantial excellence and the circumstantial defects which were displayed by my mechanic interrogator in Elberfeld are such as one might be led to expect among the common people, where true spiritual life revives and finds itself surrounded still by the dead forms and dead formations of a past generation. Blessed be God for the revival; as it becomes wider the deformities which belong to the state out of which it sprung will drop gradually off. As the piety becomes more general and more educated, the pietism, in as far as it is injurious, will disappear.

The church was entirely filled, chiefly by men; in the gallery men only; below, both men and women. The minister entered the pulpit when the hymn was nearly finished. The portions of Scripture for the day were read, commingled with praise and prayer, and afterwards an energetic discourse delivered on the crisis of Paul's conversion at the gate of Damascus. By dint of clear speaking on the part of the preacher, and earnest listening on the part of the hearer, I contrived, with a very imperfect knowledge of the language, to bring away almost as much as I ordinarily take up of an English sermon. Any one may observe in his own experience how much the concentration of the faculties which you possess, will compensate for the want of those which you lack, as when the blind take out of hearing and feeling what other people never imagined these senses contained.

There was an interesting admixture of the imaginative and the real in the discourse. From the announcement, Acts ix. 9, "And he was three days without sight, and neither did eat nor drink," the preacher deduced the formula, "He saw not, he ate not, he drank not." Thus he is cut off at the three main channels from communication with the world and time. Then, "behold, he prays:" isolated from earth he enters into communication with Heaven; the Spirit possesses and fills his soul. Hungry, thirsty, blind, he comes to God for food, drink, light. Nothing from the world, all from Christ. This man has been emptied, and filled again: emptied of himself, and filled with all the fulness of God. Thus in conversion generally, by means more gentle or more violent, a soul is severed for a time, and in a measure from its relation to earth, that so it may be occupied and filled with the presence of God.

After the morning service, I made my way to Barmen—neighbouring town, or suburb of Elberfeld, as you please to call it, together a population of about 85,000—and found the residence of my friend Herr K. Klein. He introduced me with much kindness to his wife, his eldest son with his wife, and youngest son, a boy of twelve. There I was, plunged suddenly and deep into the bosom of a Christian family in the Fatherland, and that for the first time in my life. I was welcomed with much tenderness, although of me they knew nothing, on the ground of their love to the common Lord, both theirs and ours. I have since learned from Dr. Craig of Hamburgh, and others, that my host is a Gaius in those parts, and "a succourer of many."

The lady understood a little English, and her son more. While we enjoyed a simple but abundant meal, we contrived to get and give reciprocally not a little information regarding the coming of the Kingdom in Germany and in Scotland. After dinner, we went in company to afternoon worship in one of the King of Prussia's United German churches, where Herr Klein seemed to bear office. At the tea-table, after we returned from church, Frau Klein produced a large English Bible, and selecting a chapter, Heb. xi., requested me to read it aloud. The whole family listened, and followed on their German Bibles. It seemed greatly to interest and please that Christian family to hear the Word which they loved in the accents of a people whom they regarded as brethren in the common faith. After I had finished, Herr Klein proposed to read a chapter in the German Bible, by way, as it seemed, of wedding the two tongues and two people emblematically together in the Lord. I confess that I abandoned myself to the fascination of the scene, and seemed to forget for the time that the world is still a wilderness, and that both a barren land and a dark flood lie between us and our rest. Gravely as well as affectionately, after the manner of his country, my host dismissed me in the evening, with a kiss on either cheek.

Before sending me away my kind entertainers placed me under the charge of a young minister (candidat) of the Church, who conducted me to the house of Herr Grafe, in Elberfeld. This gentleman, as I understand, is one of those who are separated in communion from the Church established ; but it is clear that he and his circle co-operate with the godly men of the National Church in Christian and benevolent works.

A curious example occurred here of the incongruous conceptions that get themselves struck off like eccentric sparks when people attempt to speak in a language which they but very imperfectly understand. A gentleman of the party, of extremely grave disposition and manner, possessed a few English words, and, like most other Germans, took great pleasure in using them. Having picked up from the papers a piece of English news that had not reached my ears, he benevolently proposed to impart his information to me. The Great Eastern had about that time met with an accident. Having lost the power of her rudder at sea, she had run wild for a time, and nearly destroyed herself before the crew succeeded in bridling her again. As the finale of this disaster, my grave German friend announced that of the passengers "all were saved, but thirty were blessed." Thirty had been wounded, and the French and English words, having lost their helms as it were, had fouled each other in the too limited seaway of his memory.

The candidat, having observed, doubtless, in the house that the well of my German was very shallow and unproductive, and being bent, moreover, on drawing out of me, while I was in his power, all possible information regarding the Churches in Scotland ; as soon as we were in the open air, tapped the ground at another spot, in the hope of finding a richer vein—that is, he tried Latin instead of German, for he did not know English. I suppose he must have found the spring here somewhat less intermittent in its flow, for he continued on that tack during the whole time that we remained together. Through an ambiguity in the Latin word "societas," which he employed, I was led into a mistake regarding the occupation he had carved out for me in the evening. I understood that I was about to be introduced to the meeting of a religious society, in the ordinary sense of that term ; but it turned out to be a select circle of two or three families, who met in each other's houses by turns every Sabbath evening, to eat their bread together, and converse on the progress of Christ's cause in their own hearts, and in the world around. I was ushered into a pretty large company, seated round a table on which a supper, plentiful but not luxuriant, was spread. The scene was so diverse from all that I had been accustomed to at home, that I was for a moment startled by the strange method of sanctifying the Sabbath. I determined, however, to keep my mind open, and endeavour to judge the methods of these German Christians by their fruits.

After the meal had proceeded certain stages, pipes and cigars were produced, and every gentleman without exception began to smoke vigorously, while all, gentlemen and ladies alike, maintained their seats at the table. A pipe was politely offered to me, and politely declined. In a short time we had nearly lost sight of each other in wreaths of smoke. In other circumstances I would have marched off, and sought refuge in the open air ; but so much was I interested in those people—in themselves and what they said—that, without even an internal murmur, I endured the physical suffocation in order to obtain the spiritual refreshment that was to be obtained on the spot.

I loved those Christians dearly, but I loathed then, and loathe at this hour, the expensive, filthy, troublesome, unhealthy, and in every way mischievous habit to which the men among them have abandoned themselves. I entertain a suspicion that some of the chief defects that appear in the German character are either caused or aggravated by the universal practice of smoking tobacco. Day labourers may smoke and escape with a smaller measure of mischief, but men who labour with their brain should beware how, for the sake of a pleasant sensation, they change, by the application of a narcotic poison, the physical condition of the delicate instrument of thought wherewith the allwise Creator has endowed his creature man.

Bating this, however, and passing over the custom so foreign to our views of assembling in a large party at supper on the evening of the Lord's Day, the whole tone and substance of the conversation I gladly testify was grave and godly. Whether in its manner their Sabbath-keeping was as good as ours I pronounce here no judgment, but in its substance I should rejoice if such Sabbath evenings were spread over all my own beloved land. The conversation was varied and easy, but its whole volume consisted of things that are glory to God and mercy to men. There was no prescription and no restraint, everyone said what he wished to say, and that was uniformly on the word and the work of the Lord. The conversation was somewhat polyglottish, for Herr Grafe and one or two others spoke English freely.

At that time a very intense spiritual movement was in progress in Glasgow and many other parts of Scotland. My friends had heard of the fact in general, and there was no end to their demand of details. With unwearied interest they listened to all that I told them of what the Lord had wrought in our land.

I learned from Herr Klein that an institute for the training of missionaries is maintained at Barmen, and brought home a specimen of religious tracts printed by its society. With much interest I discovered on the way that a large proportion of them were translations from the English. It was pleasant to read Newman Hall's tracts and McCheyne's hymns, done into German, that they might serve another tide on the other side of the sea. Most of these tracts I have since given to strolling musicians from the Fatherland, whom I have met in our streets and highways. If the love of Jesus, as it flowed in measures from Robert McCheyne's lips, have found entrance into the heart of one of these wandering minstrels, it will be discovered "in that day" that the life went a great way round to reach its object.

WILLIAM ARNOT.

TO THE HOLY SPIRIT.

SPIRIT OF GOD! Almighty One,
Sent from the Father and the Son,
Completer of their work begun,—
Good Spirit, hear and aid.

They did not grudge the costly price,
Christ gave Himself a sacrifice,
Thou grievest, too, when men despise,—
Good Spirit, hear and aid.

Like Christ, Thou countest not the cost,
Strivest, like Him, to save the most,
Like Him, thou yearnest o'er the lost,—
Good Spirit, hear and aid.

Breathe on us, Lord, that we receive
Fresh grace, to make our souls revive;
Bid the dry bones arise and live,—
Good Spirit, hear and aid.

In the turmoil of life be near,
A shield from worldly hope and fear;
In joy to calm, in grief to cheer,—
Good Spirit, hear and aid.

When the heart sinks in heavier woe,
Spirit of peace, Thine aid bestow,
Oh! make it then Thy joy to know,—
Good Spirit, hear and save.

When lingering sickness, night and day,
Weighs down the soul, too weak to pray,
The thought of God its only stay,—
Good Spirit, hear and aid.

When the frame, trembling in disease,
Shakes like the leaves on aspen trees,
And courage fails, and fears increase,—
Good Spirit, hear and aid.

When wakening conscience is o'ercast
By dark remembrance of the past,
Defiled by sin, from first to last,—
Good Spirit, hear and aid.

Giver of penitence, impart
The sacred sorrow of the heart,
Nor spare its healthful, painful smart,—
Good Spirit, hear and save.

Oh! purge and cleanse the inward eye
From listless, hopeless apathy;
Cause black despair to quickly fly,—
Good Spirit, hear and save.

Then take the things of Christ, and teach
Glad tidings to the heart of each,
By Thy divine, effectual speech,—
Good Spirit, hear and save.

Quicken dull faith to see the Lord
And grasp the promise of his Word;
His peace upon the soul be pour'd,—
Good Spirit, hear and save.

Draw us to Christ the Spirit's way;
"Who comes to me," He deigned to say,
"Nowise shall be a castaway,"—
Good Spirit, hear and save.

Give more than peace—if we may dare
To lift our sinful hearts in prayer,
For grace vouchsafed Thy saints to share,—
Good Spirit, hear and aid.

Shine on our souls with gleams of joy,
Visions of bliss that cannot cloy,
Like beams athwart a troubled sky,—
Good Spirit, hear and aid.

But chiefly cleanse the soul to prove Communion with a Father's love
(Such grace Thou givest, Holy Dove),—
Good Spirit, hear and aid.

That sacred tie, on earth begun,
Knit with the Father, through the Son,
Shall still endure when death draws on,—
Good Spirit, hear and save.

For all in Christ who, pardoned, die,
Inherit from the Lord Most High
A share in his eternity,—
Good Spirit, hear and save.

C. E. PRICHARD.

THE PEST, PROVIDENCE, AND PRAYER.

BY THE EDITOR.

In the month of August, 1845, I was spending a few days in an old mansion house on the shores of the Moray Firth. The oak-panelled walls of the dining-room were hung with pictures of the ancestors of my host, some of whom had played no inconspicuous part in the olden time. The sheen of their breastplates and their serious, determined air, comported well with their history. Right or wrong, they had, with others of the nobility and gentry, espoused the cause of the Covenant; but unlike many who, turning back, proved a deceitful bow in the day of battle, they stuck true to the "blue banner;" fighting, suffering for it, and earning the respect which courage and consistency seldom fail to secure.

Thinking, by way of contrast, of the happy days in which we live—tolerating differences, and granting to others the liberty we claim for ourselves—and how quietly that old mansion, once flashing with the fires and wrapt in the smoke of musketry, now stood among its venerable ash-trees and elms, I stepped out from their shade, one fine morning, to see the plenty as well as enjoy the peace that blessed our favoured land. There it lay all around, in hedged and well-cultivated fields, which, ripening, under God's showers and sunshine, and growing white unto the harvest, promised abundance both for man and beast. But what is this? Yesterday there were broad acres of potato there, with stems erect, leaves of healthy green, and the shaws, as they are called in Scotland, so luxuriant that it was not possible to distinguish one drill from another. Changed in one short night, this field is now, so to speak, but the corpse of what it had been. No longer one broad flush of green, every separate furrow is visible, and each plant stands with head drooping to the ground, its stems bent under the weight of leaves that, withered, blighted, blackened, impart to the scene a melancholy aspect, and to the air a strangely fœtid odour. While I, who had been a country clergyman, and was more or less experienced in agriculture, stood wondering at a phenomenon which I found myself utterly unable to explain, the tenant of the farm came up; and him I found as much amazed, and, as was natural in his circumstances, more distressed at the sight than myself. A grey-haired man, he had never seen the like before.

In the days of those Covenanters whose mailed and sombre figures gave an antique and martial aspect to the oak panels of the old mansion, some would have found a ready explanation of this calamity in "the evil eye," the curse or cantrips of a malicious witch. But in the northern part of the island "the schoolmaster had been abroad" for more than a century; wolves and witches had both disappeared together—the burning of the last witch and the killing of the last wolf having occurred much about the same time; and so the farmer, though greatly puzzled, sought for an explanation of the matter in other than preternatural causes. "It beats a', sir," he said; "it dings my judgment a'thegither. I'm thinking, though it never waukened me wi' its roarin', that there has been an awfu' wind in the nicht, tossing and dashing the shaws thegither; and that that accounts for sic a bonny field, as this was yesterday, being as ye see it now, the shaws a' wallowed, and the leaves growin' a' black."

This theory might be ingenious, but it could not be true; since, had such a hurricane as it supposed struck the turrets of the old mansion house, howling in the chimneys and roaring amid the trees around, it must certainly have wakened us, and sounder sleepers too. So, dissatisfied with the explanation, I returned to mention the circumstance to my host at the breakfast-table, and discuss its probable causes; and how was our wonder increased on learning from the newspapers the day thereafter, that that same night, perhaps in the same hour, perhaps at the same moment, the potatoe fields of the whole country, had been struck—north, south, east, and west. It was, in fact, what we afterwards became too familiar with—the potato disease; a severe pestilence of its kind, and one on which gaunt famine followed, though not marching with its strides—in Ireland, especially, emptying her cabins, and filling her churchyards. The country did not sit down supinely under this calamity. While much was done to alleviate the sufferings it entailed—Parliament voting ten millions sterling for that purpose—every effort was made to discover the nature of the disease; its causes, and its cure. Farmers tried all manner of experiments, even bringing the potato in its native state from its birthplace on the slopes of Chili and Peru; the Government instituted all manner of inquiries; and philosophers turned all the lights of science on the mystery. The country was as wise at the end of the day as at the beginning. These black spots on the green leaf, these black spots in the root; how the disease came, and how it went; how it was generated and how propagated; what might prevent, or arrest, or, if anything could do so, cure it, were subjects that baffled man's utmost skill. God left us to be baffled and beaten, to feel ourselves as powerless and helpless as a straw borne on the bosom of a stream. But when He had taught us to bow reverently and humbly beneath his hand, and to feel that we were in it for good or evil, He was pleased to take it off. The pest was arrested, though enough of it remains to remind us of our dependence on God: departing as mysteriously as it came, through no efforts on our part, nor power or will but his who says to the sea, "Hither shalt thou come and no further; here shall thy proud waves be stayed."

There was another and earlier pest which I have too good occasion to remember, that also reminds us of these words, "When thy judgments are on the earth, the inhabitants of the world will learn righteousness." It is not the cholera, now again threatening our shores, to which I refer. It raged, and slew many, in the immediate neighbourhood of my old country parish; where, while trusting to the power of prayer, we did not, as some of our would-be philosophers seem to fancy we would, neglect the use of means. On the contrary, we established a cordon sanitaire around our bounds; we appointed a committee of public health; we stopped all beggars, tinkers, vagrants, on the frontiers; we got a medicine chest for the use of the parish; we placed it in the manse, out of which, having learned late on a Sabbath night that a person had come that evening to the village from an infected house in Dundee, I went forth at six o'clock on Monday morning, and summoning the nearest members of committee, had the intruder bundled out of his father's house and the parish too before breakfast. We do not need men who regard themselves as "advanced thinkers," and talk with an air of superior wisdom of the modes of thought of the present day, to tell us that we must work as well as pray. It is long since Oliver Cromwell told his Ironsides to trust in God and keep their powder dry.

The pest I refer to is the Influenza of 1836-37. No place could be more healthily situated than Arbirlot, my old country parish. Disease found no allies there in crowded houses, or a stagnant atmosphere; in marshes, swamps, or the poisonous effluvia of choked drains and cesspools. Arbirlot hung on a slope that declined gently to the sandy shores of the German Ocean. There was wood enough to ornament the landscape, but not to intercept the fresh breezes that, curling and cresting the waves, blew landward from the sea, or swept down seaward from heights loaded with the fragrance of mown hay, or blooming bean-fields, or moors golden with the flowers of the gorse. The habits, as well as the habitations, of my parishioners were highly conducive to health. Well-instructed, decent, and sober, out of a population amounting nearly to 1000 souls there was only one person who was not in the habit of attending public worship; only one old enough to be able to read, who could not; and not one, with the exception of a farmer or two, who was addicted to habits of intemperance. Nevertheless, the influenza of 1836-37, which, I have been told, clothed the Edinburgh churches in all but universal mourning, and made such demands on the leading physicians there, that Dr. Abercrombie was said to have worn out some pairs of horses per day, came down on my parish with the swoop of an eagle. How and whence it came, none could tell: but all of a sudden, and in almost every house, it was there—"the pestilence that walketh in darkness, the destruction that wasteth at noon-day."

For example, on being myself smitten down on a Friday, I sent off a servant next day on horseback to the farm-houses and hamlets, to warn all that there would be no service in the church on Sabbath: and I remember how he reported on his return the same answer from almost every house—this, namely, It is of no consequence! The disease was there; and none could go to church! Nor was it only in this parish that the pest had burst out like a fire. The same had happened in the whole country round, shutting up on that Sunday ten or eleven of the pulpits of the thirteen parishes embraced within the bounds of the Presbytery. It had attacked all classes, all ranks, and all ages; perilling the lives of the young, and slaughtering the old. How it was generated; how it was communicated; what made it a destroying angel, moving on the wings of the wind, and armed with the dart of death; how it smote this house, and, as if it were protected with paschal blood, passed over that, were, and are still, mysteries which eluded the closest inquiry. The deeper men went into the subject, it grew the darker. Well if men of science were thereby taught humility, and those who attempted to penetrate the secrets of disease learned to say, "Who can, by searching, find out God? Who can find out the Almighty to perfection? It is higher than heaven, what can we do: it is deeper than hell, what can we know: the measure thereof is longer than the earth, and broader than the sea!"

While Cholera, hanging on the wing, hovers over our shores, and threatens to revisit us, it has pleased God to send down on our country a new and strange pest. The first which I have mentioned—like the disease that years ago utterly destroyed the vines of Madeira, and, after devastating many parts of Europe, still lingers, as I saw this summer, among the lovely valleys of Piedmont—fell on the vegetable kingdom. The second pest struck at man directly. Nor can it be reasonably doubted that, but for the superior medical skill, better food, better clothing, better lodging which, as compared with those of former times, we, in God's good providence, enjoy, that pest, the cholera likewise, and also the plague which in typhus fever is ever smouldering in our large cities, would have proved as fatal as any plague on record—as that which, in the time of Pepys and Defoe, for instance, slew 10,000 in one week in London, when the population of the capital was not a tenth of what it is now; or that, called the sweating sickness, whose ravages in my native town, then probably a very small one, for it had been repeatedly burnt to the ground by hostile armies, stand thus rudely recorded on an old memorial stone within the shadow of its cathedral tower:—

Luna quater crescens
Sexcentos peste peremptos;
Disce mori,—vidit
Pulvis et umbra sumus.

The third pest, that with which we have now to do, threatens, not our life, indeed, but one of its main supports. The life of man is sustained either by vegetable, or by animal food. Many tribes in tropical countries live entirely on the first; and the savage races who inhabit the Arctic regions, hunting the whale, the walrus, the seal, the Polar bear, subsist exclusively on the second. Now, in our country, situated midway between the equator and the pole, where we subsist both on animal and vegetable food, this rinderpest, or, in plain English, cattle plague, threatens to break what is to us, therefore, a staff of life. It is not indeed the first plague, nor, so far as its ravages have yet gone, is it the worst, which has desolated our fields and emptied our byres. One different perhaps in its nature, but to the full as deadly in its effects, laid our island waste more than a hundred years ago—such its fatality that almost every cattle beast in England died; one county alone, and that not a large one, losing 20,000 head. The possibility of such ravages by the rinderpest presents a very gloomy prospect, involving enormous loss to our country, widely-extended suffering, and the utter ruin of thousands of families. Already it has wrought very serious ravages. The number of cows in Edinburgh is now not more than a fourth of what it was when the plague broke out here three months ago; and many expect that every dairy in the city will be cleared out by the new year. The utmost care on the part of farmers to protect their cattle from infection and surround them with everything that could contribute to their health has proved utterly unavailing. Defying all prevention, and as yet resisting all cure, the disease is working dreadful havoc in many districts of the country. Men are at their wits' end. Ruin stares them in the face, and the calamity which, unless arrested, will fall so heavily on the large and respectable class engaged in agriculture, will be felt by the whole community; this being a case in which, if one member suffer, all the members must suffer with it. A serious evil to our nurseries, milk, the very best food for children, will not be procurable either for love or money; and butcher meat, which is consumed to so large an extent by all classes, must rise to a price which will place it beyond the reach of the labouring population, and many more besides. Such being our prospects, winter approaches us with a stern and gloomy aspect—suffering to all, to many bankruptcy and ruin in its train. So serious, indeed, are the circumstances of the country, that we should stand in dread of their issues, but that we believe in a presiding Providence and can trust to the efficacy of prayer.

What has Providence to do with this pest? is a question which some may put; and I might, with more reason, answer thus: Providence has to do with everything; a sparrow falleth not to the ground without the Father. But I can lay my finger on many passages of the Bible which in other ages (and why not in this?) trace calamities similar to ours to the hand and judgment of God. It was of the loss of his cattle, as well as of his children, that Job uttered this sublimest of all human utterances, "The Lord gave, and the Lord hath taken away; blessed be the name of the Lord." Let God give our farmers a sense of his Providence in this calamity, with faith in the efficacy of prayer, and they may (not otherwise) rise to the height of this sublime expression, "Though the flock be cut off from the fold, and there shall be no herd in the stall, yet I will rejoice in the Lord, and joy in the God of my salvation." I can give but a sample of the many instances which are piled up around me where the Word of God represents Him as sending such calamities as this plague of the rinderpest. Hence, and on the highest authority, we call it a providential visitation, which may, or which may not, be sent on account of our sins.

As samples take these: Jeremiah xii. 4, "How long shall the land mourn, and the herbs of every field wither for the wickedness of them that dwell therein? the beasts are consumed." Jeremiah vii. 17-20, "Seest thou not what they do in the cities of Judah and in the streets of Jerusalem? The children gather wood, and the fathers kindle the fire, and the women knead their dough, to make cakes to the queen of heaven, and to pour out drink-offerings unto their gods; therefore thus saith the Lord God, Behold, mine anger and my fury shall be poured out upon this place upon man, and upon beast." Hosea iv. 1-3, "Hear the word of the Lord, ye children of Israel: for the Lord hath a controversy with the inhabitants of the land, because there is no truth, nor mercy, nor knowledge of God in the land. By swearing, and lying, and killing, and stealing, and committing adultery, they break out, and blood toucheth blood. Therefore shall the land mourn, and everyone that dwelleth therein shall languish, with the beasts of the field."

It is the fashion with some in these, as in other days, to explain away all, not only that devout Christians, but even devout pagans, held and expressed by such words as Providence and providential. According to them, all events result from certain great, general laws which God has ordained for the government of the world. A man, for example, leaves a warm room without his great-coat, and catches cold; drinks too much wine, and loses his senses; eats too much food, and gets a fit of indigestion; launches recklessly into speculation, and becomes a bankrupt; lives in an ill-drained house, and is seized with typhoid fever, and neglecting the use of the proper remedies, dies. Well, we have men who claim to themselves the title of "advanced thinkers," alleging that there is no more Providence in the most important events in the history of individuals, nations, or Churches, than in these—that the fall of a kingdom, with all its results, is not one whit more providential than that of a stone on the hill-side, which when the rains have undermined it, obeying the laws of gravitation, topples over; and rolling, thundering, smoking, leaping in its descent, at one great last bound buries itself in the depths of the lake.

No doubt many events, which good men once regarded as special interpositions of Providence, can be proved to be the natural and inevitable result of those laws which God has established for the ordinary government of the world. I admit that no rash attempt should be made to trace in the common detail of worldly affairs the special interference of a superintending Providence; sincere and pious Christians having, sometimes, thereby exposed religion to the sneer of the scoffer, and overlooked this canon even of a heathen poet:—

> "Nec Deus intersit nisi dignus vindice nodus > Inciderit;"

"Let not a god interfere unless some difficulty worthy of his intervention should occur." That God has established great, general laws for the government of the world, on due attention to which our health, happiness, and life ordinarily turn—laws which cannot be observed without benefit, nor violated without suffering—is no new discovery. We hear much, and not too much certainly, of the importance of sanitary measures; but the fact that filth is favourable to the production of disease, while cleanliness promotes health and prolongs life, was as well known to the Jews three thousand years ago as it is now—the frequent washings enjoined by the Mosaic law, both of their persons and their houses, being sanitary measures as well as spiritual, and religious symbols. Nor did the Presbytery of Glasgow, when they proposed a day of humiliation and prayer on account of the cholera, need a late Prime Minister to tell them to betake themselves to the cleaning of their dirty closes and courts, as a measure not less necessary than prayer. The laugh which his taunt afforded sceptics and scoffers was as silly, as the taunt itself was uncalled for—the Sacred Book, which it was the duty of that reverend body to expound, not only containing the oldest, and what is in some respects still the best, sanitary code on record, but furnishing them with a very pertinent, and what had been in the circumstances not impertinent, reply to the statesman's jibe, "These ought ye to have done, and not to leave the other undone."

Frankly admitting the existence of great general laws, we recognise in them the wisdom and goodness of Him who governs all events, from the fall of an angel to the fall of a sparrow. If fire, for instance, sometimes burned, and at other times froze, like ice; if meat sometimes acted like medicine, and medicine like meat; if the processes of agriculture yielded a crop on one farm, but utterly failed to do so on another; if "the hand of the diligent" made one man rich but left his neighbour poor; if, in other words, certain causes were not followed up by certain results, if the line of sequences could not be depended on, the business of the world would come to a stand—all things would rush into ruin. Admitting this, it by no means follows that, as a man leaves a clock, which he has wound up, to go on in its corner of hall or room, pointing the hours and striking them till the weights have run down, and all is still, and it has run its course, God has left man to run out his term of life, and the world to run on through its cycle of ages under the blind, unmodified, and uncontrolled operation of mere general laws. We admit their existence and see in them the clearest manifestation of the wisdom and goodness, as well as the power, of God. But it by no means follows that, in ways beyond the reach of our discovery and even the comprehension of our limited faculties, ways which we have no language to express, nor intelligence to understand, nor even fancy to imagine, God does not govern our actions and mould our fortunes. How is this truth embodied in the words which we find enshrined in the Bible, and often illustrated in the disappointments of life, and the experience of others as well as Solomon, "I returned, and saw under the sun that the race is not to the swift, nor the battle to the strong, neither yet bread to the wise, nor yet riches to men of understanding, nor yet favour to men of skill."

Granting the existence and operation of these laws, and that sincere and devout Christians have often regarded what were their results as "special providences," there are few men who cannot point to certain events in their own life which had an important influence on their own fortune or that of others, and which they cannot but regard as providential. They are not to be explained by the ordinary operation of the laws of nature. Without drawing on books, it may entertain my readers more, and equally illustrate my subject, to relate a case or two of the kind belonging to the writer's individual experience.

Near by my old country parish there rose from the shelving shore a range of iron-bound cliffs, against which, in stormy weather, the sea dashed with amazing fury. Accompanied by a friend, I one day descended these, in search of anemones and seaweed in the pools which the ebbing tide left at their feet. While thus engaged I leaped down on a rock that sloped away into the sea, then roaring and foaming in a strong north-easter. On my feet touching the rock, which was covered, not as I imagined with dry, but with slippery, seaweed, they went out from below me, and I found myself flat on my back, launching away into the sea. All the danger of the position flashed at once into view—the impossibility of swimming, though I could swim, in such a roaring surf; a horrid death by being hurled on the jagged rocks; and the certainty that, though I should get hold of the slippery tangle, of its sliding from my grasp, and leaving me to fall back again, wounded and bleeding into the deep. My companion could do nothing, but stood petrified at the sight. Yet I was saved to write this paper, and do some little work in the world by—what I believe, and, looking our modern philosophers in the face, call—God's good Providence. It had been a miracle, had a monster of the deep swallowed up a man in such circumstances, and, making for a sandy bay, vomited him ashore, safe and sound, as Jonah; a miracle, had the sea-birds that soared and screamed over the intruder on their domain, borne him aloft on their white wings to set him down safe on the top of the cliffs. The age of miracles is gone; but not that of the special providence which brings about events where reason can, and religion delights to, recognise the hand of God. In my circumstances, when I was moving off like a ship from the slips into the deep, life only could be saved by the arrest of such a fatal launch. For this purpose I put on the brakes, to use railway language, pressing strongly with my heels against the rock; and, when descending with constantly accelerating motion—my back to the rock, my face to the sky, my ears filled with the roar of death, and my feet within less than a yard of a watery grave—I was suddenly arrested. It so happened that the heels of my boots had been newly shod with iron. Being rough, one of them, instead of slipping over, caught against a small pebble imbedded in the rock; and I have ever regarded it as a special providence that, in this hour of peril, I had in that rough iron the only means which could save life; and that my mind, being kept as calm and collected as it is now, I had the self-possession to remember the rough state of the iron on my boots, and resort to the one only possible means of saving me from a watery grave.

The scene of another case lies in my own country parish, and the dell where a decent widow lived whom I was in the habit of visiting, as paralysis made it impossible for her to attend church. She was tended by a very dutiful daughter, who, working at a flax-mill in the neighbourhood, toiled hard, and contented herself with plain dress and simple fare, that she might help to maintain her mother. Before leaving the cottage for her work she was in the habit of heaping up the refuse of the mill in the grate; and kindling it. She placed her helpless mother in a chair right before the fire; and as this fuel burned away slowly the old woman was kept comfortable till her return. It happened one day that I left my manse, and skirting the walls of the old church-yard, and passing the corn-mill, with its busy sound and flashing wheel, I took my way down the winding dell to the cottage of the old woman, which stood in its garden, embowered among trees. But, having met a parishioner, with whom I had some subject of interest to talk about, I called a halt; and, sitting down on a bank of thyme, we entered into conversation. Ere the subject was half exhausted, the widow rose to my recollection, I felt somehow that I must cut short, and hasten away on my visit. But the idea was dismissed, and the conversation went on. However, it occurred again, and again, till with a feeling that I was neglecting a call of duty, as by an uncontrollable impulse I rose to my feet, and made all haste to the cottage. Opening the door, a sight met my eyes that for the moment nailed me to the spot.

The erection of mill-refuse which had been built from the hearth some feet up the wide open chimney, having its foundations eaten away, had fallen, and, precipitating itself forward, surrounded the helpless paralytic within a circle of fire. The accident took place some minutes before I entered. She had cried out, but no ear was there to hear, nor hand to help. Catching the loose refuse around her, on and on, nearer and nearer, the flames crept. It was a terrible sight for the two Wigtown women martyrs, staked far out in the sands of the Solway Firth, to mark the sea-foam crawl nearer and nearer them; it was more terrible still for this lone woman in her lone cottage, without any great cause to die for, to sit there, and see the fire creeping closer, drawing nearer and nearer to her feet. By the time I entered, it had almost reached her, where she sat motionless, speechless, pale as death, looking down on the fire as it was about to seize her clothes, and burn her to a cinder. Ere it caught, I had time, and no more, to make one bound from the door to the hearth-stone; and seizing her, chair and all in my arms, to pluck her from the jaws of a cruel, fiery death.

Here we recognise the ordinary laws of nature—those of fire, which kept alive by the oxygen of the atmosphere, consumed the refuse; that of gravitation, which, when the fire had ate away the foundation, and left it top-heavy, tumbled it on the floor; that of impulse, by which, when it fell, it was projected beyond the hearth-stone to surround the paralytic with a flaming circle. But by what law of nature was I moved that day, instead of visiting other sick, to turn my steps to the dell and cottage of this poor old woman? By what law of nature, when I lingered on the road, was I moved, without the remotest idea of her danger, to cut short, against all my inclinations, an interesting conversation, and hurry on to the house, which I reached just at the very nick of time,—one or two minutes later, the flames had caught her clothes, and I had found her in a blaze of fire? To look on this as a case of special providence, some may regard as superstitious, and denounce as inconsistent with the spirit and philosophy of the age—as a mere relic of the days of ignorance and darkness. I leave them to their cold philosophy, and "science falsely so called." Be it mine to live and die in the belief of a present, and presiding, as well as personal, God; in the faith which inspired my aged friend to thank Him for her wonderful deliverance, and the boy to explain his calm courage on the roaring deep, in these simple but grand words, "My Father is at the helm."

Edinburgh was the scene of another case which, a matter not of life or death, but of dying peace, I also count providential. A lady belonging to my congregation, a very lovely Christian—whom I knew to be ill, but not in danger—was dying, on a day that I was dragging myself home, weary and worn-out with long hours of work. It occurred to me, on finding myself near the street where she lived, that I should go and see her; but feeling more fit for a sofa than further service, I dismissed the idea, and walked on thinking of the poet's line,—

"The ploughman homeward plods his weary way."

But the idea occurred again, only to be again dismissed. I said to myself, There is nothing very serious in her case. But it came back again and again. Yet I resolved to shake off this feeling, and, walking over it, make my way home; and I had actually passed the opening of the street where she lived, when the impression returned with irresistible force; and, surprised by the circumstance, I retraced my steps, and turned them to her house. How was I astonished to be met at the door with the news that she was dying; and how great was my astonishment and grief also, to find this best and brightest of saintly women in deep despondency. A dark cloud hung over that blessed soul; it was like the obscuration over the Saviour's cross; and I seemed to hear that awful cry, My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me? There we were—she struggling with death, and I with her despair. It pleased God so to bless the truth I was sent, as I believe, to set before her, so to hear the prayers her afflicted and astonished mother and I offered up, that ere her sun sank in night, it came forth from the cloud brilliant, and to appearance larger than ever. Death in the dark had made no eventual difference to this true and loving follower of the Lamb of God; but the lifting of the cloud, turning her latter end into peace, made a mighty difference to the mourners around her bed, and especially to her eminently devout and pious mother. She who had been left, like many other ministers' widows, to struggle with poverty and privation, had been borne up, as few have been, by her remarkable faith in a presiding providence. That venerable woman saw God's hand in everything. Her Father had done this; and her Father had sent that. And for myself, I wish that I had the same ever-present, magnanimous, holy trust in God's providence, as bore her through a sea of troubles, and made her regard me that day as sent to do an angel's office; to smooth her Jeannie's entrance into a better world—ministering to an heir of salvation.

It is not always, I admit, easy to distinguish the merely marvellous from the providential, nor the providential from the miraculous; and many things which sincere and pious Christians have fondly considered as special interpositions of Providence, may, I grant, admit of much controversy. But to regard all events as but the result of the common laws of nature, is in effect to shut God out from the government of his own world. To represent Him as standing by, a mere spectator, with his hands, so to speak, tied, so that He can neither interpose to confer blessings nor inflict judgments, is to mock Him with the shadow of a kingly crown, and clip the wings by which, lifting us above the cloudy regions of care and doubt, prayer raises us to the skies. It may be in a way unknown to, and inscrutable by, us, but unless God interposing takes an actual and active part in our fate and fortunes, I see no sense in prayer.

Rushing into regions where man loses himself and reason fails to guide his faltering steps, some, like those of old, who by wisdom knew not God, set forth crude and ill-digested notions which they dignify by the name of philosophy. But however ingeniously it be spun out of their brains, that philosophy must be false which is not only contrary to the plain sense of the Word of God, but is also, and not less, contrary to the universal instinct and promptings of our nature. I could stand on that alone. If the soul is not immortal, why do all men yearn for, and believe in, immortality? If prayer has no real, direct efficacy, why do all nations, civilized and savage, pagan as well as Christian, resort to it for relief; and, as we see in the case of the lowest and most debased heathens, rather than not pray, address their petitions to a stock or stone? It seems as much an instinct for man in want to pray, as for an infant, put to the breast, to suck. And He who inspired the instinct is no more in this case than in that "a man that he should lie, or the son of man that he should repent."

As to the modus operandi of prayer, as to how it works, and moves the hand that moves the world, that is a subject into which man with his limited faculties cannot too reverently enter, and about which the profoundest theologians cannot too modestly speak. As Cowper sings—

> God moves in a mysterious way
> His wonders to perform;
> He plants his footsteps on the sea,
> And rides upon the storm.

But, as even nature teaches, and his Word clearly reveals, He will have all men to pray; and, to use the words of an inspired Apostle, "no respecter of persons, he that feareth him and worketh righteousness is accepted with him." Therefore, while we acknowledge an Almighty hand in the pest which, marching ruthless and meanwhile resistless through the land, is destroying our herds, ruining the fortunes of many, and threatening the comforts of all, let us resort to prayer. Along with the utmost vigilance and the use of the most active means to stop the progress of the plague, and effect its cure, let prayer ascend from all our cities, our scattered villages, and country homesteads. And who can tell but that God, notwithstanding our unworthiness, may repent Him of the evil; and a grateful nation, rising from the ground where prince and peasant had bent before his mighty hand, may soon unite all voices in this grand old chorus: "Thou crownest the year with thy goodness: and thy paths drop fatness. They drop upon the pastures of the wilderness; and the little hills rejoice on every side. The pastures are clothed with flocks, the valleys also are covered over with corn; they shout for joy; they also sing."

THE BROTHER'S TRUST.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "STUDIES FOR STORIES."

THERE was once, says an old legend, a young Italian noble, whose elder brother loved him much; he had moreover saved his life, and had reconciled him to his father when greatly offended with him.

As might have been expected, the youth returned this affection, and after the death of the father these brothers lived together, the younger obeying the elder, and behaving to him in all respects like a son.

Once, on a certain day, however, a long separation came between them, for the elder went out, as if upon his ordinary affairs, and never returned again to his house. His young brother was first surprised, then alarmed. He sought for him, proclaimed his loss; he scoured the country, caused the waters to be searched, and sought in all the recesses of that old Italian city; but it was of no avail; his brother was gone, and none could tell him whither.

No tidings were heard of him for more than six months, till one night as his young brother was knocking for admittance at his own door, a figure in a domino came up, and put a note into his hand, at the same time whispering his brother's name. It was during the time of the carnival, when it is so much the custom for people to wear disguises, that such things excite no surprise. Anselmo, for this was his name, would have seized the domino by the hand, but he quickly disappeared in the crowd; and full of wonder and anxiety the young man read the letter which he had left behind him:—

"Anselmo, I live, I am well! and I beseech thee, as thou lovest me, fail not to do for me what I shall require, which is, that thou wilt go every night down that lane which leads along the south wall of the P—— Palace; ten paces from the last window but one thou shalt find a narrow slit in the wall; bring with thee a dark lantern, and into that slit do thou place it, turning the light side inward that thou be not discovered. Thou shalt be at the place every night at twelve, and thou shalt stay until the clock of St. Januarius striketh one. So do, and one night I will meet thee there. Thy loving brother prays thee not to fail."

That very night the young nobleman went out unattended, in the hopes of meeting with his brother.

He carried a lantern, and proceeded to the unfrequented lane pointed out in the letter. It was a desolate place, in a thinly populated quarter of the city. By the faint light of the moon he counted the windows, and found the slit in the wall, which was deep, and fenced on the river side with an iron grating backed by a sheet of horn; into this slit he hastened to place his lantern, and then began to look about him, and consider why his brother should have chosen such a place for their meeting.

Not far off ran the river, and he did not doubt that by water his brother would come, for it was evident that he feared to show himself in the streets of the city. Anselmo started once or twice during his solitary watch, for he thought he distinguished the splash of an oar, and then an advancing footstep; but he was mistaken, his brother did not come to meet him that night, nor the next, nor the one after; and when he had come to await him every night for a fortnight, he began to get sick at heart.

And yet there was no way but this; he was to watch till his brother came. It was his only chance of seeing him; and he went on, without once failing, for eleven months and twenty days.

In order that he might do this more secretly, he frequently changed his lodging; for as the time wore on he began to fear that his brother might have involved himself in one of the political intrigues common in those days, and he felt that the utmost caution was required, lest his constant visits to that quarter of the city should be watched, and lead to suspicion.

A strange piece of blind obedience this seemed, even to himself, and of trust in his brother; what appeared to him the strangest part of the letter was the entreaty that he would always bring a lantern; "as if there could be any fear," he thought, "of my not recognising his step, or as if it could be likely that more men than one could by any probability be standing by that solitary corner." But in those days of tyrannical government and lawless faction, flight and mysterious disappearance were not uncommon. Thus Anselmo watched on, though hope began to wax faint, even in his strong and patient heart.

The clock struck one. "Eleven months," said he, "and one and twenty days!—I will watch for thee the year out." He put his hand to the slit in the wall, and withdrew his lantern; it was dying in the socket. "What," said he, "is the light also weary of watching!" He turned, and a heavy stone hard by his feet was raised from beneath, and up from under the earth came his brother.

"Thy cloak—quick! cover me with it," he whispered. "Hide my prison garments."

"Thy prison garments!" repeated Anselmo, faintly, for he was distraught and amazed.

His brother took the cloak and wrapped himself in it. It was not so dark but that Anselmo could see that his feet were bare and his face haggard. He took the lantern and threw it down, beckoning towards the river.

"Let it lie," he said, to his young brother.

"I am sorry the light has gone out just when it is wanted," said Anselmo, for he was still amazed, and scarcely knew what he was talking about.

"Eleven months and twenty-one days hath it served me well," his brother replied; "nothing else, whether alive or dead, saving thyself only, will serve me so well again."

What a strange thing this was to hear; but the walls of the old Italian city echoed the sound so softly that none awoke to listen, and the two figures, gliding under the deep shadow of the houses, passed away, and were seen there no more.

By morning dawn a vessel left the harbour, and two brothers stood upon the deck, bidding farewell to their native country; the one was young, the other had a wan cheek, and hands hardened by labour; but the prison dress was gone, and both were clad in the usual costume of their rank and order.

"And now we are safe and together," said Anselmo, "I pray thee tell me thy story. Why didst thou keep me waiting so long, and where didst thou rise from at last?"

"That I can tell thee at all, is thy doing," answered his brother: "because thou didst never fail to bring me the lantern."

And then, while the grey Italian shores waxed faint in the sunny distance, and all hearts began to turn towards the new world, whither the vessel was bound, Anselmo's brother descended with him into the cabin, and there told him, with many expressions of affection, the remarkable tale which follows:—

He had, unknown to his brother, made himself obnoxious to the government; and the night of his disappearance he was surrounded, and after making a desperate defence, he was overpowered and thrown into prison. In a dreadful dungeon he lay till his wounds were healed, and then, for some cause unknown to himself, he was given over to the keeping of his deadly enemy: one whose house had long been of the opposite faction to his own. By this enemy he was conveyed to the P—— Palace, and laid in a dungeon, that, as he said, "Nothing it seemed could have broken through, unless his teeth had been strong enough to eat through that wall." Almost every hour in the day his enemy came and looked at him through a hole in the door, his food was given him by means of this aperture, and when he complained of the want of bedding, they gave him, also by means of the hole, a thin mattrass, and two coarse rugs to cover him.

This dungeon contained nothing but one large chest placed against the wall, and half-filled with heavy stones; one of these, he was given to understand, would be tied round his neck should he attempt to escape, and his body would be thrown into the river.

His light in the daytime came through the little slit so often mentioned; but in daylight he could do nothing, for his enemy's eyes were frequently upon him; from twelve o'clock to three in the night were the only hours when all his jailers slept, and then it was dark, and he could do nothing but just feel the strength and thickness of the wall: a hopeless task indeed to break it down with one poor pair of hands!

But, after months of misery and despair, one of the jailers took pity on him, and asked him whether there was anything he could do to help him to endure his captivity better. "Yes," said the poor prisoner;

"I have been a studious man, and if I could now read, it would help me to endure my misery. I dare not read in the daytime, for my enemy would not suffer me to have such a solace; but in the night, if I could have a light in the slit."

The jailer was frightened, and told him not to think of it. Yet, as his prisoner kept urging it, he looked at the height of the slit and its small size, and then, when he had heard the words that were to convey this request for a light, and that they told nothing as to where Anselmo's brother was, he consented to convey them; first getting a solemn promise that he would never attempt to speak to his brother, even if he should find it possible, and, secondly, that he would never betray him.

Whether this jailer felt certain that he never could escape, whether he was not loth to aid in it, or whether he pitied him, and thought no harm could come of the light, is not known; certain it is that he searched the dungeon diligently every night, and examined the iron protection to the slit: it was far above the poor prisoner's head, and when the jailer found it always safe he appeared satisfied. Yet the work of breaking through the wall began the first night of the lantern, and never ceased till it came to a triumphant conclusion.

The great chest, as has been said, was half-full of heavy stones; as soon as the light enabled him to act with certainty and perfect quiet, he laid his mattrass and rugs beside it, opened its lid, took every stone out in turn, and placed it on one of them; he then, exerting all his strength, lifted the chest away, and began to undermine the stones behind it, and under it.

With wonderful skill and caution, he went gradually on; but it took twenty minutes of labour to empty the chest, and twenty minutes to fill it with equal quiet: there remained, therefore, only twenty minutes in which to perform the rest of this herculean labour.

But for the light he must have handled the stones with less certainty, and, of course, the least noise would have caused all to be discovered. How little could be done each night becomes evident, when it is remembered that the stones and rubbish which he displaced had to be put back again, and the chest returned to the same position before the light was withdrawn.

For nine months he made but little progress, and for the next two months the difficulty of disposing of the rubbish daunted him; but the last night, when still far from the surface, though already through the wall, such a quantity of earth heaved in that he swept it down fearlessly upon the floor of his dungeon, and resolved to make a daring effort to escape, and risk all on that one venture. He crept through the hole once more, and shielding his head with one arm, pushed upwards with the other; more and more earth fell, and at last, nearly suffocated, he applied all his strength to the flat stone that it had left bare, heaved it up, and escaped to life and freedom.

Which is most remarkable here?—the trust of the elder brother, who could venture so much on a protracted attention to his letter, or the obedience of the younger to a command which he could not understand?

We can scarcely tell. Yet this story, though widely different in some respects, has one point of resemblance to another narrative far more worthy of credit, but which passes among many for an idle tale, if one may judge by the thoughts that they bestow upon it.

It is the true story of a King's Son, one who saved the lives of many, and reconciled them to his Father whom they had offended. In his wonderful condescension, He called himself their Elder Brother; but after He had long dwelt among them, He one day disappeared from their sight, promising them that after many days He would come again. He sent them a message afterwards, entreating them to watch, and saying "Behold, I come quickly!"

For awhile they did watch; but afterwards it was said in his kingdom which he had left, "Our Lord delayeth his coming, and we are weary of watching, the time is so long. If He had told us the exact day or the exact hour when He would return, we would have been ready, and would have gone out to meet Him with great joy; but we cannot always watch, though He has promised us and done for us so much."

It is a long time now since that message was sent; some dispute its meaning, some say it shall be on this manner, and some on that manner; some have even said, "Those many days must now be drawing near their close."

But, O prisoner, working by night in the light of your brother's candle! O elder brother, who had won such true fraternal love! O friend so trusted in, though not understood, so longed for, though scarcely expected—how differently was your earthly claim admitted—your earthly command obeyed! There was One who said, "Watch, for ye know not the day, neither the hour, when the Son of Man cometh;" and "what I say unto you, I say unto all—Watch!"

But do they Watch?

THE LOVE OF CHRIST.

Oh, Jesus Christ, my light of light!
Who lovest me too well
For mortal thoughts or mortal tongue
To measure or to tell,
Grant that this heart of mine at last
May for Thee in return
With like love burn;
And, wholly Thine, to Thee may cling,
And for Thee only yearn.

Grant that nought else within my soul
But Thy love may abide;
Give me to choose it for my crown,
My portion, and my pride.
Cast those all out, take all away,
That Thee and me would part;
Thy grace impart
Till love of Thee hath set on fire
My spirit, mind, and heart.

Thou art my comfort, treasure, joy,
Art health, life, light, to me.
O deign accept me as Thine own,
Who give myself to Thee.
Apart from Thee is nought but pain,
And bitterness, I know,
For me below;
Nought that can satisfy my hope,
Or soothe me in my woe.

In Thee, however, there is rest,
Is joy and peace indeed;
O Saviour, grant that more and more
My heart may on Thee feed.
Be Thou a flame in me to burn,
A balsam soft and pure
My griefs to cure;
For here I still must sigh and groan,
And toil and pain endure.

Let me in daily life adorn
The love that I profess;
And if my steps should wander, Lord,
Restore them, and redress.
May I both speak and do Thy will,
All good works teach and learn.
Quick to discern
Where I have erred, and to Thy feet
Still quicker to return.

Oh, be Thy love in grief my joy,
In feebleness my power!
And when I lay me down to die
At the appointed hour,
Oh, very present with me then,
Lord Jesus, may I prove
Thy faithful love,
That I may enter, glad and free,
Upon Thy realm above!

OUR FATHER'S BUSINESS; OR, METHODS TO DO GOOD.

BY THE EDITOR.

II.—OUR OBJECT.

The lower animals are not more distinguished from man by their want of sense than by their want of sympathy; less so, perhaps, since some—the dog and elephant, for instance—are remarkably sagacious, and cannot fairly be called irrational creatures. The lower animals have feelings; they have strong feelings, fear, hope, jealousy, envy, hatred, and love. What more, for instance, could any mother do than the hen that, with courage foreign to her usual nature, on observing the hawk in the sky, calls her brood, and, facing the danger, covers them with her wings; or the shaggy bear that, placing her cub behind her, confronts the hunters, and offers her bosom to their spears? But though God has endowed the brute creatures with feeling, they have no fellow-feeling, or sympathy, as it is called. The fat and pampered favourite growls when some poor, gaunt, famished, homeless dog ventures near his heaped and ample trencher. The cattle of our fields browse on, careless of the dying struggles, unmoved by the dying groans, of some fellow of the herd; and so destitute in their natural state do the lower animals seem of fellow-feeling, or anything kin to it, that I have never seen the sufferings of their fellows disturb or interfere in any degree with their ordinary sensual enjoyments. While, in the words of an Apostle, "none of us liveth to himself," they live to themselves: that is one of their most remarkable characteristics; and those, therefore, degrade humanity most, and bring it nearest to the condition of the brutes, who live for themselves, think only of themselves, have no other aim but their own profit and advantage, who, to express their character in one word, are selfish.

But selfishness, that base and degrading passion, is characteristic not only of such as God has never endowed with reason, but of those also who, having had, have lost it. Inside those gloomy walls where pity shelters and science seeks to cure insanity, one of the most common and not least painful aspects of the strange and melancholy scene is, that every one there appears to live for himself. There is a community, numbering hundreds, or thousands perhaps, but little, and, in the worst cases, no communion. Each one walks apart. They take no interest in one another. They laugh, they weep; but there is no infection in their grief or gaiety. Each is occupied with his own thoughts, engrossed with his own imagined wrongs, or states, or pleasures. That is one of the most common and characteristic features of the insane; and they therefore degrade humanity, presenting it in one of its most humbling aspects, who, though not bereft of reason, think only of themselves: and, again, to express their character in one word, are selfish—who, in the language of Scripture, "look not every man upon the things of others, but every man on his own things."

In regard to this, as to other passions, men enter the world distinguished by original differences. With hearts, like instruments so finely strung that they sound to the slightest touch, some have much more sympathy than others; yet all are by nature, to a greater or less degree, both self-willed and selfish. Who, that knows himself, does not feel that, even where this passion is held in most control by reason, and somewhat cured by grace? And what mother has not discovered it—seen the inborn evil breaking out in the temper of her sweetest child? Like a rose-bud with petals opening to the light of day, and bathed in the pearly dews of morning—gentle, playful, love beaming in its eyes, innocence in its winning smile, and with its sweet caresses, as it flings its arms around her neck, winding itself round her heart, there is no object in the world so beautiful in a mother's eyes as her babe; yet she soon learns that what seemed a young angel just lighted, like a sunbeam, on this evil world, is, in fact, a fallen creature, and may become a serpent to sting the bosom it lies on. See how it will have its own way; how it rebels against authority; how its little hand is put out to grasp what is another's; how it grudges to share its pleasures with any one else! Let its will be crossed, and its angry cries, its tears, the struggles of its impetuous though impotent rage, show that selfishness is a bad, base passion, common to every human breast.

Therefore, here, on the very threshold of my subject, I wish to say that a change of heart is an indispensable preliminary to the Christian life—its first step and starting point. Without that, with inborn selfishness unrestrained, unconquered by the power of grace, man cannot attain to the end and objects of the Christian life. To say "Christ liveth in me, and the life that I now live in the flesh I live by the faith of the Son of God, who loved me, and gave himself for me," we must be able to say with Paul, "I am crucified with Christ." To follow the eagle in her flight, we must be furnished with eagles' wings; and to walk in the steps of Him who lived not for himself, nor died for himself, nor rose for himself, nor now reigns for himself, we must be born again, and baptised with the baptism of the Holy Spirit. Who would have the manners, must have the mind that was in Christ.

In opening up our subject, the End or Object, namely, for which Christians should live, I may show what that is by showing what it is not. Well, then, It is not living to ourselves.

This, as I have already said, is to be selfish. And such he is whose horizon, unlike the vast rim of the sea or distant range of snow-crowned Alps, has no wider bounds than self; and whose heart, like a man's coffin, is just his own measure; long enough and broad enough to hold himself—with room for no one else. I have said that such people ally themselves, not to angels, for they minister to them who are heirs of salvation, and, making heaven ring to their songs, rejoice over every sinner that repenteth: nor to Christ, for He went about doing good, and made it his meat and his drink to do, not his own, but his Father's will. They ally themselves to the brute creation, among all which their most perfect type perhaps is the unsocial, low crustacean which bores itself a hole in the sea rock; nor ever leaves that narrow home to expatiate in the freedom of the deep; nor of all God's creatures holds communion with any but itself. Not God, not Christ, not others and others' good, but self is, I cannot say the sun—for that is a glorious object—the centre around which their thoughts, desires, fears, hopes, wishes, all keep turning. Like the whirlpool that sucks in straws and sea-weed, tiny boats, and gallant ships, self swallows up all the interests, great or little, that belong to others in its vast devouring vortex. Voracious as a whirlpool, it is insatiable as the grave; and, crying, Give—give—give—takes all, to render nothing back. If such people are ever converted, like David, they will address God, saying, "I was as a beast before Thee."

Selfishness has worse features still. Regarded in the aspect they present to God, the selfish appear yet more hateful; their ruling passion assumes a yet darker character. It shuts God out of the heart; and turning the soul, once his bright, holy temple, into that dark, dreary, atheistic spot in the universe where He is not, it is to be regarded as the greatest impiety. It thrusts God from his throne, and places man in his room; the true object of every selfish man's worship being himself. Now, for myself, I would rather be a Papist worshipping the Saints, some of whom are stars in heaven—even a blinded Pagan, in stocks and stones, worshipping forms within whose cold breasts no foul passions ever burned, than be the man who is his own God. In his case how foul the temple, and contemptible the divinity? What a contrast to his feelings those of the holy patriarch, as, addressing God, he said, "I have heard of thee by the hearing of the ear, but now mine eye seeth thee. Wherefore I abhor myself, and repent in dust and ashes."

Many, I know, regard selfishness as a mere defect in disposition, no serious or grave offence; but this living to oneself is not only one of the greatest sins against nature, allying us to the beasts that perish—not only one of the greatest sins against our fellow creatures, shutting up our bowels of compassion from them—not only one of the greatest sins against Jesus Christ, who, living and dying for others, says, "If any man will be my disciple, let him take up his cross, deny himself daily, and follow me,"—and not only one of the greatest sins against God, whom it denies and, in a sense, dethrones—but is the seed and sum of all sins whatever. For though sin, Proteus-like, assumes many forms, selfishness is the parent and bitter root of all. Trace sin up to its source, whether in earth or heaven, and it will be found so. The pride that ruined the angels, and cast them from their celestial seats; the ambition that fired our first mother's bosom, and led to the crime that wrecked this fair world and ruined our happiness, may both be traced to self. To the passion which makes our own will man's supreme rule and our own gratification his highest good, we may therefore apply, with the slight change of a single word in each case, the words of Paul and John, these namely, "the love of self is the root of all evil"—"if any man love self, the love of the Father is not in him."

Observe further, that one who, selfishly inclined, lives to himself is not only unlike God and God's Son, the Father who gave the Son, and the Son who, willing to be given, gave himself for us, but is unlike any of God's works. What has the Creator made that exists for itself? Not the sun—bright image of Divine beneficence, he burns to warm, and shines to light the worlds that roll around him. Not the sea—image of Divine fulness, which, furnishing food and a home to innumerable myriads, teems with happy life; and extending its blessings to lands the furthest from its shores, hangs their skies with the clouds that temper the torrid heat, and supply the rains which clothe their hills with forests and their vales with fields of corn. Not, as I will show, the meanest plant that grows—the lichen, for example, which casts its grey mantle over the aged ruin; or appearing but a dusky stain, colours and clothes the rocks. Doomed to decay, like everything that lives on earth, it dies, and turned into dust, becomes a few grains of soil. These, accumulating in the course of time and washed by showers into some fissure, by and by form a suitable seed-bed. Into this, swept by the tempest, or dropped by passing bird, an acorn falls, which germinates; and fed by the lichen dust, grows; and sending out its roots for nourishment, rises at length into a stately oak. This offers a home to the birds of the air that build among its branches, and sheds its fruit to feed the boar and other beasts of the forest. It lives not for itself. Nor dies for itself; for when at length its stately trunk falls, groaning to the woodman's axe, it gives strength and body to the ship that, manned by patriots, thunders on the deep in freedom's battle, or, bearing a flag of peace, and bound on a holy mission, carries to distant shores and savage homes the peaceful heralds of the Cross. And what thus characterises even the meanest of God's works on earth must characterise the highest—which I take to be a renewed, redeemed, sanctified man, one bought with the blood and baptised with the Spirit of Christ. He therefore has, and can have, no pretensions to regard himself as a true Christian who, whatever his Church, or creed, or condition, eaten up of selfishness, lives only, or chiefly, for himself. Unless the same mind be in us that was in Jesus Christ, we are none of his.

Baptised in the Spirit as well as in the blood of Jesus, Christians would not live to themselves though they could; and, on the other hand, there is a sense in which even the selfish could not though they would. Such is every man's influence either for good or evil within the domestic and social circles in which he moves. By way of illustrating that remark, let me tell what happened when a lighthouse was finished which stands eleven miles out at sea in sight of the windows of my old country manse; and in which, whether seen standing erect on its rock by day amid the raging billows, or shining like a star through the gloom of night, to guide ships off the reef and on to their desired haven, always seemed the very type of one who, as a Christian, fills a like blessed office, and rests on a like sure foundation. This, the Bell Rock Lighthouse, is exposed on every side to the full sweep of stormy seas; and with such power do they hurl themselves against it, that, rising on its sides, they often wrap it in a sheet of foam—sometimes send the water in flowing cataract clean over its lofty summit. Now the first storm that tried its strength, entirely shook the confidence of its keepers. What alarmed them was not that the waves running up to the very summit wrapped its sides in foam, and them in darkness; but that the tower when struck by some giant billow, as if struck also with terror and anticipating destruction, trembled from top to bottom. In terror themselves, they hasted with the tidings to the architect, who, to their surprise, received them as "tidings of great joy." He doubted no longer the stability of the fabric. When struck on one part the whole building felt the shock, every stone seemed to sympathise with another, just because every course was firmly fixed to every other course, and the tower, though built of many separate blocks, was bound together as if it were a monolith, one single stone—to use the language of the Psalms, was "compactly built together." And all are thus bound together; to this extent at least, that every man makes his character, his life, his habits felt by others; exerting an influence on all around him either for good or evil.

Indeed the influence which, through the law of sympathy, we exert on others, those above and below, as well as those beside, us, is involved in the very idea of society; and be it a Church, or nation, or family, that community is, as a community, in its most perfect state, where this sympathy is most felt by all its separate members. Hence the answer of the Greek sage to a question often discussed, this namely, "Which is the best form of government?"—an autocracy with all power vested in one person; or an aristocracy where the power of government is divided among a few leading men; or a democracy where, often swayed hither and thither by fitful gusts of sudden passion, the multitude rule?—The best government, said Plato, is that under which the meanest citizen can suffer no wrong, but all the rest will feel it.

This noble utterance of heathen lips, another form of the inspired expression "no man liveth to himself," enunciates a grand principle which runs through the Divine government, and forms the very life and soul of practical Christianity. What saith the Scriptures? "Pure religion and undefiled before God and the Father is this, To visit the fatherless and widows in their affliction, and to keep himself unspotted from the world." And to what a great extent are the evils that now afflict society due to the neglect of this principle?—traceable to this, that people, forgetting the duties they owed to others, have lived to themselves. For long years the upper classes, if not, as in many other countries, treading the lower under foot, treated them with neglect; and, though mistaken, as events are proving, fancied that, separated by a great gulf from the vulgar throng, they might move in their higher spheres, living to themselves. Making money or enjoying its pleasures, the middle and wealthier classes left the poor, unpitied and unhelped, to struggle on, and at length sink by thousands into degradation and destitution—they also refused to be regarded as their brother's keepers, thinking that they could safely indulge their selfishness. Alas! even Christian churches, I am sorry to add, fostering unseemly jealousies, and wasting their strength on wretched quarrels, also lived for themselves; often subordinating the high claims of souls to the petty interests of a sect.

"Shall I not visit for these things, saith the Lord? shall not my soul be avenged on such a nation as this?" He has done so. How have our sins found us out? By the drunkenness that is our national disgrace, by the gross ignorance, the brutal manners, and godless habits of great masses of the people; by prisons full of criminals, and workhouses full of paupers; by the burdens which indolence entails on industry, and crime on virtue; by the prostitution that walks, and the drunkards that reel, along our streets; by the vast numbers, amounting in London alone, for example, to a million and a half, who never enter a house of God, God is teaching us that the laws of the moral are as sure as those of the material world—those that govern the tides of ocean or the seasons of the year; and that, since no man liveth to himself, one of these moral laws is this, that, if we neglect the duties we owe to others, whether they belong to our family, or our neighbourhood, or to society in general, not they only, but we ourselves shall suffer for it in the end. Crimes committed against, as well as benefits bestowed on others, like bread cast on the waters, come back many days hence.

And now, though it anticipates what properly belongs to another branch of the subject, I would here answer the question which, prompted by a feeling that they have lived too much to themselves and missed the grand end of a Christian life, some may be ready to ask, in the words of that grand old cry, "Men and brethren, what shall we do?" Well, every man and woman on this earth have their mission; and having to seek, not only our own salvation and welfare, but the salvation, welfare, happiness, and advantage of others also, there is none who may not adopt the words of Nehemiah, saying, "I have a great work to do!" Divine grace is equal to it, if you go about it wisely—"My grace shall be sufficient for you," says God. Now you have a post in this life assigned to you, keep it; a field of labour, cultivate it; a sphere of usefulness, public, or private, or both perhaps, fill it with light; opportunities of doing good, improve them—remembering that as there is not one within reach of your voice, who sleeps beneath the same roof, who works in the same shop or field, who worships in the same church, who is embraced within the wide or narrow arms of the same social circle, over whom you may not exert an influence for evil, who may not be the worse of your company, so there is none who may not be the better of it, over whom you may not have an influence for good. Your influence may be small, but so is the candle which burns in a cottage window; yet at what a long distance is it seen, and how large the sphere it fills with light? I know a man, for instance, who at the close of each day's work, turned his steps to the prison, and with his Bible on his knees, or on his knees on the floor, spent the evening hours in its gloomy cells; seeking to instruct the ignorant, and reclaim the criminal, and raise the fallen. The judgment day shall show how many he restored, penitent and pardoned, to the bosom of God; but it is certain that, alone and single-handed, he rescued and reformed four hundred criminals; restoring them, honest and well-doing men, to the bosom of society. What life-boat, pulled by strong hands through roaring breakers to sinking ship and drowning men, ever made a rescue like that? Yet that was the work of a man in humble life; without name, or influence, or rank, or more than ordinary talents; but with love to men such as burned in the heart that was pierced and broken on the Cross of Calvary. Now, before he dies, let every Christian go down, as it were, to the shore to pluck the drowning from the flood—in some poor sinner whom he is blessed to save, let him find at least one gem to shine and sparkle in his heavenly crown.

Here, ingratitude may be the chief return the large and loving-hearted meet for their labours of love; but be assured that though man forgets you, your Master will not. It is they who glorify God, who shall enjoy Him; they who deny themselves, who shall not be denied; they who labour on earth, who shall rest in heaven; they who bear the cross, who shall wear the crown; they who seek to bless others, who shall be blessed; nor is there a prayer you offer, one good word you drop, a work of mercy you undertake, a tear you shed for sinners, a loaf you carry to a poor man's door, a cup of water, even a kind look given to human sorrow, that shall be forgotten. All are recorded in the Chronicles of the Kingdom, and shall be acknowledged in the presence of an assembled universe, when, unnoticed and unknown no longer, you bend your head for the blood-bought crown, and Christ, as He places it on immortal brows, says, Thus it shall be done to the man whom the King delighteth to honour! That day will show that the true way for a man to live was not to live to himself but to others; that, paradox as it sounds, the way for a man never to be forgotten is to forget himself. He will be no loser by that. The sun is not less resplendent, for all the light he sheds when he sinks in the golden west; nor the sea, when she roars along the shore, less full, for all the showers she gives; nor the rose, the lily, or the jessamine less fragrant, for all the odours they fling on the passing breeze; nor the earth leaner, but fatter, for the cattle that tread its pastures, and the harvests that are borne from its fields; and even so it will be found that they who have lived most for others have lived best for themselves. The God whose glory, not their own, they sought shall not forget to glorify them; and, rewarding what they did for others as done to himself, their Judge shall say, "Inasmuch as ye did it to one of the least of them, ye did it unto me." May their character, as thus painted by the poet, be ours!—

> Far other aims his heart had learned to prize,
> More bent to raise the wretched than to rise.
> * * * * *
> Thus to relieve the wretched was his pride,
> And even his failings leaned to virtue's side;
> But in his duty prompt, at every call
> He watched and wept, he prayed and felt for all:
> And as a bird each fond endearment tries
> To tempt its new-fledged offspring to the skies,
> He tried each art, reproved each dull delay,
> Allured to brighter worlds, and led the way.

THE CONFESSIONS OF KING SOLOMON.

One who reads the Book of Ecclesiastes carefully, must be struck, I believe, by the comparative absence of anything that would indicate that he was reading the confessions of a repentant Israelite. Acknowledgments of the vanity of all the works and sorrows of men, no less than of their delights and joys; the recognition of an eternal law of duty abiding for ever, while all things else change, or seem to change; warnings to the young to profit by the experience of one who has struggled out of the "evil nets" into which they are rushing blindly,—this we have abundantly. But this might come, we are tempted to say, from a heathen moralist. This is not the language of one who is conscious that he belongs to a peculiar people, who rests his hopes upon the covenant which God has made with his fathers. We look for the belief in the God of Abraham, and Isaac, and Jacob, in one who was called to be the ruler of Israel, for some sign that the sure mercies of David were not forgotten by his son,—that he, the Preacher, remembered that he was the heir of the glorious and wonderful promises that were made to his father. We are compelled to confess that we can discover nothing of the kind. The sadness with which we read those confessions of a wasted life is mingled with wonder when we reflect that this was he whose youth must have been passed amid the minstrelsy of the Temple, and to whom the songs of the sweet Psalmist of Israel must have been familiar things. There is a strange contrast between the language of the father and the son. The shepherd-boy, whose early years were spent in hardship, and war, and danger; who had no certain dwelling-place, and encountered hunger and nakedness, and perils of water and of robbers—perils of his own countrymen, and of false brethren; who wandered as an outlaw in the wilderness of Judah, and sought refuge in dens and caves of the earth; to whom a crown brought nothing but a heavier burden and a deeper sorrow; whose old age was darker than his youth, and whose grey hairs were brought down with sorrow to the grave by the evil life and miserable death of the son whom he most loved;—he never lost, even for a moment, his trust in the perpetual loving presence of the God in whom he had believed. The Lord was still his shepherd, his shield and defence, his strong tower and his rock. "Goodness and mercy," he said, "had followed him all the days of his life." He felt sure that the same "rod and staff" would be with him in the "valley of the shadow of death." The last utterance of his failing strength is full of the recollections of his youth, speaks of the same power of perceiving and enjoying the Divine beauty of nature, its wonderful loveliness or terror, as that of which the Psalms are full. The old man, whose life is fast passing away, feeble and cold and dying, has a vision of "the light of the morning, when the sun riseth, even a morning without clouds; as the tender grass springing out of the earth by clear shining after rain." (2 Sam. xxiii. 4.) Whether this glory is to be realised in his own house and his own kingdom he knows not, yet he can depart in peace, believing that it is no deceitful dream, no mocking, transient brightness. There is an "everlasting covenant;" that is "all his salvation and all his desire."

What the life of the son was, how it led him to scepticism and scorn, is known to us all. The child of peace, the beloved of the Lord, living in security, triumphing almost without an effort over his rivals, crowned with all gifts of mind and spirit, living in the midst of a more than kingly magnificence, says nothing of the everlasting covenant, makes no acknowledgment of, utters hardly a prayer to, his Father in the heavens. The highest truths do not go beyond the recognition that there is, in spite of all appearances that contradict it, a righteous and Divine order, or the belief that it is the duty of men to "fear God and keep His commandments."

It seems almost a truism to infer from this contrast the blessedness of a life of trial and suffering, the danger of one of unbroken prosperity and ease. And yet here, as in so many other instances, a truism is only a disregarded truth, one which does not cease to be true, but which we do not choose to acknowledge as we ought to do. This is the great lesson of all experience. "It is good for men that they should be afflicted," for thus "they learn the statutes of God." (Ps. cxix. 71.) It is because this is the tendency of suffering, that it comes so largely into the discipline by which the children of God are perfected, so that "whom the Lord loveth He chasteneth, and scourgeth every son whom He receiveth." (Heb. xii. 6.) There are no times so likely to lead men to trust in the Everlasting Arms as those in which the arm of flesh fails them utterly; none in which they can learn so truly that their strength is in "quietness and confidence," as those in which they find that the reed on which they have leant has broken beneath their hand, and pierced it. And we, who live in easy circumstances, and to whom, in the common course of things, our daily life brings no hardships or dangers, have great need to remember how very close an utter godlessness may lie to that outward regularity. If we set our hearts on the treasures of earth, or its joys, or put our trust in princes, or in any child of men, we shall discover, sooner or later, that these idols of our souls come between us and God. Our perceptions of the truths which we profess will become ever fainter and dimmer. What wonder, if our lives are so utterly unlike what Christ's life was, that we should cease to understand his gospel, and have therefore but a formal and shallow belief in it?

But the history of the Preacher has a more definite and a deeper meaning in it. It shows us that the special tendency of the life which he had led, a life, be it remembered, of intellectual activity, as well as one full of the pride of life and the pleasures of gratified desires, is to tear up by the roots a man's hereditary faith, and all the hope and confidence that are bound up with it. Those hopes, the clear, undoubting trust, the unclouded apprehension of the truths which he has been taught in childhood, are treasures which it is easy to cast aside—difficult, almost impossible, to regain. The man who, by scorning the image of God in himself, or in his brethren, has lost the power of perceiving the brightness of that image manifested in the Only-begotten of the Father, will find that all the words and phrases which expressed his faith in the Incarnation become empty technicalities to him. They will seem the dreariest fragments that could be gathered by men who had no human hearts in them, out of the débris of bygone controversies. And so, again, with other truths. The practical living denial of a Father in heaven, who wills that we should be pure as He is pure, and perfect as He is perfect, will be sure to end in a mist and darkness of vision through which the whole faith in the possibility of a regenerate life will seem the most unreal of all chimeras. Lose the clue of the desire to do the will of God, and you are lost in the labyrinth of human systems. The "double-minded man," the man whose life is a contradiction and a lie against his knowledge, is "unstable in all his ways." (James i. 8.)

And yet it may be that, even here, there is a remedy for the evil. In God's storehouse there are many remedies. The book of Ecclesiastes tells us how one, over whom the disease had gained the greatest power, was delivered from its thraldom. The cure was not rapid. It could hardly be that, when the corruption was so deeply seated. It might not seem so complete as that which those who minister to a soul diseased expect to see following all at once from the application of their infallible panaceas; but it was God's work of healing, and therefore the true one, and there was hope. Of the discipline by which it was accomplished the book tells us clearly. We see, even early in the course, signs that life is struggling with death, even where at first we discerned nothing but hatred and scorn. The thought that "wisdom excelleth folly" (Eccles. ii. 13), that there is a Divine light, alternates strangely enough with the accents of hopelessness. It was something to recognise that the calm enjoyment which at one time seemed to him the highest end of life, must come from God; better still, to acknowledge that "God giveth to a man that is good in his sight, wisdom, and knowledge, and joy." (Eccles. ii. 24—26.) Even the vanity of human purposes, the vexation of all human spirits, led his mind, at last, beyond the thought of an unchangeable Nature to that of an unchangeable God. "I know this," he said, "that, whatsoever God doeth, it shall be for ever: nothing can be put to it, nor any thing taken from it: and God doeth it, that men should fear before him." (Eccles. iii. 14.)

We may be quite sure that one who had lived the life that Solomon had, who had been hailed as the builder of a Temple, and the protector of a Faith; whom priests and Levites served and flattered, but had not the courage to reprove, would hear from them many excellent words on the duties of religion, the importance of the worship of the sanctuary. It may be that these thoughts of God that were rising in his mind after his long wanderings in the mire of sensuality, and his enlarged experience of all that the religious consciousness of mankind could devise for its own alleviation, led him of his own accord to think of the solemn services in which he had once taken so prominent a part. Might he not once again become as one of those humble worshippers, and behold God's power and glory as he had seen them in the sanctuary? What did he see there? What did he learn from the established worship of his country? Alas! there also he found a hollowness from which his whole heart revolted, which was more intolerable than his own indulgence in luxury or pursuit of wisdom. "The sacrifices of fools" who "considered not that they did evil;" men who were "rash with their mouths" and "hasty with their lips;" a "multitude of words" which were not the overflowing of a full heart, but the utterance of a fool's voice, proclaiming the emptiness of his soul; vows which men need not have made, and which, when made, they did not keep, dreams and vanities;—this was what he saw in the courts of the Lord's house, in the midst of the holy city. (Eccles. v. 1—6.) There was no strength or comfort in this. It was far better to remember that God was in heaven, and his worshipper on earth, and so to let his words be few.

It is impossible, I think, to look on the connection of the parts of the fifth chapter as accidental. The thought of the "oppressions that were done under the sun" recurs again, and follows immediately on the words of indignation with which he had spoken of the hypocrites and formalists. They, we must believe, those self-same boastful worshippers, were the men from whom proceeded the "violent perverting of judgment and justice." They went from the sacrifice of fools to judge unrighteous judgment—to receive gifts, and to drive wise men mad. They sought to grasp for themselves the "profit of the earth, which was for all," and loved silver and abundance. All this was wretched enough; but as he looked deeper, he saw something that seemed like a law of compensation, some faint signs at least of a Divine retribution: the rich oppressor was clearly not one whit better for all his riches,—gained nothing by his treasures but the "beholding of them with his eyes." (Eccles. v. 11, 12.) The labouring man did not suffer so much as might at first appear. He might have more freedom, more tranquillity and health and enjoyment, than the ruler who trampled on him. Yet, after all, this was an unsatisfactory solution of the problem. Unless it led the way to something better than itself, it could not prevent the recurrence of the old feeling, that all society was corrupt, "that vanity and an evil disease" pervaded it altogether, that an equal darkness covered the beginning and the end of life. (Eccles. vi. 1—5.) What it did teach him was to feel with and for the sufferers, to know that "sorrow was better than laughter," that it was "better to go to the house of mourning than to the house of feasting" and of mirth, to admire the patient in spirit, while he owned the power of the wrongs of society to cause madness in the heart even of the wise. (Eccles. vii. 2—7.) That was, we may well imagine, a wonderful step in the life of this king, who had gathered "silver and gold, and men-singers and women-singers, and the delights of the sons of men;" who dwelt in his kingly palaces, with gardens and orchards and pools of water to minister to his enjoyment. Yet such a change is not singular in the spiritual history of men. The history of the monastic orders brings before us many examples of it. There may be that now in the hearts of men which is more analogous to it than we imagine. Men, after wasted years and riotous living, come to themselves again, and with their faith all unsettled and doubts unremoved, are content to work for and among the sufferers from the world's wrong, or from the evils that seem to come on men from time and chance. They are tempted at first, as the Preacher was, to ask many questions. They seek to know "why the former days were better than the latter." Then they remember that to ask this is to inquire unwisely. (Eccles. vii. 10.) It is better to go on in their work and labour of love; not to "withdraw their hand" from that, however they may despair of solving the problem of the universe. One thing they are learning to believe; the house of suffering and the patient in spirit teach them this : that "he that feareth God cometh forth of them all." (Eccles. vii. 18.) We may hope (this is the blessing which the Preacher's confessions leave with us) that they will go further. It may be that truth will yet dawn on them more brightly, and that they will walk in its light. It may be that they will one day hear the words, which to them will come with the fulness of a surprise that they cannot have for him whose faith has been clear and unshaken, who has consciously been serving Christ in ministering to his poor : "Forasmuch as ye did it unto one of the least of these my brethren, ye did it unto me."

We have seen that the work of healing is advancing rapidly ; there is life struggling against death, hope against despair. But there are (how untrue the book would be to all human experience, if there were not !) relapses into the old state. Once again the answer he is in search of seems far off, and exceeding deep, so that he cannot find it. He is compelled to renew that analysis of the reason of things, and of the wickedness of folly, even of foolishness and madness, in in which he had so often been baffled. (Eccles. vii. 11—25.)

And there is a terrible significance in that which now forms the hindrance. He is thrown back by the dark visions of remembered sins. What had been once is acted over again in the chambers of memory, and he thinks of one "more bitter than death," whose heart was as a snare and net ; and her, and those like her, who rise up before him, it may be, from the darkness of the grave, he remembers, not with infinite shame and infinite compassion, but only with scorn and railing, with bitter words, which remind us of all that is most hateful in the sensualist poets of Greece or Rome (Eccles. vii. 26) ; and therefore he treads the old circle once again, and the mists become thicker, and the blackness gathers. One truth, indeed, he bears away with him. The evil was his own choice, not God's creation. "God made men upright ; but they have sought out many inventions" (Eccles. vii. 29) ; but as regards his hope and steadfastness he has gone back. That thought of scorn, that bitterness, in which there is a loathing of evil, but no true repentance, has undone the effect of the works of sympathy and help. Doubts once again rush in on him. Their course is stemmed for a time by the thought that it shall be well with them that fear God, not well with them who fear Him not. Experience shows him how true this is in the long run in life. In spite of all anomalies there is a Divine government ; the evil-doer is not happy,—the sufferer may be ; the calm and contented life of one who fears God and loves man presents the picture of a perfect blessedness. But then death comes, with its cold crushing equality—the great leveller, and therefore, as it seemed to him, the greatest of all anomalies. All things alike to all, "one event to the righteous and the wicked, to the clean and to the unclean, to him that sacrificeth, and to him that sacrificeth not"—this was an evil that went through all things. This put "madness in their heart." Their love, and their hatred, and their envy perish with them. "There is no work, nor device, nor knowledge, nor wisdom in the grave, whither all men go." (Eccles. viii. 12 ; ix. 6.)

It would be untrue to say that these doubts represent the permanent faith either of Solomon, or of any other Israelite. It would be equally untrue to assert that the life and immortality which were brought to life through the Gospel, came before his mind with the same unclouded brightness as that in which they are seen by one who believes in Christ, and knows that he is a child of God. But he did rise out of the doubts and the deadness and coldness in which they had plunged him. The faith in a Divine order, in a righteous retribution, grew stronger and stronger. Nothing was wasted, nothing lost sight of in the book of God's remembrance. No evil deed went unpunished. That he had found out long ago the ways of the young man's heart, which seemed so full of delight, led him to the days of darkness. The old age of the king, who had lived in the selfishness of the pleasure-seeker (the old age, Solomon must have said to himself, which is in store for me), was in itself a judgment, an augury he could not ignore, of one which lay beyond it. The evil days had come, the years were drawing nigh in which he must say, "I have no pleasure in them." The power to perceive, and the power to enjoy, depart with the gathering of the years. "The keepers of the house tremble, the strong men bow themselves, and the daughters of music are brought low, and fears are in the way." And then comes the end : the loosing of the "silver cord" of life, the breaking of the "golden bowl" of sense, the drying up of the "fountain" and the "cistern" from which it had been so often filled, and then "the dust returned to the earth as it was, and the spirit returned to God who gave it." (Eccles. xii. 1—7.)

But then there was a Divine recompense also. No righteous or loving deed, done with a righteous and loving heart, should be without its fruit. His mercy to the poor and afflicted had taught him that. The bread might be "cast upon the waters," but after many days it should be found. It was idle, and therefore sinful, to wait for special occasions of doing good, to watch for some great calamities before making any effort to relieve the sufferers. It was idle to waste a life in observing the clouds and regarding the wind. The clouds would "empty themselves when they were full of rain." The tree would "fall to the south or the north," as the wind should blow it. It was the work and the blessedness of a man to be doing good perpetually, and trusting the issue of it to God ; in the morning to "sow his seed," and in the evening not to "withhold his hand"—and then in due season he should reap. That was true, whatever else might be deceitful. His spirit also returned to God. (Eccles. xi. 1—4.) There, in that presence, stript of all disguises, receiving each of them a righteous judgment, should every work and every secret thing, whether it be good or evil, be brought to light. The Divine order was not confined within the time-limits of a human life. Death did not destroy it, was not the great anomaly. How or in what way he knew not, but all that he had felt and known of the blessedness of God's servants, of the curse in which they involve themselves who turn aside from Him, acquired an infinite depth and power for him. He had dug deep, had gone through all the crusts of sensuality, doubt, perplexity, misery, despondency, but he had come at last to a rock, and out of that rock flowed the water of life. He was content not to answer the questions which had haunted him. He turned in utter weariness from the many books and the much study in which he had expected to find an answer. Now he was following a Divine light; it was a Divine voice that he heard proclaiming to him and to all men, "Fear God, and keep his commandments: for this is the whole duty of man." (Eccles. xii. 12—14.)

This may seem to us, as I said, a very inadequate result, unworthy of a devout Israelite. It falls far short of the faith of David. It is still further distant from that of a believer in the Gospel. We should be tempted to look on one who declared solemnly that the experience of a long life had taught him to acknowledge the sovereignty of God and the eternal law of duty as speaking the language of a heathen. For such a one we should have little hope, it may be a harsh condemnation.

I give thanks that the record of this book teaches us to suspend, if not to reverse, our judgment. I believe that the old man who, when his strength and his wisdom were failing him, took refuge in this hope, and rested on this truth, was better, stronger, wiser, safer,—if you like to introduce the idea of safety,—than he whom the Queen of Sheba came to visit; who poured forth that wonderful prayer at the dedication of the Temple. For great as the truths were which he proclaimed, and marvellously as he rose to the perception of their harmony with each other, there was a subtle danger in all that eloquence and skill of speech. The very act of worship might soon pass into a display of his own wisdom, not the acknowledgment of an Infinite Wisdom, by which he was seeking to be taught. The intellect analyses truth, and may come to look on the truths as its own creations, or they may seem unable to bear the search, and vanish like the cloud-wreaths of the morning. And so that which seemed firmly grasped will slip away from us. Because we never knew the truths in their power, because they were things for us to talk about and boast of, we suffer the due reward of our transgressions when we find even our acts of worship full of vanities and dreams. It is a gain and blessing unspeakable when we are able once again to hold one truth firmly, and to feel that that is real, divine, eternal. Better to know that in its power than to profess a whole creed with the carelessness of a pleasure-seeker, or the keenness of a controversialist.

And the blessedness of thus apprehending any one article of faith is, that it must needs lead on to others. The words, "Fear God, and keep his commandments," were the simplest of all precepts, and yet one who fixed his heart on them, and strove to live in them, would find himself led perpetually into new regions of truth, new convictions of sin, new forms of holiness. To fear God, not at stated times and in solemn worship only, but evermore; at morning and at noonday and in the evening; speaking or acting; in secret thoughts and unrevealed desires; not with the false fear of a slave or hireling, but with the true loving fear of children; to feel that his commandments are "exceeding broad;" that no man is free from them; that they give freedom, and set a man's heart at liberty,—what might not these thoughts teach to the humbled and contrite heart? Would they in the end leave him so far behind? Would there not be growth, from faith to faith, and grace to grace; a perpetual increase of light, shining more and more brightly unto the perfect day? May we not hope that it was so for the Preacher? May we not hope that it is so for those who, as he did, have turned from the true wisdom that is of God to the harlotry of sense and selfishness, and then find themselves in doubt and perplexity, and then turn with true sympathy to works of love and mercy, and then seize on one great truth, and live on it and in it? May we not hope that it will be so for ourselves, so far as our temptations of the sense or of the intellect have been like his?

Certain, at any rate, we may be, that this is the Divine method of recovery. The simplest words which we were taught in childhood, the acknowledgment that we have a Father in heaven, that we are justified by faith, that we are reconciled by the blood of Christ,—any one of these, if we grasp it firmly, will sustain us safely, and by it we may escape from the abyss of doubt in which we have wandered—from the destruction which lies beyond it. WRITTEN FOR A SICK BOY.

BY HIS FATHER.

Come, Expectation, come!
In thy full radiance clad;
Come in thy soothing loveliest guise;
Come, thou fair angel, from the skies,
My mournful heart make glad.
May I recline
Beneath thy shrine,
And round my joyful brow thy peaceful emblem twine.

My fancy flies away
Before thy sacred tread;
My meditation, from this room,
Hears unappalled the solemn doom,
And soars above the dead.
And though a tear
By chance appear,
Yet I can smile, and say, "My hopes do not end here."

Come, Expectation, come!
Hence shall I ne'er be hurl'd.
With humble hope of sin forgiven,
I raise my dying eyes to heaven—
I look beyond this world;
I turn my eye
From vanity,
And gaze on scenes of bliss supreme, which never die.

"And though a tear
By chance appear,
Yet I can smile, and say, My hopes do not end here."

True friendship's genial power
Survives the transient day ;
Its memory ne'er is obsolete,
Still it is sweet, 'tis passing sweet—
'Tis never gone away.
Nor does the shade
In memory fade,
When in the tomb on earth the form is laid.

This world is empty, vain,
And volatile, and fleet :
I haste to endless heavenly joys,
Where never rust nor moth destroys,
Where we again shall meet.
Borne on Faith's wing,
I rise, and sing—
Grave ! where's thy victory ? Death ! where's thy sting ?

Come, Expectation, come !
How sweet thou art to me !
Blest herald ! now I own thy sway,
Since glory beams with heavenly ray,
And shines my fears away.
When time is done,
Life's but begun—
Then may I joyful say, "My God ! Thy will be done."

THE BIBLE

"Holy men of God spake as they were moved by the Holy Ghost."—2 Peter i. 21.

THAT is the Scriptural way of stating the great doctrine, that the Bible is inspired ; that the Bible is the Word of God. And you remark the grand simplicity and directness of the statement. The Confession of Faith has done well, in that it has followed the example of Scripture in this matter. It tells us, that "Under the name of Holy Scripture, or the Word of God written, are now contained all the Books of the Old and New Testaments : all which are given by inspiration of God, to be the rule of faith and life." There are matters, as you know, in which the Confession of Faith sets out Christian doctrine in very minute detail : but in dealing with the vital doctrine of the Inspiration of God's Word, it has wisely imitated the breadth of statement, the simplicity, the directness, of God's Word itself.

"Given by inspiration of God," says that venerable standard of our Church : using, I need not tell you, the very words of Scripture. "Holy men of God spake as they were moved by the Holy Ghost," says the great Apostle Peter. No doubt both these texts were written at the first with special reference to certain portions of God's Word. St. Paul wrote that "All Scripture is given by inspiration of God," at a time when the Old Testament was all that was understood by "Scripture:" and St. Peter's words do particularly refer to the prophets, and what they foretold. But it needs only to be said, that these things are in their spirit written of the entire Bible ; and are so to be understood by us. And this being so, observe how general, simple, and large the statements of both Apostles are. Equally so are all the statements the Bible contains as to its own divine authority and origin. It would be well if all Christian people always dealt with God's blessed Word in the same reverent, teachable, earnest spirit. This is not the place for metaphysical subtleties or logical quibbles. It is far too grave, solemn, and vital a thing for these. And abundant experience has made it very plain, that no good comes of going into exact details ; or of trying to set out the rationale of what transcends our reason,—the way in which the Holy Ghost worked upon the brain—upon the heart and soul of men, so as to make their utterances or their writings in very deed the Word of God. Let us hold by this, and we shall be safe : that the Bible is indeed the Word of God : that it is God's message to us : that it contains truth without mixture of error : that it is the only infallible rule of faith and of life : that it contains everything needful for salvation : that nothing is to be added to it, and nothing taken from it. The Holy Spirit speaks to us in Holy Scripture : we can understand that : let us hold by that : how He does so is not revealed, and so we cannot tell. We will not go into those unprofitable and soul-wearying questions into which some would lead us, and which have occasionally been handled by men whom we must regard as orthodox, in a manner as mischievous and vexatious as they ever have been by the most unsound of theologians : we will not be led into questions of degree and method of inspiration : we recognise no difference between the inspiration of this part of Holy Scripture and that. All Scripture is equally to be trusted to. All Scripture is equally God's message to you, and me, and all. We believe it all. We accept it all. In whatever mode God was pleased to inspire the writers of the many books which make the Bible, the result is that the Bible is God's Word, containing God's truth : and we may rely on all it tells us. As for the way in which this comes to be, we never can speak of it in words more certainly true as stating a theory, and probably we never can come nearer to the conveying of an intelligible idea, than when we keep by the safe and true statements of Scripture itself ; and say, with St. Paul, that "All Scripture is given by inspiration of God ;" or with St. Peter, that "Holy men of God spake as they were moved by the Holy Ghost."

We are all well assured that the supernatural influences of that Divine Spirit do still, in every Christian man and woman, weave in with the natural workings of soul and mind, of heart and head. When the Blessed Spirit helps us to pray, He avails Himself of our natural faculties : of our memory, of our perception of things which may befall us, of our capacity of feeling, trusting, and loving. And thus, of the great number of prayers which we may humbly trust are every day prompted by the Spirit of all prayer, each differs, doubtless, from all the rest: each bears the impress of the nature, of the heart and mind, of the human being that offers it. The prayer is the prayer of the Holy Spirit: but it is also the individual and characteristic prayer of this man, of that woman, of that little child. Now, you know, it is exactly so with that higher, grander, and less lasting communication of the Holy Spirit which God has vouchsafed to the few among his servants, as with those commoner gifts of the same Divine Being which are not for one age, but for all time, and not for Apostles and Prophets only, but for all saints. It is exactly so with that rarer gift which we call Inspiration, as with the sanctifying, comforting, prayer-prompting communications for which ordinary Christians ask and look, day by day. You know how the inspired writers of the Bible retain their individuality; and how, amid a singular central resemblance that makes us know a verse of the Bible when we hear it, even if we are not familiar with the words, and that testifies to the common origin in the mind of the same Divine Spirit, we still mark each writer's idiosyncrasy: the whole tone of thought and feeling, and even the turns of expression, which are characteristic of him. St. Paul does not write the least like St. John: St. Luke writes quite differently from either, and St. Peter from all three. And yet, do you not feel, that there is a something which belongs to them all: and that belongs to each and all of the many men that wrote the Bible? One breath has breathed upon them, one hand has touched them all! Moses, Job, David, Isaiah, John and Peter, Luke and Paul—there is a something that they all have, and that no uninspired writer possesses one trace of. No one who knows the characteristic atmosphere of those pages, the fresh breeze that breathes upon us as we read our Bibles, will ever be mystified or perplexed by what you may find men say and write as to the identity of the genius of Shakspere for instance (to take the highest and first reach of man's own head and heart), and of David, of Isaiah, of St. John, of St. Paul. O brethren, it is a different thing here altogether! Not that any sane person would put the case, as an ingenious American writer has, that David and Isaiah needed God's help to write, while Shakspere could do without it: not that any sane person doubts that all intellect and all genius are the gift of God: but that the inspiration of God's Word—God's Word that contains no error, that teaches nothing that is wrong, that could not possibly be imagined to exert upon men's hearts any influence but a healthful and good one, that speaks with authority upon all the solemn realities of time and eternity—is millions of miles away from mere human genius—often groping in the dark, often blundering into fatal error, often exerting an influence the most baneful on those whom it influences at all, and at its very best drawing the better part of what light there is in it from the pages of the Bible however indirectly or unconsciously. In a certain loose way, we may speak of the inspiration of the poet, the orator, the painter: and it would be mere pedantry to quarrel with a phrase so well understood in the main. But never forget, that differing not in degree but in kind—differing essentially, vitally, altogether—is the true, holy, divine inspiration of the men who wrote the Bible; and concerning whom the great Apostle Peter certifies us, that "Holy men of God spake as they were moved by the Holy Ghost."

And we are to distinguish, likewise, between the supreme inspiration thus described, and the ordinary and still-continuing gifts of the Holy Spirit. I believe, most sincerely, that many pages have been written by good Christian people, under the direction, and under the warming, elevating influence of the Holy Ghost. I believe that many a word has been wisely and kindly spoken in a moment of difficulty and perplexity, after an instant's silent prayer for the blessed Spirit's guidance—spoken so wisely and kindly just because the blessed Spirit quickened the memory, warmed the heart, prompted the right word at the right time. I believe there is no blessing that we are more sure to get from God, if we heartily ask, than the inestimable communications—help, guidance, light, warmth, comfort, peace—of the blessed Holy Spirit. I will say, indeed, that there seems to me something more than an error in taste in the usage of a small sect of excellent Christian people, whose members are accustomed to preface many very unimportant statements they make, by saying that "the Spirit moves them" to say such and such things. It may be that they are indeed moved by the blessed Spirit: but without a special miracle they cannot be sure that they are: and it was well said by a most acute divine, that if any man were quite sure that the Spirit did move him to say anything, he might begin his utterance by saying, "Thus saith the Lord." In the main, if we ask the guidance of the Holy Spirit, we shall receive it. But any one who knows something of the prejudices, the biases, the passions, the sinfulness and foolishness of human nature, will be cautious of believing that any word or deed is truly prompted by the Holy Ghost, unless that deed, or word, be in very strict accordance with what we know for certain of his blessed mind from the more sure page of the written Word. But, returning from this digresssion, let me ask you to fix this in your minds: that there is a vital difference between those ordinary communications of the Holy Spirit—which convey no infallibility, which do not make it sure that he who receives them will never fall into error, or even into sin—and that higher and rarer gift of the same blessed One, which gives God's authority and God's infallibility to the words spoken by man. I firmly believe, when I am told by one of the noblest and most single-hearted of all living philanthropists, that she never would speak in circumstances of difficulty or perplexity without a moment's prayer for the Holy Ghost's direction,—I firmly believe that the wonderful wisdom, fitness, and readiness with which she has many a time spoken comfort to the despairing heart and light to the perplexed, were indeed dictated truly by that blessed and wisest Director; but still there is a wide and broad difference between that guidance which you and I may get for the asking (God be thanked), and the true inspiration of those few among our race concerning whom St. Peter tells us that "Holy men of God spake as they were moved by the Holy Ghost."

And now, having said so much as to the nature of the inspiration of the Bible, let me suggest to you some thoughts upon God's Word generally.

The Bible, remember, is the Word of God. It not merely contains the Word of God, as in some sense all things do—for "the heavens declare the glory of God; and the firmament showeth his handiwork: day unto day uttereth speech, and night unto night showeth knowledge" concerning Him: and a great theologian has made man's bodily frame tell us plainly many things as to the wisdom, goodness, and power of its Maker: the Bible not merely contains the Word of God: it is the Word of God. It does not give us some grains of Divine truth, some messages really sent by God to man, amid a great mass of statements proceeding from man's own wit and fancy: it is—all—God's truth and God's Word. It is the flower and crown of all God's revelation to man: everything that we can read, or fancy we read, on the pages of Nature or Providence, we find far more plainly stated in the Bible; and we find a vast deal more. We find, there, things most needful unto salvation, about which earth and sea and stars are dumb. We find the message of salvation through a crucified Redeemer: we find how we may get the pardon of sin: we are told of that kindly blessed Spirit, of whom is everything pure, and true, and good, and kind, that can be found in human being! Oh, sweep the heavens, and scan the earth; look at trees and flowers, and beasts and birds: but what word will you find of such saving, cheering, priceless truths as these!

Even the lesser characteristics of the Bible are noteworthy. The very language of this blessed Book is such as wonderfully suits its claims to be God's message to all races and tongues. The Bible bears translation into other languages as no other book does. It is at home, and at its ease, in all languages. You never feel, reading your Bible, that you are reading a translation. You know how stiff and awkward most translations are; and how vain is the endeavour, in most cases, even when made by the greatest genius and skill, to transfuse into any translation the spirit of the original. Take that most famous of all the mediæval hymns, the world-renowned Dies Iræ. Turn it literally into English. The whole spirit, and unimaginable grace, power, pathos, and sublimity of the Latin words are fled. And I have seen translations of it which truly made it ridiculous. Then I suppose all scholars are agreed that no translation can convey to you the tone and spirit of Plato, of Homer, of Æschylus. But it is little to say that our Bible has all the freedom of an original: more than that, the very spirit of the Hebrew words or the Greek, glows, melts, rouses, calms, in the English. David, Moses, Job, Isaiah, St. Luke, St. John, St. Paul,—they speak to us as they spoke to those who first read them, no whit of their power or character gone: and those of you, who know these holy men only from your translated Bibles, may be well assured that you know them as they were. You hear it said, that there is no more remarkable miracle of skill than the language of our English Bible; which is indeed the standard of perfection in our tongue. But there is something more in this than the industry, tact, scholarship, of the translators. Surely it is, that when the Holy Ghost moved holy men of old to write God's message to all human beings, He moved them so to write it,—in such tongues, and in such words,—as would bear, as human words never did, to be rendered into the mother-tongue of every being who has speech and reason. The same Divine Spirit who at Pentecost made the unlettered fishermen into the most accurate and wonderful scholars, giving them the power to go to any tribe on the face of the earth, and speak to its men and women freely in the tongue they knew best, and loved best; surely He gave a gift of tongues as wonderful as even that, when He made the holy men He inspired,—writing far from one another in time and space,—writing in all circumstances and in the most diverse styles,—yet cast their thoughts into such words as would go naturally and kindly into the speech of every human being?

And then, how this wonderful Volume suits all men, in matters more vital than its language! Said St. John, as though feeling how signal a testimony to truth is afforded by the fact that it is capable of being received by all sorts and conditions of men,—"That was the true light, which lighteth every man that cometh into the world." Is it not so with the Bible? It does not suit this age or that, this race or that; it suits all ages and all races and all men. There are extraordinary national differences in ways of thinking and feeling: and extraordinary differences in such things between the people of different times and ages. An eminent writer has put it on record, that after long study of early Greek philosophy, he was obliged to leave off with the conviction that, in those days, common sense had not been invented. And, indeed, it is quite certain, that what the people of one century have esteemed as profound wisdom, the people of another century have rejected as absolute trifling and nonsense. In like manner, writings are thought admirably wise and weighty in Germany, which our ablest divines have held in utter contempt; and we all know that statements have been regarded as logical arguments in France, which people here would esteem as of no weight whatever. Then you know what difference there is in feeling, and the expression of feeling, between different races,—between the wild demonstrations of oriental grief, with its rent garments and its dust scattered on the head, its shrieks and cries, and the quietness of grief in this western part of the world, with its composed face, its few words, its silent tears. You can compare, too, the silent enjoyment of peace and rest and holy communion, with which a good Christian here covers his face and muses at the holy table, with David's manifestation of the like spiritual elevation by that frantic dancing before the Ark of God. That which would seem to us exaggerated and ridiculous, seems all quite fit and natural to people of a more demonstrative race. And yet, this wonderful Book, dealing as it does throughout just with religious faith and feeling, suits man wherever you find him: comes home alike to eastern and western nations: never gets out of date: never is outgrown by the increasing intelligence of educated men: contains not a sentence that even those who like it least can call nonsense: and expresses no feeling in which all Christian people cannot sympathise;—or if its spiritual elevation does sometimes transcend our sympathy, then we know that the fault is our own, and that the feeling is one with which we ought to sympathise. And if we be believers in Christ in any good measure, how this blessed Book, inspired by One who knows us and understands us thoroughly,—how it suits all our moods, all our circumstances! In every state of thought and feeling, we find what we want in the Bible. There is not a thought or feeling that can arise in a believing heart, but what you can express it in some verse of some Psalm. If we are joyful, sorrowful, hopeful, desponding, weary or cheerful, turn over the pages of David, King and Psalmist, and there are the very words to set out what we feel! "I have just one book," said the poor disappointed genius: "but that book is the Best!" May God grant that each one here, in every season that may come, may find that the inspired volume is indeed all that to himself!

And just remember, too, what is the secret of the Bible's so coming home to all. It is not a question, here, of those intuitions of moral truth, which, when we read or hear them, make us say, "Now that is true;" or even say, "We have often thought that ourselves, though we never heard it expressed before." It is quite true, that pages which bear such things will make their way to many minds and hearts: but it is on a different footing altogether, that God's Book makes its appeal to us! The Bible comes home to all, because it treats of great facts which we never could have found out; yet which, when told, commend themselves, not to sensibility, not to taste,—not even to intellect merely, but to our conscience and heart; to our deepest and most solemn convictions of what is divine and right and true! It tells us that we are fallen, sinful creatures,—that our whole life is error, sin and shortcoming: and if our conscience be enlightened by God's Holy Spirit, we know that is true. It tells of salvation through Christ; of repentance to Israel —yea, to all—and the forgiveness of sins; and if we have in any measure been enabled by God's grace to commit our souls to the blessed Redeemer, then we know that is true. It tells us of the sanctifying and comforting communications of the Holy Spirit: and if we have ever heartily sought these, then we know that is true. It tells us that this is our pilgrimage: it tell us Where is our home: it explains the never-ceasing worries of this life, and the blank insufficiency of all things here, by saying that this is not our rest, and by bidding us seek our rest in the Saviour: and oh, how solemnly true the assurance, and sound the counsel! And through these things it comes to be, that wherever man is a poor sinful creature, anxious, careworn, sorrowful, disappointed, dying,—the Bible comes home to him as nothing else can! Therefore it is that the little volume is the first prized possession of childhood, and old people have it in their hands to the last: therefore it goes into the soldier's knapsack: therefore the aged statesman and judge could read it like a little child: therefore you find it under the pillow of the dying, wet with tears. Therefore its blessed words we wish should be the last read by our weary eyes, and heard by our ears soon to be deaf for ever. It is not genius, with its touches of nature, that does this: it is something higher. It is that in these words we have Almighty God's authoritative message to us, for our salvation: it is that, "Holy men of God spake" them "as they were moved by the Holy Ghost!"

It sounds almost strange to us, in this Protestant country, to say, as if it needed to be said, that this inspired Book is safe to be put into the hands of all. It is not to be shut up in libraries, in the seclusion of its original languages: it is to be scattered broadcast over the land, translated into the tongue in which every man can read it best. Of course, we know, that there have been those who declared that this ought not to be done: that the Bible is a most dangerous book to be put in the hands of all comers, because it may be so terribly misunderstood, and indeed has been so terribly misunderstood. And true it is, that the Bible has been misread and misunderstood. It is like every good gift of God, capable of being abused. Even God's law, St. Paul tells us, was good, only if man used it lawfully. And no one with the most moderate knowledge of history will deny, that some of the cruellest, wickedest, and foolishest things men ever did, they have pretended to justify on the authority of the Bible. The savage inquisitor, with his rack and his faggots: the Puritan, sometimes, with his sour face, his ridiculous name, and his outlandish phrases: the infatuated slave-holder, with his bloodhounds and his whips: each of these has quoted Scripture for his purpose; nay, it was with a garbled text of the Bible that the Devil thought to tempt our Saviour to presumptuous sin. But it does not need to be said at this time of day, that the abuse of a thing is no argument against its use: and though a man who has already made up his mind, and who reads the Bible with the purpose of finding that the Bible approves his views, may easily persuade himself that it does,—yet let us be sure that he who goes to God's Word in a teachable spirit, desiring honestly to find in the Bible not what he might like to find, but what God has said there; and praying earnestly for the illumination of that Blessed One who inspired the Bible at the first, and is still its best interpreter; will never be suffered to mis-read its meaning in anything vital. And though this Book has its difficulties—especially to people who seek for them—yet it sets out the way of salvation through Christ, and of holiness and comfort through the Blessed Spirit, in words that the most unlettered and the youngest may understand. There is many and many a page of God's Word which needs no note or comment to make its essential meaning plain and clear to a simple and docile heart. The Bible does not need the Church to explain it or to make it safe. It is a vital doctrine of Protestantism, that God's Word is to be given to all, and read by all. As is well said in the Confession of Faith, "All the people of God who have right unto and interest in the Scriptures are commanded in the fear of God to read and search them." And yet more explicitly is it said in the Directory for the Public Worship of God, that "besides public reading of the Holy Scriptures, every person that can read is to be exhorted to read the Scriptures privately, and to have a Bible."

I have much more to say concerning the Bible; and I trust, by God's permission and help, to continue this subject at another time. Meanwhile, one word as to the great theme of which the Spirit moved holy men of God, so far apart many of them from each other, to speak in these books which form the written Word of God. "Moses wrote of Me," said our blessed Redeemer: "The Scriptures," said He, "are they which testify of Me." True of the Old Testament, how much more manifestly so of the New! Yes, Christ Jesus our Lord, and God's glory in our salvation through Him, is the great pervading theme of God's Word. Other themes, a host of others, are touched incidentally. You have maxims of the shrewdest worldly wisdom: but oh, the great and ultimate thing is pardoning mercy and sanctifying grace! And when we read our Bibles, we may read them indeed for guidance in each detail of the pilgrimage on earth; but let us read them mainly for guidance to the Home in Heaven!

THE LITANY PARAPHRASED.

FATHER of all, Eternal, God alone,
Whose footstool is the earth and heaven Thy throne,
Source of all good, and Fountain of all light,
Our Guide by day, our Guardian through the night,
Miserable sinners, we
Humble, contrite, bow to Thee;
Bow the heart and bow the knee.
Mark each sigh, regard each tear,
Hear us pray,—in mercy hear!

O God the Son, who didst redeem the world,
When from their thrones the powers of ill were hurl'd;
Who on the cross Thy precious blood didst shed,
To bruise beneath Thy feet the serpent's head,
Miserable sinners, we,
Who from wrath to come would flee,
Turn with confidence to Thee;
For us Thou wert content to bleed,
Plead our cause,—in mercy plead!

O Holy Ghost, who dost inform the soul,
Cleanse the foul heart, th' impetuous will control,
Confirm the weak, the falt'ring saint uphold,
And, breathing courage, make the coward bold,
Miserable sinners, we,
Feeling our infirmity,
Cry for help and grace to Thee:
Help us in the hour of need,
Lead us, oh! in mercy lead!

O, everlasting Father, Spirit, Son,
Holy and blessed, glorious Three in One,
By whom alone we live, and move, and are Thy work, Thy purchase, and Thy daily care,
Miserable sinners we,
Deeply contrite, turn to Thee,
Turn in all humility.
Lord, accept our humble prayer,
Spare us, in Thy mercy, spare!

Our sins, O Lord, remember not
Nor those our fathers did of old;
Blot from Thy book of record, blot
All that against us might be told!
Vengeance belongs to Thee, and Thou the guilty wilt repay,
And we deserve Thy wrath; yet, Lord, Thy rising anger stay!
Spare us, good Lord, in mercy spare
Thy people whom Thou didst redeem,
For whom Thou didst in mock'ry wear
The purple robe, the thorny crown,
And Thy most precious blood did stream,
While Thou upon the cross didst bear
Shame, agony—all, but despair;
Didst willingly Thy life lay down,
Complete Thy great compassion's scheme,
And all the sons of men from Satan's power redeem.
We are Thy sheep. Alas! we strayed; but now would to Thy fold return.
Accept, forgive, O Lord, nor let Thy wrath for ever burn!

From all ills, without, within,
From the worst of evils, sin;
Oh! from Satan's craft and pow'r
In temptation's bitter hour;
From Thy wrath which we provoke,
From Thy judgments' heavy stroke,
From the gloomy pit below,
Place of everlasting woe,
Thou, of grace and strength the Giver,
Lord of mercy, us deliver!

From all darkness of a mind
Prone to sin, by nature blind;
Oh! from pride, from self-conceit,
Base hypocrisy, deceit,
Envy, hatred, malice, all
Unbecoming those who call
Thee their Master, who above
Dwellest, Prince of Peace and love,
Thou, of grace and strength the Giver,
Lord of mercy, us deliver!

Oh! from lust's unholy fires,
From those sensual desires
Which, indulged or fed within,
Drown the soul in deadly sin;
From the world's delusive cheats,
From the flesh and its deceits,
From the snares unnumbered
Satan doth around us spread,
Thou, of grace and strength the Giver,
Lord of mercy, us deliver!

In the wild, tempestuous day
When the vivid lightnings play,
When Thy awful thunders roll,
Striking terror to the soul,

When Thy judgments are abroad,
Plague, and pestilence, and sword,
Join'd with famine hand in hand,
Ministers at thy command,
Making desolate the land,
Thou, of grace and strength the Giver,
Lord of mercy, us deliver!

From the rebel's truthless heart,
Dark conspiracy's base art,
Mean sedition's evil word,
Whisp'ring treason 'gainst his Lord;
Oh! from out the iron hand
Of such troublers of the land,
From their evil spirit too
Prompting evil things to do,
Bringing swift destruction on Peace of others and their own,
Thou, of grace and strength the Giver,
Lord of mercy, us deliver!

By that mystery of love,
Thy descending from above,
In the lowly virgin's womb
God incarnate to become;
By Thy pure and holy birth,
Bringing down from heaven to earth
Peace,—thus herald angels told
Shepherds watching round the fold,
While, a stall Thy dwelling made,
In the manger Thou wast laid,—
Thou, of grace and strength the Giver,
Lord of mercy, us deliver!

By Thy condescending will
The law Thou madest to fulfil,
And, in circumcision, shed
First thy blood for quick and dead;
By that sacred hour when Thou
Didst 'neath Jordan's waters bow,
And the Baptist o'er Thy head
Words of truth and blessing said,
As, descending from above,
Came the Spirit like a dove;
While, aloud, the Holy One
Claim'd Thee His beloved Son,
Thou, of grace and strength the Giver,
Lord of mercy, us deliver!

By that strange, mysterious scene,
When, self-humbled, Thou didst deign,
In the wilderness' wide waste
Forty days and nights to fast,
That, in nature's weakened hour,
Thou might'st feel the tempter's pow'r;
By the victory Thou didst win,
Tempted, suff'ring, without sin;
By the weapon sharp as bright,
Which, well wielded in the fight,
Put the enemy to flight,
Sharper than a two-edged sword,
God's own true, eternal word,
Thou, of grace and strength the Giver,
Lord of mercy, us deliver!

By the woe that o'er Thy soul,
Like a troubled sea did roll;
By Thy tears, Thy groans, Thy sighs,
Offspring of Thine agonies,
When those earnest prayers were made
In Gethsemane's deep shade;
By Thine agony profound,
When there fell unto the ground
Sweat-drops, like great drops of blood,
Preluding that greater flood,
Which should soon a fountain be,
Cleansing all who look to Thee,
Thou, of grace and strength the Giver,
Lord of mercy, us deliver!

By Thy cross, where Thou indeed
Didst, a spotless victim, bleed;
By Thy passion, when that cry
Told Thy deeper agony,
Left alone to bear the load,
Yea! forsaken e'en by God!
By Thy death, when o'er the sun,
Ere one half his course was run,
Darkness brooding chang'd the light,
Nature mourning, into night,
Thou, of grace and strength the Giver,
Lord of mercy, us deliver!

By Thy burial in the grave,
Mighty though Thou wert to save;
By Thy conquest over death,
When, returning from beneath,
Thou didst come again to tell
Vict'ry over death and hell,
And the trembling earth did own
Thee her God, and Thee alone;
By Thy going up on high,
"Captive led captivity,"
While the heavenly host around
Chanted this triumphant sound,
"Lift your heads, eternal gates,
See, the King of Glory waits!"
Thou, of grace and strength the Giver,
Lord of mercy, us deliver!

In the day when dangers press,
In the hour of our distress,
When our sorrows melt in tears,
When all round us dark appears,
Wave o'er wave comes rolling on,
Comfort fails and hope is gone;
Yes, and in the prosp'rous day,
When no trouble blocks our way,
When from hour to hour we glide
Onward, with a fav'ring tide,
While the world its gifts imparts
Bidding for our foolish hearts,
Pow'r and riches in her hand,
On a dangerous height we stand;
Oh! when we are perill'd so,
Or by pleasure, or by woe,
Thou, of grace and strength the Giver,
Lord of mercy, us deliver!

When, as falter nature's pow'rs,
Weary days and nights are ours,
Ceaseless pain the body wears,
Conscious guilt the bosom tears,
Sins, a heavy burthen, press,
Merit sinks to nothingness;
When the voice of conscience rings,
Speaking faithful, bitter things;
When, time fast contracting, we
Hasten to eternity;
When the panting, ebbing breath
Tells us 'tis "the hour of death!"
When the body to the grave
Goes,—the soul to God who gave!
In that hour of utmost need,
Lest the powers of hell succeed,
Thou, of grace and strength the Giver,
Lord of mercy, us deliver!

When resounds that trumpet dread,
Summoning the quick and dead,
Saint and sinner, all to meet,
All, before His judgment seat,
Who once came in humble birth,
But now comes to judge the earth,
"With Him his reward," to give,
Some to die and some to live,
These, in bliss with Him to dwell,
Those, to second death in hell.
Oh! when comes that awful hour,
When He takes to Him his pow'r,
Or to punish, or to save
All the tenants of the grave,
Reigning over all alone,
All alike constrain'd to own
Irresistible his sway;
In the solemn judgment day!
Thou, of grace and strength the Giver,
Lord of mercy, us deliver! AMEN!

CHAS. H. BINGHAM.

IN THE LIFE OF OUR LORD.

THE CHARGE OF SABBATH BREAKING.

Mark i. 1—31; John v. 1—47; Matth. xii. 1—14; John ix. 14; Luke xiii. 10—17; Luke xiv. 1—6.

It was a common saying among the Jews, that whoever did any work on the Sabbath Day, denied the work of the creation. The saying was grounded on the fact that one principal end of the Sabbatic institute was, by its continued and faithful observance to preserve a knowledge of, and a faith in, the one Living and True God as the Creator of all things. As being a most explicit and expressive embodiment in outward act and habit of the faith of the Jewish people, that in six days the Lord made heaven and earth, and the sea and all that in them is, it was chosen by God as a fit and appropriate sign of the peculiar relationship towards Him into which that people had been brought—the peculiar standing which among other nations it was to occupy. "Six days shalt thou labour, and do all thy work: but the seventh day is the Sabbath of the Lord thy God: in it thou shalt not do any work, thou, nor thy son, nor thy daughter, nor thy man-servant, nor thy maid-servant, nor thy stranger that is within thy gates; that thy man-servant and thy maid-servant may rest as well as thou. And remember that thou wast a servant in the land of Egypt, and that the Lord thy God brought thee out thence through a mighty hand and by a stretched-out arm: therefore, the Lord thy God commanded thee to keep the Sabbath Day." (Deut. v. 13—15.) "Wherefore the children of Israel shall keep the Sabbath, to observe the Sabbath throughout their generations, for a perpetual covenant. It is a sign between me and the children of Israel for ever." (Exod. xxxi. 16, 17.) "Moreover also I gave them my Sabbaths, to be a sign between me and them, that they might know that I am the Lord that sanctify them. Hallow my Sabbaths; that ye may know that I am the Lord your God." (Ezek. xx. 12, 20.)

There was no rite, nor institution, not even circumcision, by which the Jews were more conspicuously distinguished from surrounding nations, and marked off as the worshippers of Jehovah, the creator of the ends of the earth. Their Sabbath keeping was a perpetual and visible token of the connection in which they stood to God, and of the great mission which, under Him, they were set apart to discharge. But how was the Sabbath to be kept so as to serve this end? Looking back here to the original statutes, and to the earlier practice of the Jewish people, you will find that there was but one positive injunction given; the cessation from all manner of work. The rest enjoined, however, could not be the rest of total and absolute inactivity. The work from which they were to cease could not be every doing of the human hand. Obviously it was the work of men's ordinary occupation or trades, the work by which the hours of common labour were filled by those engaged therein. There is, indeed, one prohibition, the only one, in which there is a specification of the kind of work to be desisted from, which would seem to point to a narrower interpretation of the original command. When Moses had gathered all the congregation of Israel together at the base of Sinai, and the people were about to enter on the construction of the ark and the tabernacle, knowing with what hearty enthusiasm they were inspired, he prefaced his instructions as to the manner in which they should carry on the work, by saying, "Six days shall work be done, but on the seventh day there shall be to you a holy day, a Sabbath of rest to the Lord; ye shall kindle no fire throughout your habitations on the Sabbath day." They did not need to be told to kindle no fire for any ordinary culinary purposes. A double portion of the manna fell upon the day preceding the Sabbath, and they were to seethe and bake the whole of it, so that no preparation of food on the Sabbath was required. Issued under such peculiar circumstances it seems not unreasonable to believe that the particular object of the Mosaic injunction was to check the ardour of those who might otherwise have been tempted to carry on the mouldings and the castings in gold and silver on the Sabbath as on other days. It certainly never was understood by the Jews of after generations that they were prohibited by Divine command from having a fire burning in their dwellings, for whatever purpose kindled, on the Sabbath Day.

When we turn from what was prohibited to what was imposed, we find a blank. One or two specific injuctions were indeed laid upon the priests. The daily sacrifices were to be doubled, and the show bread baked upon the Sabbath was to be renewed. That there was no Sabbatism in the Temple became in this way a proverb. But for the people at large there were no minute instructions as to how the day was to be spent. It could not have been made imperative on them to assemble for public worship on that day, for during the times of the Jewish theocracy there was no place but one—the Temple—for such worship, and the meeting there each seventh day was impossible. It was not till after the captivity that synagogues were erected all over the land, in which weekly assemblages for worship did take place; but that was done, not in obedience to any Divine command. It would seem, indeed, to have been the practice of the Jews, from the beginning, to gather round their prophets on the Sabbath Days, and to avail themselves of such means of religious instruction as they could command. Parents took advantage of the rest to teach the law unto their children. But there were no peculiar religious observances prescribed. The day was spent in rest, in thankfulness, in gladness; spent to a great extent as the festival days of other countries were spent. Dressed in their best attire, indulging in better fare, it was to feasting rather than to fasting that the Sabbath was devoted. But, as the faith of the people grew weak, and their allegiance to their Divine Sovereign faltered, they grew neglectful of the Sabbath, and began to profane the day by breaking in upon that rest from all the ordinary occupations of life which should have been observed. Thus it was that, among other distinctive marks of their peculiarity as a consecrated people, the only worshippers of the Great Creator, this one became obscured and well-nigh obliterated. In the latest years of the Hebrew commonwealth prophet after prophet was raised up to testify against those defections from the faith, among which that of neglecting and profaning the Sabbath occupied a conspicuous place. After the captivity, on the restoration of the Jews to their own land, the same lax habits prevailed. "In those days," says Nehemiah, "saw I in Judah some treading wine-presses on the Sabbath, and bringing in sheaves, and lading asses; as also wine, grapes, and figs, and all manner of burdens, which they brought into Jerusalem on the Sabbath Day: and I testified against them in the day wherein they sold victuals." (Nehem. xiii. 15.) Nehemiah did more than testify. Alert and decisive in all his movements, he had the gates of Jerusalem shut when it began to be dark before the Sabbath, and kept them shut till the Sabbath was over. It is in the light of his sayings and doings that we are to interpret the utterance from the lips of Jeremiah. "Thus saith the Lord; Take heed to yourselves, and bear no burden on the Sabbath Day, nor bring it in by the gates of Jerusalem; neither carry forth a burden out of your houses on the Sabbath Day, neither do ye any work, but hallow ye the Sabbath Day, as I commanded your fathers." (Jerem. xvii. 21.)

A singular change came over the spirit and habits of the Jewish people after the restoration from the Babylonian captivity. Previously, in the days of the kings and prophets, they were ever and anon showing a tendency to idolatry; subsequently no such tendency appears. Previously they had been neglectful of many of the distinctive rites and ceremonies of their faith; subsequently they became strict and punctilious in their observance of them. Great national calamities—the persecution under the successors of Alexander the Great, the wars of the Maccabees, the aggression of the Romans, the ascent into power of the Idumean family of the Herods, the establishment of the schools of the Rabbis—all conspired to intensify the natural pride and religious bigotry of the Jews; which, as they had nothing but the old laws and traditions to cling to, clung to them with all the more tenacious grasp. The sect of the Pharisees arose, and carried the popular sympathy along with it. Everything regarded as purely and peculiarly Judaic was exaggerated. Punctilious observance of the old ritual was the one great merit compensating for all defects; whilst around the simpler statute-law of Moses there arose an oral or traditional law, growing continually in bulk and overshadowing the primitive Mosaic institute. It had been a less evil had the original enactments of that institute continued to be rightly and liberally interpreted. Instead of this, the narrowest and most rigid interpretation was the only one allowed; and upon each statute as so interpreted additions and explanations were heaped, of such a character as to turn more and more the keeping of them into a mere matter of external routine and outward performance. So fared it with the old, broad and benignant law as to the Sabbath. Its primary injunction, "thou shalt do no manner of work," was falsely held as aimed at all kinds of work whatever; no less than thirty-nine kinds or classes of work being specified as involved in the prohibition. It was ruled thus that grass should not be trodden on the Sabbath, for the bruising of it was a species of harvest work; that shoes with nails should not be worn, as that was the carrying a burden. To what absurd excesses such a spirit of interpretation conducted may be gathered from the single instance of its being actually laid down in the Mishna that a tailor must not go out with his needle near dusk on the eve of the Sabbath, lest he should forget and carry it with him on the Sabbath. In all this there was not only a wrong rendering of the Mosaic precept, but beyond, and much worse than that, there was the erection of a false standard of duty, a false test of piety—the elevation of the outward, the positive, the ceremonial, over the inward, the moral, the spiritual; the putting of the letter that killeth above the spirit which maketh alive.

Now let us see how, born and brought up among a people filled with such prejudices, Jesus regulated his conduct. He knew that healing the diseased on the Sabbath Day would be regarded as a breach of the Divine law, would shock the Pharisees, and run counter to the convictions of the great mass of the community. Did He abstain from effecting cures upon that day? He might easily have done so, as no applications were made to Him. Much as they desired to have the benefit conferred, the people shrank from bringing their diseased to be cured on the holy day. Jesus had only to meet their prejudices by doing nothing. But He did not choose to be thus silent and acquiescent. No less than seven miracles are recorded as wrought by Him on the Sabbath Day, some of them among the most conspicuous and memorable in his ministry:—1. The cure of the paralytic on the occasion of his second visit to Jerusalem. 2. The cure of the demoniac in the synagogue of Capernaum, when opening his ministry in Galilee. 3. The cure of Peter's wife's mother, the same afternoon, in the same city. 4. The cure of the man with a withered hand, a few Sabbaths afterwards, in the same city. 5. The cure of the man born blind, who sat begging in the porch of the Temple at Jerusalem. 6. The cure of a woman who had the spirit of infirmity for eighteen years. 7. The cure of the man with a dropsy who happened to be present at a feast given on a Sabbath Day in the house of a chief publican, an invitation to which Jesus had accepted. Not one of these was effected in answer to any application made. They were all spontaneous, done of Christ's own free will and motion. Nor was there, in regard to most of them, any urgency, requiring that the healing should have been done that day, if done at all. Jesus might have chosen another day rather than the Sabbath to walk through the crowded porches of Bethesda. The impotent man had lain too long there to make a day earlier or a day later of much moment to him. It was the same with the blind beggar of Jerusalem: and these were the two instances of cures upon the Sabbath Day which drew most public notice and were attended with the most important results. But Jesus was not content with simply relieving the sufferers on these occasions. He did himself, or He bade his patients do, what He was well aware would attract the eye and draw down upon it the condemnation of the priesthood. How easy had it been for Him at Bethsaida to have cured the man in passing, and told him to lie quietly there till the next day, so that no one should have known anything of the cure. But He told him to take up his bed and carry it through the streets, obtruding thus on the eye of the spectators an act which seemed to be an open and flagrant breach of the command delivered by Jeremiah, "Thus saith the Lord; Take heed to yourselves, and bear no burden on the Sabbath Day." (Jerem. xvii. 21.) In curing the man born blind He spat on the ground and made clay of the spittle, and anointed the eyes of the man with the ointment, and said unto him, Go wash in the pool of Siloam; both which acts, the making and applying of the ointment, and the washing in the sacred fountain, were deemed to be desecrations of the Sabbath. It thus appears that He not only voluntarily selected the Sabbath as the day for performing the cures, but wrought them in such a way, or accompanied with such directions, as forced them into notice, and involved others as well as Himself in a crime thought to be of the deepest dye,—involving in fact the penalty of death.

The paralytic of the porches and the blind beggar of the wayside could both indeed plead in their justification the command of their healer, and Jesus took upon Himself the full responsibilities of their acts. In meeting the first challenge of his conduct as a Sabbath-breaker, Christ was content, as appears from the narrative in the fifth chapter of St. John's Gospel, to rest his defence on his Sonship to the Father—a sonship that might seem to entitle Him to claim and exercise a liberty of action to which no other might legitimately aspire. But, putting that Sonship aside, had Christ's act in healing, and the man's act in carrying his bed, been violations of the Sabbath law? This question was left unsettled by our Lord's first defence of himself against the accusation of the Pharisees. It served to bring the matter out, not as one of Christ's peculiar character, position, and rights, but as one having reference simply to the true interpretation of the existing law, when it was an ultraneous act of the disciples on which the charge of Sabbath-breaking was founded. One Sabbath Day He and his disciples were walking through some cornfields in which the grain was already white unto the harvest. The disciples being an hungered, began to pluck the ears of corn, to rub them in their hands, and eat. In doing so, there was no violation by them, as there would be with us, of the rights of property. The old Jewish law ran thus:—"When thou comest into the standing corn of thy neighbour, then thou mayest pluck the ears with thine hand; but thou shalt not move a sickle unto thy neighbour's standing corn." (Deut. xxiii. 25.) The law and practice of Palestine continue to be this day what they were so many thousand years ago. We travelled in that country in the spring. Our course lay through it before the ears of corn were full, but nothing surprised us more than the liberties which our guides took in riding through the fields and letting their horses eat as much of the standing corn as they pleased. We felt at first as if we were trespassers and thieves, but were relieved by finding that it was done under the eye, and with the full consent, of the owners of the crops. There was nothing wrong, then, in what the disciples of Jesus did. But it was done upon the Sabbath Day, which was thought to be unlawful. And there were men who were watching—dogging the steps of Jesus and his disciples, perhaps to see whether in their walk they would exceed the distance to which a Sabbath-day's journey had been restricted. So soon as those lynx-eyed observed what the disciples were doing, they inform the Pharisees, who go to Jesus and say, "Behold, thy disciples do that which is not lawful to do upon the Sabbath Day." They were but expressing the popular belief which they had helped to form. It had come to be generally believed that plucking and rubbing in the hand ears of corn was work that the Sabbath law condemned. Jesus threw a shield of defence over the act of his disciples by referring to the conduct of David, esteemed to be a model of Jewish piety. Once when he and his men were an hungered, he had not scrupled to break the rules, to violate the sanctity of the Holy Place. We may believe that it was on a Sabbath Day he did so. Doubly appropriate, therefore, was the reference to it; but it was not essential to Christ's argument that the act was done upon the Sabbath Day. What, by his allusion to the case of David, Christ mainly desired, was to establish the principle that the pressure of hunger vindicated the setting aside for the time of the strictest even of the Temple regulations. But these regulations, and the whole Temple-service which they sustained, were held to be of such superior importance to the Sabbatic law, that when both could not be kept, the latter had to give way. A vast amount of what elsewhere would have been accounted as Sabbath-breaking went on every Sabbath Day in the Temple. If the Temple, then, carried it over the Sabbath, and hunger carried it over the Temple, as free of fault as David and his men were—as free of fault were Christ's disciples. Whatever their hunger was due to, it had come upon them owing to their connection with Him; and if up there in Jerusalem the Temple towered above the Sabbath and threw its protection over its servants engaged in its work, here in the fields of Galilee was one greater than the Temple, throwing his protection over his disciples as they followed Him. They, too, must be acquitted.

But it is not enough that the act of his disciples be in this way vindicated. Our Lord seizes the opportunity to let the Pharisees know that they had mistaken the spirit and object of the ceremonial law, and particularly of the Sabbatic institute. "But if ye had known," He added, "what this meaneth, I will have mercy and not sacrifice, ye would not have condemned the guiltless." Jesus quotes here from the book of Hosea (ch. vi. 6) a saying which more than once He repeated. It was not a solitary one. Much to the same effect were the words which the first of the Prophets addressed to the first of the Kings: "Hath the Lord as great delight in burnt offerings and sacrifices, as in obeying the voice of the Lord? Behold to obey is better than sacrifice, and to hearken than the fat of rams." (1 Sam. xv. 22.) The wisest of the Kings responds to the words of Samuel in the proverb, "To do justice and judgment is more acceptable to the Lord than sacrifice." (Proverbs xxi. 3.) Isaiah and Jeremiah put words of the same import into Jehovah's lips: "I delight not, saith the Lord, in the blood of bullocks, or of lambs, or of he-goats. Wash you, make you clean, put away the evil of your doings from before mine eyes. Cease to do evil, learn to do well." "Thus saith the Lord of Hosts, the God of Israel, I spake not unto your fathers, nor commanded them in the day that I brought them out of the land of Egypt concerning burnt-offerings and sacrifices; but this thing commanded I them, obey my voice, and I will be your God, and ye shall be my people; and walk ye in all the ways that I have commanded you, that it may be well with you." (Isaiah i. 11, 16; Jeremiah vii. 21, 23.) There is something singularly impressive in hearing such emphatic testimonies to the comparative worthlessness of sacrifices and offerings, of all merely ritualistic observances issuing from the heart of the old Jewish ceremony; spoken at the very time when all those statutes and ordinances of the Lord defining so minutely, and prescribing so peremptorily the formalities of Jewish worship were in full force.

And Jesus, in quoting one of these testimonies, and applying it to the case of his disciples' conduct, puts Sabbath-keeping, so far as it consisted merely in abstaining from this or that kind of work, in the same category as sacrifice, regarding it with part of that formal and external mode of honouring and serving the Supreme which ought never to stand in the way of any work of need or of benevolence. Had the Pharisees but listened to the voice of their own prophets they would have understood this; but, deaf to that voice, they had drawn tighter and tighter the bonds of the required Sabbatic service, narrowing and narrowing the field of what was allowable on the seventh day, till they had laid a yoke upon men's shoulders too heavy for them to bear. From this yoke, at all hazard to himself, Jesus will relieve his countrymen, proclaiming in their ears the great and pregnant truth, "The Sabbath was made for man, and not man for the Sabbath." The Sabbath is but a means to an end; that end is, man's present comfort, his spiritual and eternal good. Wherever, therefore, the keeping of the Sabbath in the way prescribed instead of promoting would frustrate that end, it was more honoured in the breach than in the observance. It was never to be regarded as in itself an end. Apart from the physical, social, moral, and religious benefits to be thereby realised, there was no merit in painfully doing this one thing, or rigorously abstaining from that other. The Sabbath was made to serve man, but man was not made to serve or to be a slave to the Sabbath. And just because it was an institution which when rightly used was so eminently fitted to minister to man's present and eternal good, the Son of Man, who came not to be ministered unto but to minister, as Head of our humanity to render to it the greatest of all services, and to take all other servants of it under his care and keeping, would show himself to be Lord also of the Sabbath.

In was in this character that Jesus acted on the Sabbath which so closely followed the incident of the walk in the corn-fields. In some unnamed synagogue he sat and taught. A man whose right hand was withered stood before Him. Had he been brought there to serve the purposes of these watchful enemies who wished, not simply to have his own acts to bring up against Him (for these as the acts of a prophet might be regarded as privileged), but to get from Him a distinct categorical reply to the question, whether it was lawful for any man who had the power of healing to exert it on the Sabbath Day? So soon at least as they saw his eye fastened upon the man with the withered hand, and before He did anything, they interpose their question, "Is it lawful to heal on the Sabbath Days?" The question is met by an appeal to their own practice: "What man shall there be among you that shall have one sheep, and if it fall into a pit on the Sabbath Day will he not lay hold on it and lift it out? How much then is a man better than a sheep. Wherefore it is lawful to do well on the Sabbath Days." But they shall not only have its lawfulness asserted, they shall see the good done before their eyes. Jesus bids the man with the withered hand stand forth. But ere He cures him He turns to the Scribes and Pharisees and puts in his turn a question cutting deep into their deceitful hearts: "Is it lawful to do good on the Sabbath Days,"—as I am doing—"or to do evil?"—as ye do in suspecting and maligning me—"to save life,"—as I do—"or to kill,"—as ye are doing who are already meditating my death? There is no answer to this question. They stand speechless before Him, but unconvinced and unrelenting.

"And Jesus looked round about on them with anger." The meek, and the gentle, and the patient one! What was it that filled his breast with such a glow of indignation, that it broke out in this unwonted look of anger? It was the sight of men, who, laying hold of one of his Father's most merciful institutes—that which for man and beast, and the whole labouring creation, provided a day of returning rest, amid whose quiet the reflecting spirit of man might rise to the contemplation of its higher ends and its eternal destiny—instead of looking at the primary command to keep holy each seventh day, as it stood enshrined among those precepts which enjoined a supreme love to God and a corresponding love to man, and allowing this one positive and external institute to receive its interpretation from those immutable moral laws among which it was interposed, had exalted it into a place of isolation and false importance, attaching a specific virtue to the bare outward keeping of the letter, magnifying to the uttermost the minutest acts of bodily service; finding therein the materials which the spirit of self-righteousness employed for its own low and sordid purposes, an instrument which it would have used for defrauding the poor and the needy and the diseased of that help which the hand of charity was ready to render;—such was the source of that anger with which Jesus looked round about on the Scribes and Pharisees.

But soon the eye, full of the expression of anger as it rests on them, turns as full of pity as it rests on the man who still stands expectingly before Him. Jesus says to him, "Stretch forth thine hand." One can fancy the man replying, Which hand is it that you bid me thus stretch forth? Is it this one that hangs lifeless by my side? Oh, if I but saw its wrinkled flesh filled up, if I but felt the power that once was in it restored, too gladly would I do your bidding; but mock me not by telling me to stretch forth a hand from which you see, and I feel, that all power is gone. Had the man thought so, spoken so, felt so, he might have carried his withered hand with him to the grave. But he did not so think, or feel, or act. He is spoken to by one of whom he believes that He can give the strength to execute the command He issues. It is in that faith he acts, and, paradoxical as it may seem, let us say, that if in that faith he had not made the effort, he never would have got the strength; and yet if he had not got the strength he never could have made the effort. And is it not thus that the Divine Redeemer still addresses us? Stretch forth thy withered heart to love—thy withered hand to serve—such is his command. Fixing an eye on Him, who has already fixed his eye of love on us, let us make the effort, and in the very making of the effort we shall get the strength.

MORE POINTED WORDS HEARD AT KING'S CROSS.

[To the Editor of the Sunday Magazine.—Dear Sir,—Since you were good enough to publish the notes which I sent you of a sermon heard at King's Cross, I now beg your acceptance of a fuller outline of a second address by the same speaker, which I heard on a succeeding Sunday at the same place. His text on this occasion was Amos vi. 13, "Ye which rejoice in a thing of nought."—Yours, &c., —— ——]

The Prophet who spoke these words addressed his fellow-countrymen, the Jews, in Jerusalem. He rebuked them because they rejoiced in a thing of nought; that is, in a thing which was worth nothing—mere rubbish, or lumber, as we should say. They rejoiced in it—that is, they loved it as if it were their greatest treasure, and they were as happy in the possession of it as a man can be in the possession of an invaluable property.

I dare say you are thinking that those Jews must have been perfect fools,—nay, that they must have been insane, for only a lunatic can, for instance, pick up a flint from the street and joyfully jump about with it as if it were the costliest jewel in the world. Well, they were fools, and their joy was really little better than insanity. Still, if you had lived among them and witnessed their ingoings and outgoings, I am assured that you would not have found them greater fools than most people are in our days.

For the "thing of nought" in which those Jews rejoiced was what many in our times would be far from calling a bagatelle. Nay, I am afraid that most of us would look upon it as a very valuable and desirable object. For you would be altogether wrong if you supposed that it was really rubbish or lumber. On the contrary, if you read the description which the Prophet gives of it, many of you will be astonished to find that he could bring himself to call it a thing of nought, a worthless vanity. Indeed, it was not merely one thing, but consisted of a great many things which throughout all ages have been looked upon as highly valuable. Take, for instance, what the Prophet points to in the eleventh verse, the "great houses" or palaces in which the Jews lived. They were splendid mansions, built in the best style, with magnificent colonnades, lofty balconies, and superb gardens. They were sumptuously furnished, for the Prophet speaks in the fourth verse of the beds of ivory upon which the people slept; and the rest of the furniture was, no doubt, in keeping. Their cellars and store-rooms were also well supplied, for the Prophet in the sixth verse mentions the wine which the inhabitants of those palaces drank in bowls. It was a merry life that was lived there, for in the fifth verse we read that the people chanted to the sound of music, and invented for themselves musical instruments. And nothing was spared to make their life as comfortable as could be, for we read that they anointed themselves with the chief ointments, prepared from the costliest spices and the most aromatic perfumes. So that, in fact, there was everything which a man could desire, who said to his soul, "Take thine ease; eat, drink, and be merry."

Now I presume that many of you are saying within yourselves, "Why, the Jews were quite right in rejoicing in these precious things, and the man who could call them things of nought was a fool." And so he would have been, were it not for one circumstance which made them really worthless. It was this: those superb mansions, with their treasures and pleasures, were all to be destroyed within a short time, and all the people who inhabited them were to be killed. The people did not believe this, but it was a truth notwithstanding. The Prophet knew it was a truth, for God had told it to him, and he, accordingly, told it to the people. "The Lord God hath sworn by himself," he said; "I abhor the excellency of Jacob, and hate his palaces: therefore will I deliver up the city with all that is therein. And it shall come to pass, if there remain ten men in one house, that they shall die." This, certainly, was a terrible prospect, and well might palaces which were doomed to such a fate be called "things of nought." And that that fate would come upon them was beyond any doubt, for the God who cannot lie had not only said so, but sworn it by Himself.

Now you will ask, what could be the reason of such a fearful judgment, and what could have caused God to have such an abhorrence of those palaces? Is it a sin to live in a great house? And is God an enemy to music?

Not at all, my friends. You know that David, the king, built a fine palace for himself, and that the Lord was by no means displeased with it. And you also know that that same David was a great musician, playing the harp and singing psalms, by which he pleased the Lord and his people very much. Nor is there anything wrong in sleeping on ivory beds. We read of Abraham, our father in faith, that he was "very rich in cattle, in silver and in gold," yet he was called God's friend, and the Lord promised him that he should be "the heir of the world." And when Solomon, the king, prayed the Lord to give him wisdom, the Lord not only gave him what he asked, but also what he had not asked, viz., riches and honour, so that there was no man in the world who possessed such immense wealth as he, nor was there a king who lived in such a magnificent palace. In a word, one may have all these things and yet be a man after God's heart, for none of these things is bad in itself, since it is God who made them, and Scripture says that "every creature of God is good" (1 Tim. iv. 4). And, on the other hand, one may be poor, and at the same time an enemy to God, as was shown by that unhappy wretch Judas, who had no palace to live in, and slept in no ivory bed, and yet was the greatest traitor that ever lived under heaven.

Nor is it in itself a wrong thing for a man to rejoice in these things. As it is human nature to be sad in adversity, so it is human nature to rejoice in prosperity, and God finds no fault with that, for He himself created human nature to act in this way. When Abraham and Solomon were so abundantly blessed by the Lord as to become wealthy princes, they must have rejoiced; and quite right too, for God had given them all those blessings for the very purpose of making them glad. And Jacob, the patriarch, was a poor man when he left his father's house, but when, after twenty years, he returned home as a man of great property, he said, with joy in his heart: "I am not worthy of the least of all the mercies and of all the truth which Thou hast shown unto Thy servant, for with my staff I passed over this Jordan, and now I am become two bands." Indeed, he would have been ungrateful if he had not rejoiced, and the Lord would undoubtedly have been displeased with him. I have no doubt there are fathers and mothers in the midst of us who understand this; for when a father comes home with a present for his child, he expects to see the child's face shine with joyful surprise, and he rejoices at the prospect of making the child happy. But if the child does not rejoice, the father is sorely disappointed and grieved, the whole thing is spoiled, and the father thinks within himself,—"If I had known this before, I should not have done it." Now, just in the same way does God expect his children to rejoice when He blesses them with the benefits of his love. And if the inhabitants of Jerusalem had rejoiced in their palaces in that grateful spirit, giving God glory for his mercy, and praising his name with their musical instruments, the Lord would most assuredly not have rebuked them on account of their rejoicing, nor would He have destroyed them together with the houses in which they lived.

But, alas! here lay their fault. They rejoiced in their wealth and greatness, not as a gift of God, but as a fruit of their own skill and ability. Now that they had acquired palaces and gardens, and all their hearts desired, they thought they could do without God, and help themselves. So they rejoiced in these things as their all in all, and they rejoiced not in God. "Have we," they said, "not taken to us horns by our own strength?" "We are like strong bulls of Bashan, whose powerful horns knock down everything that comes against them! What have we to fear, or whom should we dread? We are the masters of the world now. Look at our great houses, our splendid parks, our numerous servants, our magnificent dresses, our silver and gold!" In short, they spoke as Nebuchadnezzar, the king of Babel, spoke many years after them, when, walking in his palace, he exclaimed, "Is not this great Babylon, that I have built for the house of the kingdom by the might of my power, and for the honour of my majesty?"

Now, when a man whom God has blessed begins to look upon his blessings in this light, they unavoidably become a curse to him. God at once withdraws his countenance from him, and if he refuse to listen to God's serious admonitions and warnings, God at length becomes his enemy. For surely such ungrateful pride and shameful exaltation was not the end which God had in view when favouring man with the gifts of his liberal hands. God sends us the blessings of this earth to draw us closer to Himself in cordial love, not that they may be set up as a barrier or bulwark between Him and us. But the latter becomes directly the case when we begin to rejoice in the gifts more than in the Giver, and bestow all our heart's pleasure upon the former, leaving the latter alone, as if we had nothing to do with Him at all.

Suppose a father wishes to gladden his son's heart. Knowing that this son is very anxious to get a walking-stick, he presents him with a splendid one. Of course the boy accepts it with great joy, and his father is pleased to see him rejoice. But what would be the impression upon the father's mind if he heard his son speak within himself in this way:—"Oh, I am glad I have got this fine stick, for not only am I able now to knock down everything and everybody, but also to defend myself in case my father should try to punish me." Of course we cannot help smiling at the absurdity of the idea. But nothing short of such absurdity is the conduct of every man who, instead of rejoicing in God because of his loving-kindness, rejoices in his benefits while he turns his back upon the Great Benefactor. To return to my parable: of course the father, hearing those words from his son's lips, would take the cane from him and perhaps break it to pieces upon his back. Why, in exactly the same way did God deal with the Jews. He made their palaces to fall to pieces over their heads, and bury them under the ruins. "It shall come to pass, if there remain ten men in one house, that they shall die," said the Lord.

Sin, my friends, is a destroyer of everything, and pride especially so. It turns God's beautiful creation upside down, and makes it the reverse of what it was intended to be. For, valuable as a palace in Jerusalem was as a gift of God, it had now become totally worthless, and the Prophet was perfectly right in calling it a thing of nought. This was the work of pride. It had turned the very token of God's kindness into an object of God's abhorrence, and rows of costly buildings into a heap of rubbish.

And so it turned Paradise into a wilderness, and this beautiful earth into an abode of death and mourning. For the dwelling-place which God appointed for man when He created this world was finer than the most splendid palace, and well might we have rejoiced in it as the work and mirror of our Father's love, and of his wondrous power and wisdom. But alas! we made the creature our god, and abandoned Him who had made us; and so this whole world, with all its marvels and treasures, has turned into a thing of nought. It will perish with all its glory, it will pass away like a shadow, it will be burnt up with fire and go into destruction. And a Prophet greater than Amos cried, "What is a man profited if he shall gain the whole world and lose his own soul?"

But now let me tell you of an important truth, viz., that Christ came into the world, and is the one truly valuable treasure in the midst of all the things of nought here below. If any object is worth rejoicing in, Jesus is that object, for without Him every joy is sure to end in weeping. This world of ours is a palace which will fall to pieces. We may be sure of that, for God has certified it on his word; and as surely as Jerusalem was destroyed, though nobody believed the prediction, so surely will this world turn to desolation, though everybody laughs at the idea. A man who rejoices in nothing but the delectable things of this world, is indeed like a lunatic who laughs and sings all the day believing himself to be the Prince of Wales. But Jesus came into this world of ours to build up a new palace, which remaineth everlastingly, and will prove as much more glorious than the old one as heaven is more glorious than the earth. Now if we want to rejoice with a true, wise, enduring joy, which will not turn to mourning, let us rejoice in Him. Let us gather round the manger at Bethlehem; let us flock round the cross at Calvary; let us assemble round the open grave in Joseph's garden, and rejoice with an exceeding great joy. For He is that great unspeakable gift of God, to which all the other gifts are as nothing, and from which alone they borrow their value.

Now I fancy I hear some of you saying, "If it be a folly to rejoice in palaces, that folly cannot be ours, for we live in poor small cottages, or in dark, narrow rooms; and if some of us have beds, they are not of ivory most certainly."

Still, my friends, you may be fools for all that, and you may be foolishly rejoicing in a worthless palace, though it be not exactly one of stone. Take, for instance, your own bodies. The human body may be called a palace indeed, for it was created to serve as a dwelling-place for the human soul, which was appointed as a king over this creation. And no royal mansion, however skilfully and splendidly built, is so beautifully and wonderfully made as this. Its form is often majestic, its functions are often astonishing, and the enjoyments which it is capable of are innumerable. A handsome man or a beautiful woman is undoubtedly an object which it is pleasing to see, and corporeal beauty is in Scripture numbered among the gifts of God which one may thankfully rejoice in. But how many a beautiful young girl places all her heart's pleasure in the charms which her mirror tells her she possesses, thinking all the day of nothing else than the future bliss which she believes her graces are sure to gain for her some day! And how many a young man allows himself to be driven mad with passion for the beauties which he admires on the face or in the form of a young woman! And how many a strongly-built, healthy man jests with death and eternity, feeling as if he could never die! And how many a one seems to live only to serve his own belly, spending his earnings mostly in eating and drinking, and his free hours in the public-house or in places of worldly dissipation! Such persons rejoice in their bodies in the same way as the Jews rejoiced in their palaces. To them, indeed, it may be said, "Ye which rejoice in a thing of nought!" How shortly will their pleasure last! What is corporeal beauty but deception? What is bodily strength but a reed? What are the belly and the food but things which will be put to nought? Ten—twenty—fifty years hence! and we shall all of us have returned to the dust!

Do you hear the whistle of the railway engine? Such is our life. It is heard one moment, and the next it is heard no more. He is indeed rejoicing in a thing of nought, who rejoices in this life without rejoicing in the life to come. A poor man has no palace, but still he may wish to have one, and that wish may so completely engross all his thoughts and desires, as to induce him to labour day and night, having neither an eye nor an ear for anything but what will bring him in a few shillings or pence. Such a man is doubly poor, for not only is that which he has, but also that which he hopes for, a thing of nought. What will be left to him to rejoice in, when death one day turns that which he has into rubbish, and that which he hopes for into smoke?

Last Sunday I saw a fire-insurance bill stuck up on the paling over there. It reminded me of a friend whom I met the other day, whose house was burnt down with all his furniture. I found him quite at his ease, and as happy as ever. "Why," I asked, "have you not lost your house, and all that was in it? How, then, can you be so contented?" "Well," was the answer, "my house and furniture were insured, you see. It was an old, unhealthy building, and I shall now have one that will be ten times better."

A few hours later I visited another friend who was in a dying state, and I found him also happy and cheerful. "How is this?" I asked. "Are you not afraid to leave this body, and to enter the dark valley of the shadows of death?" "By no means," was the answer, "for I know that when my earthly house of this tabernacle is dissolved, I shall have a building of God, a house not made with hands, eternal in the heavens."

"This man's house is also insured," I thought; "and no doubt his insurance is the better of the two."

This man was a Christian. He had through faith given himself up to Jesus. He had come to believe that Jesus had died for him, bearing his sins in his precious body on the cross. He had come to believe that God had forgiven all his sins for Christ's sake, and that consequently, saved by grace, he might call God his Father, and look up to heaven as his inheritance. This made him so rich in Jesus, that he withdrew his heart from the world and its sins, to rejoice in God his Saviour. In this joy I knew him for years. He was a common mechanic, a blacksmith. He had just his daily bread and nothing more. But I never witnessed a man who rejoiced more in everything belonging to this life. His few rooms were trimmed up with nice comfortable little things, of his own make and invention, and it was a pleasure to see how he enjoyed them. He cultivated a snug little garden behind his house, and it was a luxury to see him work in it. He played a little upon the flute, and it was delightful to witness the pleasure he took in this recreation. But it was evident that all these rejoicings of his were but so many reflections of one great joy that, like a bright sun, shone in his heart. I remember one day, some years ago, finding him in his room playing a tune. Our conversation turned upon the source of his happiness. "How could I possibly," he said, "sit down in peace at my fireside, or walk with pleasure through the streets, or play a merry tune, if I were not certain of my everlasting happiness? Can a man truly rejoice in a cup of tea, or in a flower, if he believe it possible that some years hence he may be in perdition? Such a man is a fool—nay, he must be a madman. As to me, sir, I can only rejoice in all these things because I rejoice in the name of Jesus. I know He loves me; and I love Him—not as I ought to, it is true, but I love Him as my merciful and faithful Saviour."

Dear friends, that man is now in his heavenly palace, and he will be found there when all the palaces of this world are lying in ruins. He understood the meaning of those words of Scripture, "God meeteth him that rejoiceth and worketh righteousness." And there is another verse of Scripture which all of us should remember, as it is the key to the knowledge of all true joy: "Delight thyself in the Lord, and He shall give thee the desire of thine heart."—So be it.

SINAI AND CALVARY.

HARK! from Mount Sinai's flaming brow,
The long-blown trumpet's quivering sound!
Beneath, the sons of Israel bow,
With trembling hope, with awe profound.

Jehovah speaks—blue lightnings fly,
And peals of heavy thunder roll
Their awful voices through the sky,
While nature shakes from pole to pole.

"I am the Lord!"—a thousand peals,
Still louder, sound one vast "Amen!"
Louder than when, on bloody wheels,
Huge Moloch shakes the Hindoo plain.

"I am the Lord—thy God alone,
Alone possessed of power divine:
Bend not to any other throne,
Obey no other law but mine."

That law, Jehovah! O how broad!
Who can the arduous path pursue?
That holy law, O righteous God,
Includes thoughts, words, and actions too!

"Cursed is the man," I hear it say,
"That keeps not, while he lives, the whole;
For in the last great judgment day
One failing sinks the guilty soul!"

But, hark! from yonder purple hill
Sweet accents float upon my ear—
Christ's Last Words through my bosom thrill,
And gently dissipate my fear.

Dear Jesus! to thy cross I fly,
On thy almighty love I fall;
Be thou my Advocate on high,—
My Life, my Righteousness, my All!

HERE AND THERE IN THE EAST.

FAMILIAR NOTES MADE ON A SCIENTIFIC JOURNEY.

I.—IN THE DESERT.

Having descended the mountain pass of Pi-hahiroth, you see a hilly plain before you. No tree or shrub, not even so much as a blade of grass, is noticeable. Your eye only discovers two inhabited places. The one lies immediately on your left hand. It is the Castle of Ajroud, alongside of which the pilgrims' road proceeds eastward. The other lies at a distance of twelve miles on the right. It is Suez, with its flat roofs and minarets. A long blue strip of water, forming the eastern boundary, cuts the plain. It looks like a river, having borders, which at some spots are sandy and flat, at others rocky and high. It also seems to flow in the midst of a broad valley, for as the ground on this side slopes down towards the bed of the channel, so it rises on the opposite: the soil there gradually ascending towards the long extensive mountain-chain which serves as a boundary for the high Arabian desert. On the south side of that plain the broad Jebel Attakah lifts its colossal frame. With its promontory it touches the blue water-line. A series of hills projecting from it and bending to the north, forms the western limit of the plain. But it is only an optical illusion which makes you take that blue sheet of water for a river; it is the Red Sea itself. This sea, having become smaller and smaller while flowing from the promontory of Attakah to Suez, shrinks near the town to a breadth of scarce two thousand feet. Farther on, north of Suez, it continues over a length of three miles with a tongue which measures three thousand feet in breadth. On approaching, you observe that the water is, as it were, a plaything for natural phenomena. The ebb usually makes it go down from three to six feet. The wind, with a powerful blast from north-east, oftentimes sinks it to a lower level still. Then little islands lift up their heads, as if peeping through the rents of a torn sheet, and broad oblong ridges make their appearance. This phenomenon is observed not only below but also above the town at the tongue, and frequently the Arab is seen stepping or wading from sandbank to sandbank to get from one shore to the other. Even north of the tongue the peculiar inclination of the soil for forming sand-hills is prominently noticeable. They rise from the level of the plain to a greater or smaller height, and were consequently so many elevations under the water-mirror, supposing the sea extended in former times as far north as the tongue. The vestiges of that extension are still visible. Nature, even after so many centuries, has not been able to efface them, active as it has been in chasing up clouds of sand in order to widen the isthmus, that great bridge from sea to sea for the nations of three continents. The sea still re-occupies for a short period that lost territory, when in the winter season the south wind flogs the tempestuous waves. Then the water again covers the barren soil, and its billows roll over a vast area.

Migdol, Pi-hahiroth, Baal-zephon, Etham—here my feet are treading the ground, which as the scene of God's great deeds, inspires awe. I take the Book. "And the Lord spake unto Moses, saying, Speak unto the children of Israel, that they turn and encamp before Pi-hahiroth, between Migdol and the sea, over against Baal-zephon. Exactly before it (i. e., opposite Baal-zephon) shall ye encamp by the sea" (Exod. xiv. 1, 2). When Pharaoh hears this, truly he will only follow their track to have them in his power, like sheep for the slaughter, for on all sides the wilderness will have "shut them in." In my imagination I see a cloud of dust approach from Etham, threatening death and perdition; illuminated by the rays of the evening sun, it reflects the glittering of the sharp and glossy murderous metal. It is Pharaoh! The hearts of the defenceless, who see no escape, shrink away with fright and despair. Some cry to Jehovah: some scold his servant. But Moses stretches forth his hand, and wonderfully the Lord of nature commands nature's powers. The ebb drags off more water than usual. The force of the north-east wind, bursting on with a sudden gust, chases the stream before it. Behold! a sandbank, broad and spacious, appears between the watery borders. That is your bridge, and at the same time your bulwark, poor sheep! The Divine Shepherd will lead you like a flock over it. And the millions descend. Densely crowded together, they hurry towards the opposite shore. The morning dawns, and—they are safe! Safe? No, not yet, for the Egyptian, driven to madness by his rage, follows them, breathing out threatenings and slaughter. But too soon he cries, Victory! For on a sudden, thick clouds pour down streams of water; the thunder roars terror; flashes of lightning blind the eyes, so that in one moment the palpable obscurity turns into dazzling sunlight and into the darkest night again. Once more Moses stretches forth his hand to the sea. Jehovah commands; Pharaoh and his host are no more.

With this scene before my mind I should have liked to ascend to the top of that huge mountain over there, Jebel Attakah. Like a broad-shouldered giant it stands before me. It raises its top higher than any of the mountains by which, in a frequently interrupted row, it is linked with the mountain of Cairo. Its mantle is dyed with a stronger red than its neighbours. Its appearance is gloomy; its countenance serious-looking and majestic. It stands there built up from the beginning by the Creator's hand, to serve one day as a monument, as it were, of a deed too grand to be immortalized by a monument of human make. I should have liked, while seated on its top, to read that glorious song which Moses composed at the place, to inspire the rescued ones with his sublime thoughts and holy feelings. It would then have been to me as if the choruses were rolling again across the waves on the rocky walls of the Attakah; as if the mountain once more were shaking with the echoes of hundreds of thousands of voices praising the name of Israel's great Redeemer!

II.—SINAI.

THREE huge long-shaped masses, called Jebel el Deir, Sinai, and Humr, form the mountain range which is lying before me. With high, steep walls, they slope down into a not very broad, green plain, called Wady er Rahah. This wady, with its continuation called Wady esh Sheikh, severs, on the north, this group from the high plateau called Jebel el Fureia. Across the plain the path leads towards an incision which separates the middle one of the three masses from its easterly neighbour. In this cleft, called the Wady Shovaib, lies the convent. As early as thirteen hundred years ago the Emperor Justinian built it on the spot where Moses saw the burning bush. He desired to provide the hermits of the "holy mountain" with a common dwelling, and the pilgrim with a hospitable abode. And still the convent of St. Catherine reposes in this quiet dale, surrounded by high walls, which present the form of an oblong square. On the north side of the convent a garden slopes down towards the valley. This garden, too, wears a substantial stone belt. The pilgrim cannot enter it. The builder, who, as it seems, was as cautious as he was indefatigable, put the door of the sacred fortification at a height of thirty feet, but placed no steps leading up to its threshold. The peaceful visitor is hoisted up by means of a windlass, and—on a sudden he finds himself in the midst of a cluster of neat buildings and little chapels. A score of Greek monks live here, who leave nothing untried to make the traveller forget the difficulties of his journey. So here he reposes under the fresh green of noble trees; here he breathes in the fragrance of the blossoms of the orange and the citron; here he refreshes himself with a draught of the purest water.

Is it the many-coloured paintings that shall rivet my attention? No; what I am seeking here is the two tables of the law. Is it the altar with its rich tinsel that shall attract me? No; the altar which I am here thinking of is that at which Moses stood before the face of Jehovah. Up there, on the top of the mountain, on the east side of which the convent is lying, is the temple of legislation. Steps facilitate the ascent, which can be performed within an hour. I see the ridge of the mountain forms a plateau. I do not think it is longer than six or broader than two miles. But that plateau is shut in. There are walls on both sides, and while on the northern side high rocks pierce the sky, the noble granite cone called Jebel Mousa rises, on the south side, to a height of seven hundred feet. What a strange sight! A valley on the ridge of a mountain, and this valley again hemmed in by huge rocks; and in this valley again another mountain! and the whole so quiet and full of majesty! Oh! certainly, this must have been the sanctuary of Jehovah. The granite cone must have been the altar. No doubt I have found the spot which the holy record refers to when it says: "The Lord came down upon the mount Sinai, on the top of the mount." (Exod. xix. 20). From this spot Israel heard those peals of thunder, saw those flashes of lightning. From this spot the sight was presented to the people, "that mount Sinai was altogether on a smoke," because the Lord descended on it in fire. From that spot came the power which made the people see and feel "that the whole mount quaked greatly," while all hearts trembled. And here, in these lofty regions, where the Sinai cone ends in a square of eighty feet, Israel received its institutions from the Lord its God.

Nor could any spot be fitter for such a holy scene. For though the top of the mount is more than seven thousand feet above the level of the sea, yet it is not quite visible from below. The view is limited on more than one side. You cannot here enjoy a boundless panorama. When you allow your eyes to rove over the near objects you everywhere meet with granite, which also here and there appears in the character of syenite and porphyry. The core of our planet here shows its original constituent parts; no secondary formations are noticeable nor any marks of transitive rocks. Nay, the whole of the Sinai mountain is on nearly all sides surrounded by huge masses. The Jebel Deir seems to be placed as a watchman on its right hand. On its left the Jebel Humr seems to shelter it by its gigantic frame. And farther on southward the high-shouldered Om Shomer stands at a respectful distance, as if representing the retinue of a king among the mountains. It is the highest of all the granite giants of this district. It takes a day's journey to reach its foot from Sinai. It consists entirely of granite. The stone, which at the bottom is red, turns whiter and whiter the nearer it approaches the top, which completely resembles a chalk hill sharpened into a pointed cone. And wherever your eye turns, it discovers nothing but rough crags, sharp ridges, high pinnacles, black columns,—a wilderness of rocks, gloomy-looking and grave and threatening! Yes, this is the characteristic and speaking frame-work which was created to encase the grand spectacle of the legislation which should be represented before the whole world. As this granite, so also the law consists of a substance as old as creation, firm, solid, immoveable. But here in Sinai it spoke terror; thunder was its voice; it carried the lightning like a sword. It did so because it had to curb a generation of slaves recently freed from their yoke, and to train them as the offspring of great ancestors for a great destiny.

But the heart of Jehovah is a father's heart. He only screened it behind the clouds of Sinai to reveal it all the more gloriously on the top of Calvary. Still, even on Sinai, it once revealed itself in all the peculiarity of its tender feelings. I turn my eyes towards the northerly part of the mount of legislation. There I see a group of rocks and crags, which ends in a steep, smooth mountain-wall. The Arabs call this place Suffafeh—tradition calls it Horeb. So here it was that Elijah had his magnificent vision, when, fleeing from the rage of the idolators, he took refuge in this sanctuary of the law. Near the foot of Jebel Mousa, exactly opposite Horeb, behind a little chapel which bears his name, his cave is shown. "And after the wind an earthquake, but the Lord was not in the earthquake. And after the earthquake a fire, but the Lord was not in the fire. And after the fire a still small voice." That still, small voice, after the awful wrestling of nature, in which the Lord appeared, was, as it were, the prophetic whisper from the lips of Him who one day was to silence the thunders of the law for his friends, and to inspire them with his gospel. I once more look round over Sinai, and it strikes me forcibly that upon all those chapels and cloisters the cross is seen. "The law was given by Moses, but grace and truth came by Jesus Christ." My visit to this place, where the law was given, enhances not a little my desire to visit the land where He lived, who gave us grace and truth out of his fulness.

III.—JAFFA.

I WAS very desirous of seeing the inside of the town. How different is the reality from what it appears to be. Seen from a distance, the town still keeps up the signification of its old name, Jafo—i.e., Beauty. How beautifully does it rise from the sea-side, with all the charms of an amphitheatre! How pleasing, too, for the eye is its appearance when seen from the land-side, —with its solid, high-built wall peeping out above the tops of the trees, with its buildings rising above that wall, and crowning the top of its hill! How splendid is its gate, (the only one it has,) seeming to be built indeed to invite one to enter.

Full of expectation I yielded to that silent invitation. I walked through the town in all directions. What was it I saw? Crooked or angular, narrow and unpaved streets. The heavy rain which had fallen recently had turned them into as many muddy sewers. Nor do the houses make up for the streets. It is true there are many of them, but they are crowded into a mass, without the slightest architectural beauty, without any symmetry whatever—clumsy square blocks, large and small, as if thrown down at random. I now saw the flat roofs closely before me. They consist of a mass of sand and chalk dried in the air. If in the rainy season there should be a leakage, the rents are repaired by moving a heavy stone roller to and fro. According to the law of Moses (Deut. xxii. 8), the roofs have battlements. Though the law lost its authority long since, yet the present custom still pays homage to the old institution of Divine wisdom. When seeing these battlements from a distance I took them for walls, but now I saw that they very much resembled the work of bees in their hives, showing a conglomeration of little cells. The battlements are constructed of tubes made of burnt clay, and are very much like our ginger-beer bottles when deprived of their neck and bottom. They are in a horizontal position, piled one upon another and fastened with lime, turning one of their openings towards the street, and the other towards the roof. They form a curious-looking fence round the flat roof; light, so that the house is not too heavily burdened; airy, so that the fresh sea wind can freely pass through; transparent, without exposing the inhabitant to the gaze of the public. No wonder the women of Jaffa prefer these flat roofs to their close parlours. They seat themselves or lie down behind these tubes, through which they see everything, without being seen themselves.

Of course I wanted to see the house of Simon the tanner, and I did see the place which Mahommedan tradition points out. But I am not quite sure that it it is the real spot where once the first of the Apostles knelt down and prayed. Of this, however, I have no doubt, that on the slope of this same hill which descends to the sea the house must have stood. The Apostle must have had the same view which I had. What an impression must that view have made upon him who had hitherto seen no greater sea than the Lake of Tiberias or the Dead Sea! What a boundless water-plain! What a vast, immeasurable extent of the clearest blue! What a solemn host of rolling waves, at the same time playing like sportful little lambs! What a splendid stripe of silvery foam, which the rolling breakers pencil alongside the shore both north and south! That sea must have told him great truths in unison with the vision which he here beheld. As it is the greatest gulf of our globe, so it is the only one which has three continents for its boundaries. The Apostle saw it covered with ships, coming and going from and to all parts of the world. He stood there with the representatives of all the nations before his eyes, and with a Gospel on his lips which was to be preached to all nations, to every creature! He knew the Master often said that all the nations should be brought in, but—thus he thought—how difficult will it be to persuade those Gentiles to go in through the door of Judaism and to allow Moses to lead them to Christ! What a contrast between the unlimited sea and his limited opinions! And such a contrast there certainly was in his own bosom: the contrast between love, which longs to save all, and prejudice which has only room for few. It saddened his heart to think of so many who would exclude themselves through refusing to be made clean by the law of Moses. He fell down in the dust to pour out his heart before his Saviour. He prayed for the coming of His kingdom to all the heathen. Then he saw the vessel descending from heaven, and heard the voice, "What God hath cleansed, that call not thou common." God be praised! His mind now, too, saw an ocean before it, vast as the Mediterranean, embracing three continents!

Well mayest thou, Jaffa, be the harbour for Christian pilgrims of heathenish extraction! On thy shore they must put their first footstep when visiting the Holy Land, remembering how it was here that for the first time the door of salvation was opened to the whole of heathendom.

IV.—THE PLAIN OF SHARON.

When going out of the gate of Jaffa, you see on your left-hand side, between you and the coast, the cemetery of the Mahommedans. It is a green, somewhat hilly field. Each grave is built over with a white plastered framework of bricks, to a height of one foot and a half. On your right-hand side you notice the market-place, nearly under the east wall of the town. I saw rustics from the neighhourhood, with their camels and donkeys, which were peacefully lying down, enjoying a welcome repose after having carried a heavy burden in the heat of the sun. There was a great bustle and thronging of people. I saw all but naked children, veiled women, peasants who inhabit fixed dwellings, vagrant Bedouin, townspeople, Turks and Arabs. Many of them were busily engaged in buying and selling; while others, seated down in groups, smoked their pipes and looked at the scene in silence. But what above all drew my attention, was the merchandise which was offered for sale. I saw here the productions of the country in all their variety, much better than I saw them at the bazaars of the town. Large heaps of the choicest fruits covered the ground, and formed the prettiest ornament of this picturesque market-scene.

There is a great difference between an English and an Oriental garden. In the latter there are no footpaths to divide the area into elegantly-shaped parts; no trees and vegetables to relieve each other; no flower-beds, or shrub-plots where, by means of painted sticks, the plant is propped and adorned. The Oriental gardens are just green enclosures containing trees. These are not classed, but planted pell-mell. Such a garden is just a field with trees. Little care is taken of them; they are left entirely to the care of the sun and the earth, as they are the children of both. To horticulture the Arab is a stranger. Neither he nor the Turk have a conception that there is such a thing as a science of rearing fruit, which knows how to distinguish the fruits in their genera and species, and teaches the rules by which they can best be cultivated and ennobled. Happily most trees can help themselves, especially in the neighbourhood of Jaffa, where the soil is moist. The water which here wells up is gathered in pits, and used for moistening such trees or garden fruits as are in need of it during a certain period of the year. For, from April to September there falls not one drop of rain, and even the dew ceases. The only refreshment which the plants obtain during that season comes from the fogs which hang over the fields in the morning. In this way the trees grow, requiring next to nothing save protection. Accordingly, to provide them with this is the chief care of the owners of the gardens. And to this end they use the Indian fig, the Cactus opuntia, which here grows to a height of from fifteen to eighteen feet. A row of these powerful trees with their broad prickly leaves forms an impenetrable hedge.

The way from Jaffa to Jerusalem goes across a green plain, through which a ridge of hills winds. We passed this ridge, and what a charming landscape, peopled with cows, donkeys, and sheep, lies before us! Little lambs are leaping round their mothers; while other lambs, which already are deprived of the young animal's first and highest enjoyment, are bleating incessantly, as if imploring the commiseration of cruel man, who has so unmercifully separated them from nature's refreshing nourishment. The shepherd, insensible to their pitiful expressions of distress, walks in the midst of them, keeping the weaned little creatures at a distance from the fountains after which they are thirsting. His long staff in hand, he carries his sceptre as king of the flock. It is a spring scene which calls many a well-known and lovely passage of Scripture to my memory.

I found myself in the green pasture of Yazur, a village at four miles distance from Jaffa. Its aspect is charming; it rests in quiet and peace under the shade of olive trees, which bend under the weight of old age. Beautiful, too, look the gardens surrounded by cactus hedges. But here again the houses are miserable. I rode through the place, but nothing worth looking at was visible—not even one vestige of the age of the Crusaders, in which this village obtained some notoriety.

We passed three or four small villages. The country now loses in charm. We enter a district where the grass will not thrive, being oppressed by a small prickly plant. But on a sudden, in the midst of a cultivated patch of ground, two villages rise, viz., Safiriyah, on the left, and Sarafend, on the right-hand side. The latter drew my attention by the antiquity of its name; but, save the name, there is nothing antique about it. Its palms and olives are not able to screen the miserable appearance of its houses, nor the cactus-hedges the poverty of its gardens. On the wayside there is a watering-trough. Tradition asserts that the Holy Family here rested on its flight to Egypt. Soon the country again resumes its barren aspect, but, as it seems, only to surprise us all the more by the luxuriant fertility which it will show by and by, for we approach Ramleh, which shone into our eyes from the far distance. Ramleh not only makes you forget the miserableness of the villages, but it also puts the beauties of Ludd in the shade by the size of its buildings, the cupolas of its roofs, its lofty minarets, and especially by its high tower, which stands as a unique phenomenon in the Holy Land.

The view from this tower is very grand. The Plain of Sharon in all its breadth lies before your amazed look. No object of any importance escapes the eye which from this elevated place roves over the wide extent of country. Here you have a map, drawn on the widest possible scale, exact in its smallest dimensions, and coloured in each of its parts with a natural hue. Meanwhile the sun was hasting to bathe its golden head in the great sea. Radiant with his long-stretched beams, which were rebuffed by the high mountains, he adorned the rocks with the charms of crimson and purple, and made the waves of the Mediterranean glitter with gold and silver; and richer and richer became the charms which he threw over hills and valleys, plains and pastures; and longer grew the shadow of the tower, stretching itself forth like a giant across the fields of nature and the graves of men.

V.—FROM RAMLEH TOWARDS JERUSALEM.

So we were in Ramleh, the old town of Arimathea. We took up our abode in the Latin convent. We were told it had room enough for our company, and found indeed that our company might have lost itself in the extensive premises. The convent is a cluster of buildings. The main building has two storeys; it encloses a square open yard. From a vaulted passage, which is open towards the side of the yard, one enters the apartments. They are all, the small as well as the large, tidy, and furnished with everything belonging to a bed-room, the looking-glass alone being wanting. This article is deemed superfluous in a hotel for pilgrims, whom it behoves not to think of such a thing as making their toilette, and who do not practise shaving, as everybody in the East allows his beard to grow. The roofs are flat and smooth. Steps unite the higher-situated roofs with the lower ones. Thus the covering of these premises forms a spacious and pleasant walking-place. As the convent is high, the view from the roofs is magnificent. This is all the more to be appreciated, since the building has no windows nor a garden within its walls. I saw only one or two small gardens hid between the other buildings of the convent. In one of these was a palm-tree forty feet high. The superior, a German, with whom I talked till late in the night, told me a great deal about this old town which can only have an interest to those who believe it. It is possible that Joseph's house once stood where the convent now is, and that Nicodemus' house was next to it; but it is equally possible that neither was the case.

I walked through the town, which has lost all the glory of old Arimathea. It could not fetter me. I longed for the free fresh air. And when at length all was ready for departure, how cheerfully did the morning smile upon us when we got without! The air was uncommonly clear. There was not the slightest motion noticeable in the atmosphere. The smoke of the villages of the Fellaheen and of the camps of the Bedouin rose up perpendicularly, forming loose pillars with fantastic looking capitals. These airy pillars contrasted in a striking manner with those huge masses of stone, which were lying just before me, stretching from the north to the south—Judea's and Samaria's everlasting hills. It seemed as if the atmosphere was willing to purify itself to the utmost, for it was as if the mountains came to meet us, contracting the real distance of twenty miles within the narrow compass of only three. And over those mountains the dew was hanging, weaving veils round their heads. Lower down, however, their dress was beautifully variegated. The rising prince of the day had, as it were, taken up a pencil, which he dipped now in green and yellow, now in brown and grey, at the same time taking away the sharp edges of the tints and making them mingle in soft transitions. Gradually the sun swallowed the dew, taking it back as his property, and now the mountains showed themselves in their own peculiar lineaments. I saw them in the form of gigantic terraces, one range after another, higher and higher still; but I saw no sharp crags, no prominent pointed needles; I only saw curved ridges, declining from the centre, like the wings of a bird when it allows them to sink a little, and sometimes also inverted basins and long-stretched flats like immense roofs. And fresh and invigorating was the air which I inhaled under the enjoyment of such a picturesque sight, while proceeding onward to Ludd, the Lydda of the Bible.

In deference to its biblical celebrity, we went a considerable way out of our road to visit Ludd. The town had on the previous evening shown itself in such picturesque beauty as excited our desire to see it. It was as if it said to us in an inviting voice, "Do not pass me by." And even while we were approaching it, it continued its illusory appearance, which was enhanced by the charms of the unique morning. Quiet and enchanting looked the place, with its cupolas and turrets. Its prominent ruins seemed to try to temper the fascination of the scene by seeming gravity. Palms lifted their majestic forms. Olive groves relieved by the cool green of their leaves the white hue of the roofs and minarets. The country alternately rose and sank; earth walls, upon which the cactus blossomed, enclosed the pastures; cultivated fields, which, seen from a distance, formed so many coloured stripes, covered the country round about. But great was the disappointment which we experienced on entering Ludd. We found ourselves in the midst of poor, miserable dwellings, separated from each other by narrow closes. These closes are very peculiar. In the middle of such a close runs a trench or ditch, a foot and a half deep, and three broad. Of course, during the rainy season, the water flowing down into these ruts softens the unpaved ground and turns it into a black pulp. This is the road for the beasts of burden; but while on both sides of the trench enough of room is left for two men to pass each other, it is different in the case of the animals. One may imagine what a continuous source of quarrel must be the meeting of two donkeys or camels from opposite directions. The question then is, not which is to go to the left or to the right, but which is to climb up to the passengers' footpath to make room for its fellow being!

The only object worth noticing at Ludd is the ruins of the old church of St. George, which must have been a splendid building. The western part of it is turned into a mosque, while another part is now and then used by the Greek Christians. After having inspected this monument of the piety of the old Christians and of the Vandalism of the Mohammedans, we continued our way, which led across fields covered with the fresh green of the wheat-crops, and adorned with olive and other trees. It was not long, however, before the soil became more stony and hilly, and the nearer we approached the mountains the more our way went over a succession of elevations and depressions. While proceeding towards the south-east I saw, on my left-hand side, Nebalat and Ono; straight before me, Jimzu. The latter is a place mentioned in the Bible under the name of Iim (Josh. xv. 29). I recognised it as such on first sight. It is built on an elevation which looks like a rock, but is in fact a cluster of rocks, covered with the green of the corn-fields, across which dark-green olives cast their broad shades. The cactus-leaves shine like oval-shaped mirrors in the rays of the sun. We ascended this height. Loose stones cover the road, which does not go through the village. Still I rode into it, but found no other remains of the people who once built and inhabited the place, than a very old olive-press, and an oblong, partly subterraneous vault.

From this place our journey was to Annabeh, which lies three miles farther on. At a small distance on my left-hand side I saw Berfilga, situated at the entrance to the mountains. We did not take our route to the Holy City by that way, but descended into the valley, which on the maps is noted as Mey Hu Omeir. The governor of Ludd, however, said to me that he never heard it called by that name. From here, on the south side, rises the ridge upon which the village of El Kubab is built. On the east side of this village there is a large wood, enclosed with stone walls and cactus hedges. Here we took a little rest, the sun being in the zenith.

TREES.

A FEW WORDS SPOKEN TO CHILDREN.

Children are fond of pictures, and they like to listen when pictures are explained; and our heavenly Father has given us a most beautiful and glorious picture-book, and the explanation which he gives of it is still more beautiful and glorious. The picture-book is the world, which He has created. The sun, moon, and stars, the fields and trees, the flowers and plants, the lion and the lamb, the eagle and the swallow, the mountains and rocks, rivers and seas —all these are so many pictures, beautiful to look at, but still more beautiful to understand. For they all mean something, and tell something, which is very important and blessed for us to know. Now, God explains his pictures. He does it in his Word, and He does it especially by his dear Son Jesus Christ. Jesus often speaks of his Father's works and explains them to us; and He shows us how all things point to Himself, who is the great gift of God to us.

Now, I want this morning to speak to you about trees, and what the Bible says they mean.

I.—THE TWO MOST REMARKABLE TREES.

Which are they?

The one stood in the garden of Eden, the other stood on Mount Golgotha. The one was in the midst of beauty and plenty, everything around it smiling and joyous; the other was between two malefactors, a place of ignominy and shame. The one was the occasion of sin, when Eve and Adam, listening to the voice of the tempter, transgressed God's law, and thus sin and death came into the world; the other is the source of salvation, where Jesus Christ, in obedience to his heavenly Father, laid down his life for the lost sheep. The one tree reminds us of man, seeking his own life, and honour, and pleasure, and losing all; the other tree reminds us of Christ, laying down his life, enduring pain and agony, and suffering shame, and thereby gaining life and glory, not merely for Himself but for all who love Him. Dear children, these are the two most important trees in the world; the tree in Paradise, and the tree of death on Calvary: the tree with beautiful leaves and inviting fruit, in the garden of Eden, and the Cross, with the suffering, bleeding Saviour. Christ his own self bore our sins in his own body on the tree. The tree in Paradise man ought not to have touched, but to Christ on the cross all sinners are invited. Christ lifted up draws our hearts to Himself. Now, there is much more told us about these two trees in the Bible, but this is the beginning and most important of all to us: one tree reminds us of sin and death, and the other of salvation and life. By touching and eating of one, a righteous man became a sinner; by taking hold of the other a sinner becomes righteous.

II.—ALL MEN COMPARED TO TREES; GOOD AND CORRUPT.

Jesus compares all men to trees; some are good and bring forth good fruit, some are evil and bring forth evil fruit.

David made this comparison when he wrote: that the righteous is like a tree, planted by the rivers of water, that bringeth forth his fruit in his season; his leaf also shall not wither, and whatsoever he doeth shall prosper. A good tree means a tree that has life. If we believe in Jesus, our hearts are rooted and grounded in him. Jesus loving us and teaching us, comforting and helping us when we are unhappy and sad, reminding us of God and heaven when we are forgetful and selfish—this is meant by the rivers of water, that keep us alive and fresh. Christ's words and promises and commands, all kind friends who love God and speak to us about him, all God's dealings with us in health and sickness, are the waters which he sends to the tree, that is rooted in Christ. Now, you don't see the root of a tree, but you see the branches and leaves; and so no man can look into your heart and see whether you love God and Jesus, but we can see your faces and your conduct, we can hear your words and notice your doings. And when we love God secretly in our hearts and are kept in the love of God by the rivers, which I told you of, then we are kind and gentle, diligent and careful, unselfish and loving. Our words and our works are leaves and fruit showing the heart is right with God.

But did you ever read what John the Baptist said: The axe is laid unto the root of the tree: every tree which bringeth not forth good fruit is hewn down and cast into the fire. Strange sight it would be: a forest and every tree in it with an axe to its root! Ah, dear children, these words are solemn and true, and therefore listen to me when I tell you how we may by God's grace be good trees, pleasing to God and planted by Him to remain before Him for ever.

III.—THE FIG-TREE CURSED AND A SYCAMORE-TREE BLESSED.

Our Lord Jesus Christ was full of love and kindness. His kindness knew no limit. People, whom others despised and forgot, He remembered, and showed love to. He was fond of little children, and took them into his arms and blessed them. He fed the multitude, for He knew they must be faint and exhausted. When Peter cut off the ear of Malchus, Jesus immediately touched and healed it. He did not like to see suffering and want. He did not like to see God's good creatures wasted; so he commanded the disciples to collect the fragments of bread. Now how strange is it that this loving Jesus should have on one occasion used his power to destroy and to wither. You remember the story. "And he left them and went out of the city unto Bethany and he lodged there. Now in the morning, as he returned into the city, he hungered. And when he saw a fig-tree in the way he came and found nothing thereon but eaves only, and he said unto it, Let no fruit grow on thee henceforward for ever. And presently the fig-tree withered away." That fig-tree is a picture of man, who has been taught from God's word about sin and salvation, about God's love and Christ's grace, about repentance and faith,—who has had father and mother and teacher watching him, loving him, instructing him,—and who does not obey God, seeking and serving Him, and brings forth no fruit unto God and the Church. It was a picture specially of the Jews, who had the Bible, the Sabbath, the Temple, and who had Jesus himself in the midst of them,—but they received Him not. They were proud, and did not acknowledge their sin. Their hearts were not broken, and yet they pretended they were good, and loved the Bible and prayer. But, as I told you before, the good tree is a man whose heart is rooted in the Saviour.

If the fig-tree is a picture of the proud Pharisee, let me show you another tree, which Christ blessed. The Saviour was drawing near to Jericho, and a great crowd followed Him. Jericho means the city of fragrance; palm-trees, balsam and rose-trees flourished there. But Jesus was looking in one direction, as if something very important and beautiful was attracting his notice. It was a sycamore tree. Now a sycamore tree is a very common humble tree; but this tree bore a very extraordinary fruit on its branches. What was the fruit it bore? Strange to say, it was a man—Zaccheus. He was a publican, or tax-gatherer. These people were generally wicked, and never went to a place of worship. But this man was anxious to be good,—that is, to know and serve God. And he had heard of Jesus, that He called sinners to repentance, and that He received them to help and love them. Now he felt that Jesus was such a Saviour as he wanted, and he was anxious to see Him. But being a little man and there being a great crowd, he climbed up into a sycamore-tree, there to watch and see Jesus. And the Saviour knew it, and gave to Zaccheus more than he expected; for He said to him, "Zaccheus, make haste and come down, for to-day I must abide at thy house."

Little children who cannot read, or little children who are only beginning to learn, or older children who want to know more about the Saviour, there is always some one near you who can teach you and tell you more about Jesus. That is the sycamore tree you must climb up to see Jesus. All sermons, and Sunday Schools, and good books are sycamore-trees to help little Zaccheus to get a glimpse of Jesus. And then Jesus comes with the heart to abide there, and Zaccheus becomes a good tree, for the worst tree can be changed into a good tree. Jesus died for the bad trees, that they may through Him become good.

IV.—THE VINE.

If a person who had never seen and known trees was shown a fir tree or a poplar, a chestnut tree or oleander, and afterwards the vine, which in spring looks little better than a wooden peg, what would he think? He would expect something of the large stately trees, and despise the vine. But we know that the vine bears a noble fruit, and from the grapes we get the wine, which strengthens and gladdens man. Now Jesus is the Vine. God, the Father, planted Him. At first He had no comeliness; He was a root out of a dry ground, and men passed by with contempt. He was born of a poor woman. Mary was so poor, that when she brought the child to the Temple she could only offer a pair of turtle-doves as a sacrifice. He was brought up by Joseph the carpenter in a despised country town. He chose for his disciples fishermen. He was rejected by the scribes and priests, and finally nailed to the cross. He was not known and honoured by men: but God knew Him, and acknowledged Him. He raised Him from the dead, and now is He the Vine, and He will fill the earth with his glory.

Zaccheus, the thief on the cross, Mary Magdalene, and all who come to Jesus in repentance and faith, become branches in Him. They abide in Christ, and Christ's words abide in them; and then they bring forth much fruit. The children of Israel were astonished at the clusters of grapes that the spies brought from Canaan: they were so large and beautiful. And when we hear of Christ's disciples, and their lives, we also are astonished. When we hear of Paul, and what he did and suffered—how he was scourged, and stoned, and imprisoned—and how he endured all things willingly for the sake of Jesus and to do good; when we think of Stephen, dying for Christ and praying for his enemies, that God might forgive them; when we think of the children of God, some of them very poor, and still happy and hopeful, rejoicing in God and heaven; of the sick who for years are confined to their room, in pain by day and night, and yet thanking God for his goodness to them, and for the prospect of blessedness above; when we think of God's people, young and old, their patience, meekness, purity, love, and peace;—we are just looking at the clusters of grapes which Christ the Vine bears.

Apart from this Vine we can do nothing. We must first come to Jesus, and then we can follow Him. We must first become humble and lowly, like Zaccheus, and receive Jesus in our heart, and then Jesus and we are one, and we bring forth fruit. Paul describes the different kinds of fruit: love, joy, peace, long-suffering, gentleness, goodness, faith, meekness, temperance.

V.—SHADE AND FRUIT OF THE APPLE-TREE.

A wanderer travelling in the East under the scorching rays of the sun, weary and faint, his limbs tired and his tongue parched, came to an apple-tree with large branches. "Ah," said he, "this is delightful! Here is shade to shelter me from the heat of the sun, and here are refreshing apples to quench my thirst and keep me from fainting." So he sat down, and was glad; the shade was welcome, and the fruit was sweet to his taste.

The words in which the Bible tells this story are these: As the apple-tree among the trees of the wood, so is Christ among the sons of men. When we feel oppressed by our sins and the displeasure of God, which he has expressed against all transgression of his law, Christ is our Shelter, because He died the just for the unjust, and in Him all our condemnation is taken away. When we hunger and thirst after God, Christ's love and Christ's words alone can satisfy us. We sit down under his shadow with great delight, and his fruit is sweet unto our taste.

ADOLPH SAPHIR.

A CHARACTER TO BE AVOIDED.

IT is hardly possible to describe the hypocrite, just as it is hardly possible to draw a life-like portrait of one who is never seen without a mask. It is easier to say what he is not than what he is, as it is the sad characteristic of his life not to be what he tries to make you think he is. The embossed ornament swells out on one side in the same proportion as it is depressed on the other, and the more solid it looks without, the more hollow it is within; so the inside of the hypocrite is exactly the reverse of his outside. If this is not always the case, it is because he is not even consistent enough not to sin against his own sin.

Hypocrisy is so prevalent among mankind, that it is not an easy matter to say of any one among the children of men that he is not a hypocrite. If he be not one to-day, or was not one yesterday, he may be one to-morrow. Hypocrisy is the never-failing companion of transgression, as smoke is of flame. Since Adam's first transgression it has run in our blood, and has made our heart not merely a deceitful thing, but of all things the most deceitful (Jerem. xvii. 9). It is said that no art is innate; but the art of sewing fig-leaves together and making aprons of them is an exception to this rule. We are all of us born masters of that trade, and need no one to teach it to us. Even such a good man as St. Peter, though he was full of the Holy Spirit, was one time found "dissembling" at Antioch, for which his fellow-apostle, St. Paul, justly blamed him (Gal. ii. 11—13). It must be an obstinate poison which the serpent pours into our veins since even the heavenly Dove could not fully expel it from such a man as the first of the Apostles. Indeed, only one Man ever lived on earth who never was a hypocrite, wherefore He was called The Truth (John xiv. 6), The Faithful and True One (Rev. xix. 11). Of the rest of mankind He, who never lies, testifies that every one is a liar (Rom. iii. 4).

Still a distinction should be made between things which differ in principle, though they may bear some resemblance to one another. Hypocrisy is connected with respect to appearance, but respect to appearance is not necessarily hypocrisy. The fact is, that as everybody lives upon higher credit than he is really worth, we find it next to impossible to get on in society without some regard to appearance. This is almost necessary to prevent our being misunderstood. If we at every given moment showed ourselves in the actual character or mood of mind in which we then happened to be, we should often be taken for worse than we really are. Moreover, we do not always wish to continue as we are. Many a time we really hope to be better to-morrow than we are to-day, and as we can see neither the necessity nor the good of representing ourselves in a character which we hope to change by dint of self-improvement, we draw upon our future excellence, and allow our friends to enjoy the representation of virtues which it will perhaps cost us many a painful struggle to become actually possessed of. There is, perhaps, not much harm in this sort of thing, provided we are really in earnest, and take care that the money be in the bank the moment the cheque is presented.

Let me try to illustrate this matter.

Suppose Mrs. A. is sitting one afternoon with her husband at the window of their front-parlour, chatting in a pleasant and confidential way. On a sudden Mrs. B. comes up the steps. Now, Mrs. B. is one of Mrs. A.'s friends; they are really fond of one another, only Mrs. B. is a little garrulous, and just as it is easy to get her down upon a chair, so is it difficult to get her up again. Mrs. A. looks at her husband despairingly. "There she is! What are we to do? How very awkward! Our afternoon will be spoilt. I know what she is coming about. We'll hear all about her bad servant, who absconded with her silk dress the other day. Could you not, dear——" But Mrs. B. enters, with a smiling face, and after having kissed her friend, cordially shakes hands with the husband. Now, what is Mrs. A. to do? I will tell you what she did; she returned the smile and the kiss. "How do you do, Mrs. B.? Happy to see you indeed. Sit down. And how are Mr. B. and your children?" &c., &c. This certainly was not a cheque for which there was capital in the Bank at the moment. But before ten minutes had elapsed it was really paid down. Mrs. A. was soon quite pleased with her friend's visit, and regretted having yielded to her first impression. Their conversation even became very cordial and confidential. Would it have been so, if she had told her friend at once that she was not happy to see her, and that her visit was disagreeable? Let us not forget that outspokenness may sometimes be the effect of heartless indifference, and that respect to appearance may sometimes be dictated by friendship. Certainly it would have been better if Mrs. A. had felt cordial towards her friend from the first moment she noticed her coming. But this not being the case,—and who, acquainted with human nature, can wonder?—what was she to do but make the best of it? Some may aver that there is some moral value in continuing in a wrong way through sincerity, but I praise the person who at once turns to the right way, even though the first step or two cannot be well taken without an appearance of feigning.

But the hypocrite is a person who does not at all want to step over to the right way, and yet tries to make you believe he has done so. Beware of that man. His life is a continuous endeavour to make Him a liar who said that it is impossible to serve two masters. Not content with the profits of vice, he tries to gain those of virtue in addition. He is the most selfish, greedy, and covetous creature under Heaven, aiming at two rewards from two different masters for only one life's service. He is the greatest of fools at the same time, trying to make himself believe that there can be a spot where two straight lines, which run in an opposite direction, may meet.

There is no being in the universe whom the hypocrites do not try to cheat.

1. They try to cheat Men.—They know that man is not a searcher of the heart, nor a trier of the reins—that he looketh not on the heart, but on the outward appearance. And upon this they speculate. They never forget that their conscience is not yours, and so they approach you with a bearing as if their own conscience knew nothing more about them than yours does. They only take care that what you hear them say and see them do are right, however bad may be what they are thinking and aiming at. Thus Joab spoke quietly to Abner, with his hand meanwhile on the hilt of his sword, to smite him under the fifth rib (2 Sam. iii. 27). Beware of such men. After careful observation you may easily know them from your true friends. They are often found overdoing the show of friendship; and it cannot be otherwise, for their friendship is not truth but art. You will sometimes find them kissing you, as was the case with Judas. Or they will, with a flourish of sentimental, passionate exclamations, offer you their assistance or protection, where there is not the slightest call for either, as Absalom did when he stole the heart of the people first, to steal his father's throne afterwards (2 Sam. xv. 4).

2. They try to cheat God.—For though they rely upon the fact that man is not like God, searching the heart and trying the reins, yet they think, or at least hope, that God may be like man, looking only on the outward appearance. So they "flatter him with their mouth and lie unto him with their tongues," and while thus they "draw near to him with their mouth and honour him with their lips," they suppose that He does not observe that their heart gives praise to the devil and that their soul "goeth after covetousness." They deal with religion as with merchandise, and with God as if He were a huckster, paying Him, morevoer, with counterfeit coin, and dealing in false measures. You may also easily discover hypocrites by their uncalled-for over-doses of devotion. This could be seen in the case of Saul, the king of Israel, who spared the best of the sheep and oxen of the Amalekites, to offer a sacrifice which God did not want. If they are Romanists, you will find them even more popish than the Pope; if they are Protestants, even Calvin and Luther were not so orthodox as they are. Still, you will find that their godliness is worth little, but is as frankincense, a pennyworth of which emits a cloud like a mountain. They also show an extraordinary tenderness of conscience in all cases in which honesty and rectitude cost nothing, and in which neglect would be as little injurious as observance would be useful. This was seen in the conduct of the Scribes and Pharisees, who paid tithe of mint, anise, and cumin. They appear greatly scandalised at other people's trespasses against the letter of the law, and, with an air of holy indignation, require that justice and righteousness be done, in order that God may receive the honour due to his name; but while thus they are straining out a gnat in public, you may find them the next moment swallowing a camel in secret. Beware of these people, wherever you should discover them, as they are hidden traps of the devil to make you stumble and fall on your way some day. For as they try as much as they can to identify themselves with religion in your eyes, so they may shake your faith in religion itself when one day they come to light as servants of Satan. And come to light they must, for the God whom they try to cheat cannot be deceived. He will pluck off their mask, when the measure of their iniquity is full. Commonly, this takes place before death stays their earthly career, for, adroitly as they may have adjusted the sheep's skin, yet, from certain plaits and seams, it is first suspected and at last discovered that it is not their natural covering. Still, some may succeed in escaping the eye of man, although they will experience in eternity with the greater horror that they never could deceive the eye of God. For a fearful judgment will fall upon the head of those who have done evil, even though good may have come out of it; but their lot will prove tolerable in comparison with the everlasting woe of the hypocrite, who used good for the purpose of doing evil with it.

3. They try to cheat the Devil.—Though they are his children, they do not like the relationship; neither do they grudge him the fire which is prepared for him and his angels. So, while earning his wages here on earth, they try by means of services performed to another Master, to secure to themselves a place in Abraham's bosom. But they will find that Satan is not such a fool as they take him for, and that, though he tries to upset everything in the kingdom of God, yet he is possessed of a sufficient sense of order in his own kingdom, to take care that his followers find their proper places.

4. They try to cheat Themselves.—But for that they could not exist. Self-deception, to a certain extent at least, is as essential to hypocrisy as self-examination is to sanctification. Human nature is too much framed upon the principle of self-preservation, to admit of a man continuing to walk in a way which he is assured will end in everlasting destruction. The hypocrite, by means of some logic or other of his own, reasons himself into the belief that, if he has no certainty, he has at least a chance of coming out safe. To this reasoning the doctrine that nobody is perfectly sincere, on one hand, and the doctrine that God is merciful, on the other, furnish the chief arguments. To tranquillise himself he often appeals to the testimony of his own conscience, which reminds him of all the religious performances with which he has sought to please God, and speaks faintly of all the deeds with which he has served the devil; but he forgets that, before calling up this witness, he seared its memory, so that it only tells the tale which he himself has dictated. He also shifts from one system to another. Sometimes he is a fatalist: he did the evil from necessity. Sometimes he is a Jesuit: he did the evil that good might come out of it. Sometimes he is a utilitarian: God led him into an evil way that he should learn to choose a better one. Sometimes he is an antinomian: no wonder he did the evil, for what else is the Old Man capable of? And sometimes he is a universalist, and thinks there will be a time when God shall be all in all, and even the devil shall be saved.

Beware of the Hypocrite! for even the harlot and the publican will go into the kingdom of God before him. One day he will find that he cheated nobody so fearfully as himself. To neglect truth and religion is bad. To hate truth and religion is worse. But to play with truth and religion is the worst of all; and no hope is held out for those who have lived and died pursuing that awful game.

ANDREW WHITGIFT.

UNDER A COTTAGE ROOF.

I.

My food is but spare,
And humble my cot,
Yet Jesus dwells there,
And blesses my lot.
Though thinly I'm clad,
And tempests oft roll,
He's raiment and bread
And drink to my soul.

II.

His presence is wealth,
His grace is a treasure;
His promise is health,
And joy out of measure;
His word is my rest,
His Spirit my guide:
In Him I am blest,
Whatever betide.

III.

Since Jesus is mine,
Adieu to all sorrow;
I ne'er shall repine,
Nor think of to-morrow;
The lily so fair,
And raven so black,
He nurses with care,
Then how shall I lack?

IV.

Each promise is sure
That shines in his word,
And tells me, though poor,
I'm rich in my Lord.
Hence sorrow and fear:
Since Jesus is nigh,
I'll dry up each tear,
And stifle each sigh.

ANNALS OF A QUIET NEIGHBOURHOOD.

BY THE VICAR.

VII.

I WENT home very quietly, as I say, thinking about the strange elements that not only combine to make life, but must be combined in our idea of life, before we can form a true theory about it. Now-a-days, the vulgar notion of what is life-like in any annals is to be realized by sternly excluding everything but the commonplace; and the means at least are often attained, with this much of the end as well—that the appearance life bears to vulgar minds is represented with a wonderful degree of success. But I believe that this is at least quite as unreal a mode of representing life as the other extreme, wherein the unlikely, the romantic, and the uncommon predominate. I doubt whether there is a single history—if one could only get at the whole of it—in which there is not a considerable admixture of the unlikely become fact, including a few strange coincidences; of the uncommon, which, although striking at first, has grown common from familiarity with its presence as our own; with even at least some one more or less rosy touch of what we call the romantic. My own conviction is, that the poetry is far the deepest in us, and that the prose is only broken-down poetry; and likewise that to this our lives correspond. The poetic region is the true one, and just therefore the incredible one to the lower order of mind; for although every mind is capable of the truth, or rather capable of becoming capable of the truth, there may lie ages between its capacity and the truth. As you will hear some people read poetry so that no mortal could tell it was poetry, so do some people read their own lives and those of others.

I fell into these reflections from comparing in my own mind my former experiences in visiting my parishioners with those of that day. True, I had never sat down to talk with one of them without finding that that man or that woman had actually a history, the most marvellous and important fact to a human being; nay, I had found something more or less remarkable in every one of their histories, so that I was more than barely interested in each of them. And as I made more acquaintance with them, (for I had not been in the position, or the disposition either, before I came to Marshmallows, necessary to the gathering of such experiences), I came to the conclusion—not that I had got into an extraordinary parish of characters—but that every parish must be more or less extraordinary from the same cause. Why did I not use to see such people about me before? Surely I had undergone a change of some sort. Could it be, that the trouble I had been going through of late, had opened the eyes of my mind to the understanding, or rather the simple seeing, of my fellow-men?

But the people among whom I had been to-day belonged rather to such as might be put into a romantic story. Certainly I could not see much that was romantic in the old lady; and yet, those eyes and that tight-skinned face—what might they not be capable of in a working out of a story? And then the place they lived in! Why, it would hardly come into my ideas of a nineteenth-century country parish at all. I was tempted to try to persuade myself that all that had happened, since I rose to look out of the window in the old house, had been but a dream. For how could that wooded dell have come there after all? It was much too large for a quarry. And that madcap girl—she never flung herself into the pond!—it could not be. And what could the book have been that the lady with the sea-blue eyes was reading? Was that a real book at all? No. Yes. Of course it was. But what was it? What had that to do with the matter? It might turn out to be a very commonplace book after all. No; for commonplace books are generally new, or at least in fine bindings. And here was a shabby little old book, such as, if it had been commonplace, would not have been likely to be the companion of a young lady at the bottom of a quarry—

> A savage place, as holy and enchanted
> As ere beneath a waning moon was haunted
> By woman wailing for her demon lover.

I know all this will sound ridiculous, especially that quotation from Kubla Khan coming after the close of the preceding sentence; but it is only so much the more like the jumble of thoughts that made a chaos of my mind as I went home. And then for that terrible pool, and subterranean passage, and all that—what had it all to do with this broad daylight, and these dying autumn leaves? No doubt there had been such places. No doubt there were such places somewhere yet. No doubt this was one of them. But, somehow or other, it would not come in well. I had no intention of going in for—that is the phrase now—going in for the romantic. I would take the impression off by going to see Weir the carpenter's old father. Whether my plan was successful or not, I shall leave my reader to judge.

I found Weir busy as usual, but not with a coffin this time. He was working at a window-sash. "Just like life," I thought—tritely perhaps. "The other day he was closing up in the outer darkness, and now he is letting in the light."

"It's a long time since you was here last, sir," he said, but without a smile.

Did he mean a reproach? If so, I was more glad of that reproach than I would have been of the warmest welcome, even from Old Rogers. The fact was that, having a good deal to attend to besides, and willing at the same time to let the man feel that he was in no danger of being bored by my visits, I had not made use even of my reserve in the shape of a visit to his father.

"Well," I answered, "I wanted to know something about all my people, before I paid a second visit to any of them."

"All right, sir. Don't suppose I meant to complain. Only to let you know you was welcome, sir."

"I've just come from my first visit to Oldcastle Hall. And, to tell the truth, for I don't like pretences, my visit to-day was not so much to you as to your father, whom, perhaps, I ought to have called upon before, only I was afraid of seeming to intrude upon you, seeing we don't exactly think the same way about some things," I added—with a smile I know, which was none the less genuine that I remember it yet.

And what makes me remember it yet? It is the smile that lighted up his face in response to mine. For it was more than I looked for. And his answer helped to fix the smile in my memory.

"You made me think, sir, that perhaps, after all, we were much of the same way of thinking, only perhaps you was a long way ahead of me."

Now the man was not right in saying that we were much of the same way of thinking; for our opinions could hardly do more than come within sight of each other; but what he meant was right enough. For I was certain, from the first, that the man had a regard for the downright, honest way of things, and I hoped that I too had such a regard. How much of selfishness and of pride in one's own judgment might be mixed up with it, both in his case and mine, I had been too often taken in—by myself, I mean—to be at all careful to discriminate, provided there was a proportion of real honesty along with it, which, I felt sure, would ultimately eliminate the other. For in the moral nest, it is not as with the sparrow and the cuckoo. The right, the original inhabitant is the stronger; and, however unlikely at any given point in the history it may be, the sparrow will grow strong enough to heave the intruding cuckoo overboard. So I was pleased that the man should do me the honour of thinking I was right as far as he could see, which is the greatest honour one man can do another; for it is setting him on his own steed, as the eastern tyrants used to do. And I was delighted to think that the road lay open for further and more real communion between us in time to come.

"Well," I answered, "I think we shall understand each other perfectly before long. But now I must see your father, if it is convenient and agreeable."

"My father will be delighted to see you, I know, sir. He can't get so far as the church on Sundays; but you'll find him much more to your mind than me. He's been putting ever so many questions to me about the new parson, wanting me to try whether I couldn't get more out of you than the old parson. That's the way we talk about you, you see, sir. You'll understand. And I've never told him that I'd been to church since you came—I suppose from a bit of pride, because I had so long refused to go; but I don't doubt some of the neighbours have told him, for he never speaks about it now. And I know he's been looking out for you; and I fancy he's begun to wonder that the parson was going to see everybody but him. It will be a pleasure to the old man, sir, for he don't see a great many to talk to; and he's fond of a bit of gossip, is the old man, sir."

So saying, Weir led the way through the shop into a lobby behind, and thence, up what must have been a back stair of the old house, into a large room over the workshop. There were bits of old carving about the walls yet, but, as in the shop below, all had been whitewashed. At one end of the room stood a bed with chintz curtains and a warm-looking counterpane of rich faded embroidery. There was a bit of carpet by the bedside, and another bit in front of the fire; and there the old man sat, on one side, in a high-backed not very easy-looking chair. With a great effort he managed to rise as I approached him, notwithstanding my entreaties that he would not move. He looked much older when on his feet, for he was bent nearly double, in which posture the marvel was how he could walk at all. For he did totter a few steps to meet me, without even the aid of a stick, and, holding out a thin, shaking hand, welcomed me with an air of breeding rarely to be met with in his station in society. But the chief part of this polish sprung from the inbred kindliness of his nature, which was manifest in the expression of his noble old countenance. Age is such a different thing in different natures! One man seems to grow more and more selfish as he grows older; and in another the slow fire of time seems only to consume, with fine, imperceptible gradations, the yet lingering selfishness in him, letting the light of the kingdom, which the Lord says is within, shine out more and more, as the husk grows thin and is ready to fall off, that the man, like the seed sown, may pierce the earth of this world and rise into the pure air and wind and dew of the second life. The face of a loving old man is always to me like a morning moon, reflecting the yet unrisen sun of the other world, yet fading before its approaching light, until, when it does rise, it pales and withers away from our gaze, absorbed in the source of its own beauty. This old man, you may see, took my fancy wonderfully; for even at this distance of time, when I am old myself, the recollection of his beautiful old face makes me feel as if I could write poetry about him.

"I'm blithe to see ye, sir," said he. "Sit ye down, sir."

And, turning, he pointed to his own easy-chair; and I then saw his profile. It was delicate as that of Dante, which in form it marvellously resembled. But all the sternness which Dante's evil times had generated in his prophetic face was in this old man's replaced by a sweetness of hope that was lovely to behold.

"No, Mr. Weir," I said, "I cannot take your chair. The Bible tells us to rise up before the aged, not to turn them out of their seats."

"It would do me good to see you sitting in my chair, sir. The pains that my son Tom there takes to keep it up as long as the old man may want it! It's a good thing I bred him to the joiner's trade, sir. Sit ye down, sir. The cheer 'll hold ye, though I warrant it won't last that long after I've gone home. Sit ye down, sir."

Thus entreated, I hesitated no longer, but took the old man's seat. His son brought another chair for him, and he sat down opposite the fire and close to me. Thomas then went back to his work, leaving us alone.

"Ye've had some speech wi' my son Tom," said the old man, the moment he was gone, leaning a little towards me. "It's main kind o' you, sir, to take up kindly wi' poor folks like us."

"You don't say it's kind of a person to do what he likes best," I answered. "Besides, it's my duty to know all my people."

"Oh yes, sir, I know that. But there's a thousand ways ov doin' the same thing. I ha' seen folks, parsons and others, 'at made a great show ov bein' friendly to the poor, ye know, sir; and all the time you could see, or if you couldn't see you could tell without seein', that they didn't much regard them in their hearts; but it was a sort of accomplishment to be able to talk to the poor, like, after their own fashion. But the minute an ould man sees you, sir, he believes that you mean it, sir, whatever it is. For an ould man somehow comes to know things like a child. They call it a second childhood, don't they, sir? And there are some things worth growin' a child again to get a hould ov again."

"I only hope what you say may be true—about me, I mean."

"Take my word for it, sir. You have no idea how that boy of mine, Tom there, did hate all the clergy till you come. Not that he's anyway favourable to them yet, only he'll say nothin' again' you, sir. He's got an unfortunate gift o' seein' all the faults first, sir; and when a man is that way given, the faults always hides the other side, so that there's nothing but faults to be seen."

"But I find Thomas quite open to reason."

"That's because you understand him, sir, and know how to give him head. He tould me of the talk you had with him. You don't bait him. You don't say, 'You must come along wi' me,' but you turns and goes along wi' him. He's not a bad fellow at all, is Tom; but he will have the reason for everything. Now I never did want the reason for everything. I was content to be tould a many things. But Tom, you see, he was born with a sore bit in him somewheres, I don't rightly know wheres; and I don't think he rightly knows what's the matter with him himself."

"I dare say you have a guess though, by this time, Mr. Weir," I said; "and I think I have a guess too."

"Well, sir, if he'd only give in, I think he would be far happier. But he can't see his way clear."

"You must give him time, you know. The fact is, he doesn't feel at home yet. And how can he, so long as he doesn't know his own father?"

"I'm not sure that I rightly understand you," said the old man, looking bewildered and curious.

"I mean," I answered, "that till a man knows that he is one of God's family, living in God's house, with God up-stairs, as it were, while he is at his work or his play in a nursery below-stairs, he can't feel comfortable. For a man could not be made that should stand alone, like some of the beasts. A man must feel a head over him, because he's not enough to satisfy himself, you know. Thomas just wants faith; that is, he wants to feel that there is a loving Father over him, who is doing things all well and right, if we could only understand them, though it really does not look like it sometimes."

"Ah, sir, I might have understood you well enough, if my poor old head hadn't been started on a wrong track. For I fancied for the moment that you were just putting your finger upon the sore place in Tom's mind. There's no use in keeping family misfortunes from a friend like you, sir. That boy has known his father all his life; but I was nearly half his age before I knew mine."

"Strange!" I said, involuntarily almost.

"Yes, sir; strange you may well say. A strange story it is. The Lord help my mother! I beg yer pardon, sir. I'm no Catholic. But that prayer will come of itself sometimes. As if it could be of any use now! God forgive me!"

"Don't you be afraid, Mr. Weir, as if God was ready to take offence at what comes naturally, as you say. An ejaculation of love is not likely to offend Him who is so grand that He is always meek and lowly of heart, and whose love is such that ours is a mere faint light—'a little glooming light much like a shade'—as one of our own poets says, beside it."

"Thank you, Mr. Walton. That's a real comfortable word, sir. And I am heart-sure it's true, sir. God be praised for evermore! He is good, sir; as I have known in my poor time, sir. I don't believe there ever was one that just lifted his eyes and looked up'ards, instead of looking down to the ground, that didn't get some comfort, to go on with, as it were—the ready-money of comfort, as it were—though it might be none to put in the bank, sir."

"That's true enough," I said. "Then your father and mother——"

And here I hesitated.

"Were never married, sir," said the old man promptly, as if he would relieve me from an embarrassing position. "I couldn't help it. And I'm no less the child of my Father in heaven for it. For if He hadn't made me, I couldn't ha' been their son, you know, sir. So that He had more to do wi' the makin' o' me than they had; though mayhap, if He had had his way all out, I might ha' been the son o' somebody else. But, now that things be so, I wouldn't have liked that at all, sir; and bein' once born so, I would not have ere another couple of parents in all England, sir, though I ne'er knew one o' them. And I do love my mother. And I'm so sorry for my father that I love him too, sir. And if I could only get my boy Tom to think as I do, I would die like a psalm-tune on an organ, sir."

"But it seems to me strange," I said, "that your son should think so much of what is so far gone by. Surely he would not want another father than you, now. He is used to his position in life. And there can be nothing cast up to him about his birth or descent."

"That's all very true, sir, and no doubt it would be as you say. But there has been other things to keep his mind upon the old affair. Indeed, sir, we have had the same misfortune all over again among the young people. And I mustn't say anything more about it; only my boy Tom has a sore heart."

I knew at once to what he alluded; for I could not have been about in my parish all this time without learning that the strange handsome woman in the little shop was the daughter of Thomas Weir, and that she was neither wife nor widow. And it now occurred to me for the first time that it was a likeness to her little boy that had affected me so pleasantly when I first saw Thomas, his grandfather. The likeness to his great-grandfather, which I saw plainly enough, was what made the other fact clear to me. And at the same moment I began to be haunted with a flickering sense of a third likeness which I could not in the least fix or identify.

"Perhaps," I said, "he may find some good come out of that too."

"Well, who knows, sir?"

"I think," I said, "that if we do evil that good may come, the good we looked for will never come thereby. But once evil is done, we may humbly look to Him who bringeth good out of evil, and wait. Is your grand-daughter Catherine in bad health? She looks so delicate!"

"She always had an uncommon look. But what she looks like now, I don't know. I hear no complaints; but she has never crossed this door since we got her set up in that shop. She never comes near her father or her sister, though she lets them, leastways her sister, go and see her. I'm afraid Tom has been raythor unmerciful with her. And if ever he put a bad name upon her in her hearing, I know from what that lass used to be as a young one, that she wouldn't be likely to forget it, and as little likely to get over it herself or pass it over to another, even her own father. I don't believe they do more nor nod to one another when they meet in the village. It's well even if they do that much. It's my belief there's some people made so hard they never can forgive anythink."

'How did she get into the trouble? Who is the father of her child?"

"Nay, that no one knows for certain; though there be suspicions, and one of them no doubt correct. But I believe fire wouldn't drive his name out at her mouth. I know my lass. When she says a thing she'll stick to it."

I asked no more questions. But after a short pause the old man went on.

"I shan't soon forget the night I first heard about my father and mother. That was a night! The wind was roaring like a mad beast about the house; —not this house, sir, but the great house over the way."

"You don't mean Oldcastle Hall?" I said.

"'Deed I do, sir," returned the old man. "This house here belonged to the same family at one time; though when I was born it was another branch of the family, second cousins or something, that lived in it. But even then it was something on to the downhill road, I believe."

"But," I said, fearing my question might have turned the old man aside from a story worth hearing, "never mind all that now, if you please. I am anxious to hear all about that night. Do go on. You were saying the wind was blowing about the old house."

"Eh, sir, it was roaring!—roaring as if it was mad with rage! And every now and then it would come down the chimley like out of a gun, and blow the smoke and a'most the fire into the middle of the housekeeper's room. For the housekeeper had been giving me my supper. I called her auntie, then; and didn't know a bit that she wasn't my aunt really. I was at that time a kind of a under-gamekeeper upon the place, and slep over the stable. But I fared of the best, for I was a favourite with the old woman—I suppose because I had given her plenty of trouble in my time. That's always the way, sir.—Well, as I was a-saying, when the wind stopped for a moment, down came the rain with a noise that sounded like a regiment of cavalry on the turnpike road t'other side of the hill. And then up the wind got again and swept the rain away, and took it all in its own hand again, and went on roaring worse than ever. 'You'll be wet afore you get across the yard, Samuel,' said Auntie, looking very prim in her long white apron, as she sat on the other side of the little round table before the fire, sipping a drop of hot rum and water, which she always had before she went to bed. 'You'll be wet to the skin, Samuel,' she said. 'Never mind,' says I. 'I'm not salt nor yet sugar; and I'll be going, Auntie, for you'll be wanting your bed.'—'Sit ye still,' said she. 'I don't want my bed yet.' And there she sat, sipping at her rum and water; and there I sat, o' the other side, drinking the last of a pint of October she had gotten me from the cellar —for I had been out in the wind all day. 'It was just such a night as this,' said she, and then stopped again.—But I'm wearying you, sir, with my long story."

"Not in the least," I answered. "Quite the contrary. Pray tell it out—your own way. You won't tire me, I assure you."

So the old man went on.

"'It was just such a night as this,' she began again —'leastways it was snow and not rain that was coming down, as if the Almighty was a-going to spend all his winter-stock at oncet.'—'What happened such a night, Auntie?' I said. 'Ah, my lad!' said she, 'ye may well ask what happened. None has a better right. You happened. That's all.'—'Oh, that's all, is it, Auntie?' I said, and laughed. 'Nay, nay, Samuel,' said she, quite solemn, 'what is there to laugh at, then? I assure you, you was anything but welcome.'—'And why wasn't I welcome?' I said. 'I couldn't help it, you know. I'm very sorry to hear I intruded,' I said, still making game of it, you see; for I always did like a joke. 'Well,' she said, 'you certainly weren't wanted. But I don't blame you, Samuel, and I hope you won't blame me.' —'What do you mean, Auntie?' 'I mean this, that it's my fault, if so be that fault it is, that you're sitting there now, and not lying, in less bulk by a good deal, at the bottom of the Bishop's Basin.' That's what they call a deep pond at the foot of the old house, sir; though why or wherefore, I'm sure I don't know. 'Most extraordinary, Auntie!' I said, feeling very queer, and as if I really had no business to be there. 'Never you mind, my dear,' she said; 'there you are, and you can take care of yourself now as well as anybody.'—'But who wanted to drown me?'

'Are you sure you can forgive him, if I tell you?'—'Sure enough, if he was sitting where you be now,' I answered. 'It was, I make no doubt, though I can't prove it,—I am morally certain it was your own father.' I felt the skin creep together upon my head, and I could not speak. 'Yes, it was, child; and it's time you knew all about it. Why, you don't know who your own father was!'—'No more I do,' I said; 'and I never cared to ask, somehow. I thought it was all right, I suppose. But I wonder now that I never did.'—'Indeed you did many a time, when you was a mere boy, like; but I suppose, as you never was answered, you give it up for a bad job, and forgot all about it, like a wise man. You always was a wise child, Samuel.' So the old lady always said, sir. And I was willing to believe she was right, if I could. 'But now,' said she, 'it's time you knew all about it.—Poor Miss Wallis!—I'm no aunt of yours, my boy, though I love you nearly as well, I think, as if I was; for dearly did I love your mother. She was a beauty, and better than she was beautiful, whatever folks may say. The only wrong thing, I'm certain, that she ever did, was to trust your father too much. But I must see and give you the story right through from beginning to end.—Miss Wallis, as I came to know from her own lips, was the daughter of a country attorney, who had a good practice, and was likely to leave her well off. Her mother died when she was a little girl. It's not easy getting on without a mother, my boy. So she wasn't taught much of the best sort, I reckon. When her father died early, and she was left alone, the only thing she could do was to take a governess's place, and she came to us. She never got on well with the children, for they were young and self-willed and rude, and would not learn to do as they were bid. I never knew one o' them shut the door when they went out of this room. And, from having had all her own way at home, with plenty of servants, and money to spend, it was a sore change to her. But she was a sweet creature, that she was. She did look sorely tried when Master Freddy would get on the back of her chair, and Miss Gusta would lie down on the rug, and never stir for all she could say to them, but only laugh at her.—To be sure!' And then Auntie would take a sip at her rum and water, and sit considering old times like a statie. And I sat as if all my head was one great ear, and I never spoke a word. And Auntie began again. 'The way I came to know so much about her was this. Nobody, you see, took any notice or care of her. For the children were kept away with her in the old house, and my lady wasn't one to take trouble about anybody till once she stood in her way, and then she would just shove her aside or crush her like a spider, and ha' done with her.'—They have always been a proud and a fierce race, the Oldcastles, sir," said Weir, taking up the speech in his own person, "and there's been a deal o' breedin' in-and-in amongst them, and that has kept up the worst of them. The men took to the women of their own sort somehow, you see. The lady up at the old Hall now is a Crowfoot. I'll just tell you one thing the gardener told me about her years ago, sir. She had a fancy for hyacinths in her rooms in the spring, and she had some particular fine ones; and a lady of her acquaintance begged for some of them. And what do you think she did? She couldn't refuse them, and she couldn't bear any one to have them as good as she. And so she sent the hyacinth-roots—but she boiled 'em first. The gardener told me himself, sir.—'And so, when the poor thing,' said Auntie, 'was taken with a dreadful cold, which was no wonder if you saw the state of the window in the room she had to sleep in, and which I got old Jones to set to rights and paid him for it out of my own pocket, else he wouldn't ha' done it at all, for the family wasn't too much in the way or the means either of paying their debts—well, there she was, and nobody minding her, and of course it fell to me to look after her. It would have made your heart bleed to see the poor thing flung all of a heap on her bed, blue with cold and coughing. "My dear!" I said; and she burst out crying, and from that moment there was confidence between us. I made her as warm and as comfortable as I could, but I had to nurse her for a fortnight before she was able to do anything again. She didn't shirk her work though, poor thing. It was a heartsore to me to see the poor young thing with her sweet eyes and her pale face, talking away to those children that were more like wild cats than human beings. She might as well have talked to wild cats, I'm sure. But I don't think she was ever so miserable again as she must have been before her illness; for she used often to come and see me of an evening, and she would sit there where you are sitting now, foran hour at a time, without speaking, her thin white hands lying folded in her lap, and her eyes fixed on the fire. I used to wonder what she could be thinking about, and I had made up my mind she was not long for this world; when all at once it was announced that Miss Oldcastle, who had been to school for some time, was coming home; and then we began to see a great deal of company, and for month after month the house was more or less filled with visitors, so that my time was constantly taken up, and I saw much less of poor Miss Wallis than I had seen before. But when we did meet on some of the back stairs, or when she came to my room for a few minutes before going to bed, we were just as good friends as ever. And I used to say, "I wish this scurry was over, my dear, that we might have our old times again." And she would smile and say something sweet. But I was surprised to see that her health began to come back—at least so it seemed to me, for her eyes grew brighter and a flush came upon her pale face, and though the children were as tiresome as ever, she didn't seem to mind it so much. But indeed she had not very much to do with them out of school hours now; for when the spring came on, they would be out and about the place with their sister or one of their brothers; and indeed, out of doors it would have been impossible for Miss Wallis to do anything with them. Some of the visitors would take to them too, for they behaved so badly to nobody as to Miss Wallis, and indeed they were clever children, and could be engaging enough when they pleased.—But then I had a blow, Samuel. It was a lovely spring night, just after the sun was down, and I wanted a drop of milk fresh from the cow for something that I was making for dinner the next day; so I went through the kitchen-garden and through the belt of young larches to go to the shippen. But when I got among the trees, who should I see at the other end of the path that went along, but Miss Wallis walking arm-in-arm with Captain Crowfoot, who was just home from India, where he had been with Lord Clive.' The captain was a man about two or three and thirty, a relation of the family, and the son of Sir Giles Crowfoot'—who lived then in this old house, sir, and had but that one son, my father, you see, sir. —'And it did give me a turn,' said my aunt, 'to see her walking with him, for I felt as sure as judgment that no good could come of it. For the captain had not the best of characters—that is, when people talked about him in chimney-corners, and such like, though he was a great favourite with everybody that knew nothing about him. He was a fine, manly, handsome fellow, with a smile that, as people said, no woman could resist, though I'm sure it would have given me no trouble to resist it, whatever they may mean by that, for I saw that that same smile was the falsest thing of all the false things about him. All the time he was smiling, you would have thought he was looking at himself in a glass. He was said to have gathered a power of money in India, somehow or other. But I don't know, only I don't think he would have been the favourite he was with my lady if he hadn't. And reports were about, too, of the ways and means by which he had made the money; some said by robbing the poor heathen creatures; and some said it was only that his brother officers didn't quite approve of his speculating as he did in horses and other things. I don't know whether officers are so particular. At all events, this was a fact, for it was one of his own servants that told me, not thinking any harm or any shame of it. He had quarrelled with a young ensign in the regiment. On which side the wrong was, I don't know. But he first thrashed him most unmercifully, and then called him out, as they say. And when the poor fellow appeared, he could scarcely see out of his eyes, and certainly couldn't take anything like an aim. And he shot him dead, did Captain Crowfoot.'—Think of hearing that about one's own father, sir! But I never said a word, for I hadn't a word to say.—'Think of that, Samuel,' said my aunt, 'else you won't believe what I am going to tell you. And you won't even then, I dare say. But I must tell you, nevertheless and notwithstanding.—Well, I felt as if the earth was sinking away from under the feet of me, and I stood and stared at them. And they came on, never seeing me, and actually went close past me and never saw me; at least, if he saw me he took no notice, for I don't suppose that the angel with the flaming sword would have put him out. But for her, I know she didn't see me, for her face was down, burning and smiling at once.'—I'm an old man now, sir, and I never saw my mother; but I can't tell you the story without feeling as if my heart would break for the poor young lady.—'I went back to my room,' said my aunt, 'with my empty jug in my hand, and I sat down as if I had had a stroke, and I never moved till it was pitch dark and my fire out. It was a marvel to me afterwards that nobody came near me, for everybody was calling after me at that time. And it was days before I caught a glimpse of Miss Wallis again, at least to speak to her. At last, one night she came to my room; and without a moment of parley, I said to her, "Oh, my dear! what was that wretch saying to you?"—"What wretch?" says she, quite sharp like. "Why, Captain Crowfoot," says I, "to be sure."—"What have you to say against Captain Crowfoot?" says she, quite scornful like. So I tumbled out all I had against him in one breath. She turned awful pale, and she shook from head to foot, but she was able for all that to say, "Indian servants are known liars, Mrs. Prendergast," says she, "and I don't believe one word of it all. But I'll ask him, the next time I see him."—"Do so, my dear," I said, not fearing for myself, for I knew he would not make any fuss that might bring the thing out into the air, and hoping that it might lead to a quarrel between them. And the next time I met her, Samuel—it was in the gallery that takes to the west turret, she passed me with a nod just, and a blush instead of a smile on her sweet face. And I didn't blame her, Samuel; but I knew that that villain had gotten a hold of her. And so I could only cry, and that I did. Things went on like this for some months. The captain came and went, stopping a week at a time. Then he stopped for a whole month, and this was in the first of the summer; and then he said he was ordered abroad again, and went away. But he didn't go abroad. He came again in the autumn for the shooting, and began to make up to Miss Oldcastle, who had grown a fine young woman by that time. And then Miss Wallis began to pine. The captain went away again. Before long I was certain that if ever young creature was in a consumption, she was; but she never said a word to me. How ever the poor thing got on with her work, I can't think, but she grew weaker and weaker. I took the best care of her she would let me, and contrived that she should have her meals in her own room; but something was between her and me that she never spoke a word about herself, and never alluded to the captain. By and by came the news that the captain and Miss Oldcastle were to be married in the spring. And Miss Wallis took to her bed after that; and my lady said she had never been of much use, and wanted to send her away. But Miss Oldcastle, who was far superior to any of the rest in her disposition, spoke up for her. She had been to ask me about her, and I told her the poor thing must go to a hospital if she was sent away, for she had ne'er a home to go to. And then she went to see the governess, poor thing! and spoke very kindly to her; but never a word would Miss Wallis answer; she only stared at her with great, big, wild-like eyes. And Miss Oldcastle thought she was out of her mind, and spoke of an asylum. But I said she hadn't long to live, and if she would get my lady her mother to consent to take no notice, I would take all the care and trouble of her. And she promised, and the poor thing was left alone. I began to think myself her mind must be going, for not a word would she speak, even to me, though every moment I could spare I was up with her in her room. Only I was forced to be careful not to be out of the way when my lady wanted me, for that would have tied me more. At length one day, as I was settling her pillow for her, she all at once threw her arms about my neck, and burst into a terrible fit of crying. She sobbed and panted for breath so dreadfully, that I put my arms round her and lifted her up to give her relief; and when I laid her down again, I whispered in her ear, "I know now, my dear. I'll do all I can for you." She caught hold of my hand and held it to her lips, and then to her bosom, and cried again, but more quietly, and all was right between us once more. It was well for her, poor thing, that she could go to her bed. And I said to myself, "Nobody need ever know about it; and nobody ever shall if I can help it." To tell the truth, my hope was that she would die before there was any need for further concealment. But people in that condition seldom die, they say, till all is over; and so she lived on and on, though plainly getting weaker and weaker.—At the captain's next visit, the wedding-day was fixed. And after that a circumstance came about that made me uneasy. A Hindoo servant —the captain called him his nigger always—had been constantly in attendance upon him. I never could abide the snake-look of the fellow, nor the noiseless way he went about the house. But this time the captain had a Hindoo woman with him as well. He said that his man had fallen in with her in London; that he had known her before; that she had come home as nurse with an English family, and it would be very nice for his wife to take her back with her to India, if she could only give her house-room, and make her useful till after the wedding. This was easily arranged, and he went away to return in three weeks, when the wedding was to take place. Meantime poor Emily grew fast worse, and how she held out with that terrible cough of hers I never could understand —and spitting blood, too, every other hour or so, though not very much. And now, to my great trouble, with the preparations for the wedding, I could see yet less of her than before; and when Miss Oldcastle sent the Hindoo to ask me if she might not sit in the room with the poor girl, I did not know how to object, though I did not at all like her being there. I felt a great mistrust of the woman somehow or other. I never did like blacks, and I never shall. So she went, and sat by her, and waited on her very kindly—at least poor Emily said so. I called her Emily because she had begged me, that she might feel as if her mother were with her, and she was a child again. I had tried before to find out from her when greater care would be necessary, but she couldn't tell me anything. I doubted even if she understood me. I longed to have the wedding over that I might get rid of the black woman, and have time to take her place, and get everything prepared. The captain arrived, and his man with him. And twice I came upon the two blacks in close conversation. —Well, the wedding-day came. The people went to church: and while they were there a terrible storm of wind and snow came on, such that the horses would hardly face it. The captain was going to take his bride home to his father, Sir Giles's; but, short as the distance was, before the time came the storm got so dreadful that no one could think of leaving the house that night. The wind blew for all the world just as it blows this night, only it was snow in its mouth, and not rain. Carriage and horses and all would have been blown off the road for certain. It did blow, to be sure! After dinner was over and the ladies were gone to the drawing-room, and the gentlemen had been sitting over their wine for some time, the butler, William Weir—an honest man, whose wife lived at the lodge—came to my room looking scared. "Lawks, William!" says I,' said my aunt, sir, "what ever is the matter with you?"—"Well, Mrs. Prendergast!" says he, and said no more. "Lawks, William," says I, "speak out."—"Well," says he, "Mrs. Prendergast, it's a strange wedding, it is! There's the ladies all alone in the withdrawing-room, and there's the gentlemen calling for more wine, and cursing and swearing that it's awful to hear. It's my belief that swords 'll be drawn afore long."—"Tut!" says I, "William, it'll come the sooner if you don't give them what they want. Go and get it as fast as you can."—"I don't a'most like goin' down them stairs alone, in sich a night, ma'am," says he. "Would you mind coming with me?"—"Dear me, William," says I, "a pretty story to tell your wife"— she was my own half-sister, and younger than me— "a pretty story to tell your wife, that you wanted an old body like me to go and take care of you in your own cellar," says I. "But I'll go with you, if you like; for, to tell the truth, it's a terrible night." And so down we went, and brought up six bottles more of the best port. And I really didn't wonder, when I was down there, and heard the dull roar of the wind against the rock below, that William didn't much like to go alone.—When he went back with the wine, the captain said, "William, what kept you so long? Mr. Centlivre says that you were afraid to go down into the cellar." Now, wasn't that odd, for it was a real fact? Before William could reply, Sir Giles said, "A man might well be afraid to go anywhere alone in a night like this." Whereupon the captain cried, with an oath, that he would go down the underground stair, and into every vault on the way, for the wager of a guinea. And there the matter, according to William, dropped, for the fresh wine was put on the table. But after they had drunk the most of it—the captain, according to William, drinking less than usual—it was brought up again, he couldn't tell by which of them. And in five minutes after, they were all at my door, demanding the key of the room at the top of the stair. I was just going up to see poor Emily when I heard the noise of their unsteady feet coming along the passage to my door; and I gave the captain the key at once, wishing with all my heart he might get a good fright for his pains. He took a jug with him, too, to bring some water up from the well, as a proof he had been down. The rest of the gentlemen went with him into the little cellar-room; but they wouldn't stop there till he came up again, they said it was so cold. They all came into my room, where they talked as gentlemen wouldn't do if the wine hadn't got uppermost. It was some time before the captain returned. It's a good way down and back. When he came in at last, he looked as if he had got the fright I wished him, he had such a scared look. The candle in his lantern was out, and there was no water in the jug. "There's your guinea, Centlivre," says he, throwing it on the table. "You needn't ask me any questions, for I won't answer one of them."—"Captain," says I, as he turned to leave the room, and the other gentlemen rose to follow him, "I'll just hang up the key again."—"By all means," says he. "Where is it, then?" says I. He started and made as if he searched his pockets all over for it. "I must have dropped it," says he; "but it's of no consequence; you can send William to look for it in the morning. It can't be lost, you know."—"Very well, Captain," said I. But I didn't like being without the key, because of course he hadn't locked the door, and that part of the house has a bad name, and no wonder. It wasn't exactly pleasant to have the door left open. All this time I couldn't get to see how Emily was. As often as I looked from my window, I saw her light in the old west turret out there, Samuel. You know the room where the bed is still. The rain and the wind will be blowing right through it to-night. That's the bed you were born upon, Samuel.'—It's all gone now, sir, turret and all, like a good deal more about the old place; but there's a story about that turret afterwards, only I mustn't try to tell you two things at once.—'Now I had told the Indian woman that if anything happened, if she was worse, or wanted to see me, she must put the candle on the right side of the window, and I should always be looking out, and would come directly, whoever might wait. For I was expecting you some time soon, and nobody knew anything about when you might come. But there the blind continued drawn down as before. So I thought all was going on right. And what with the storm keeping Sir Giles and so many more that would have gone home that night, there was no end of work, and some contrivance necessary, I can tell you, to get them all bedded for the night, for we were nothing too well provided with blankets and linen in the house. There was always more room than money in it. So it was past twelve o'clock before I had a minute to myself, and that was only after they had all gone to bed—the bride and bridegroom in the crimson chamber of course. Well, at last I crept quietly into Emily's room. I ought to have told you that I had not let her know anything about the wedding being that day, and had enjoined the heathen woman not to say a word; for I thought she might as well die without hearing about it. But I believe the vile wretch did tell her. When I opened the room door, there was no light there. I spoke, but no one answered. I had my own candle in my hand, but it had been blown out as I came up the stair. I turned and ran along the corridor to reach the main stair, which was the nearest way to my room, when all at once I heard such a shriek from the crimson chamber as I never heard in my life. It made me all creep like worms. And in a moment doors and doors were opened, and lights came out, everybody looking terrified; and what with drink, and horror, and sleep, some of the gentlemen were awful to look at. And the door of the crimson chamber opened too, and the captain appeared in his dressing-gown, bawling out to know what was the matter; though I'm certain, to this day, the cry did come from that room, and that he knew more about it than any one else did. As soon as I got a light, however, which I did from Sir Giles's candle, I left them to settle it amongst them, and ran back to the west turret. When I entered the room, there was my dear girl lying white and motionless. There could be no doubt a baby had been born, but no baby was to be seen. I rushed to the bed; but though she was still warm, your poor mother was quite dead. There was no use in thinking about helping her; but what could have become of the child? As if by a light in my mind, I saw it all. I rushed down to my room, got my lantern, and, without waiting to be afraid, ran to the underground stairs, where I actually found the door standing open. I had not gone down more than three turnings, when I thought I heard a cry, and I sped faster still. And just about half-way down, there lay a bundle in a blanket. And how ever you got over the state I found you in, Samuel, I can't think. But I caught you up as you was, and ran to my own room with you; and I locked the door, and there being a kettle on the fire, and some conveniences in the place, I did the best for you I could. For the breath wasn't out of you, though it well might have been. And then I laid you before the fire, and by that time you had begun to cry a little, to my great pleasure. And then I got a blanket off my bed, and wrapt you up in it; and, the storm being abated by this time, made the best of my way with you through the snow to the lodge, where William's wife lived. It was not so far off then as it is now. But in the midst of my trouble the silly body did make me laugh when he opened the door to me, and saw the bundle in my arms. "Mrs. Prendergast," says he, "I didn't expect it of you."—"Hold your tongue," I said. "You would never have talked such nonsense if you had had the grace to have any of your own," says I. And with that I into the bed-room and shut the door, and left him out there in his shirt. My sister and I soon got everything arranged, for there was no time to lose. And before morning I had all made tidy, and your poor mother lying as sweet a corpse as ever angel saw. And no one could say a word against her. And it's my belief that that villain made her believe somehow or other that she was as good as married to him. She was buried down there in the churchyard, close by the vestry-door,' said my aunt, sir; and all of our family have been buried there ever since, my son Tom's wife among them, sir."

"But what was that cry in the house?" I asked. "And what became of the black woman?"

"The woman was never seen again in our quarter. And what the cry was my aunt never would say. She seemed to know though; notwithstanding, as she said, that Captain and Mrs. Crowfoot denied all knowledge of it. But the lady looked dreadful, she said, and never was well again, and died at the birth of her first child. That was the present Mrs. Oldcastle's father, sir."

"But why should the woman have left you on the stair, instead of drowning you in the well at the bottom?"

"My aunt evidently thought there was some mystery about that as well as the other, for she had no doubt about the woman's intention. But all she would ever say concerning it was, 'The key was never found, Samuel. You see I had to get a new one made.' And she pointed to where it hung on the wall. 'But that doesn't look new now,' she would say. 'The lock was very hard to fit again.' And so you see, sir, I was brought up as her nephew, though people were surprised, no doubt, that William Weir's wife should have a child, and nobody knew she was expecting.—Well, with all the reports of the captain's money, none of it showed in this old place, which from that day began, as it were, to crumble away. There's been little repair done upon it since then. If it hadn't been a well-built place to begin with, it wouldn't be standing now, sir. But it's a very different place, I can tell you. Why, all behind was a garden with terraces, and fruit trees, and gay flowers, to no end. I remember it as well as yesterday; nay, a great deal better, for the matter of that. For I don't remember yesterday well at all, sir."

I have tried a little to tell the story as he told it. But I am aware that I have succeeded very badly; for I am not like my friend in London, who, I verily believe, could give you an exact representation of any dialect he ever heard. I wish I had been able to give a little more of the form of the old man's speech: all I have been able to do is to show a difference from my own way of telling a story. But in the main, I think, I have reported it correctly. I believe if the old man was as correct in representing his aunt's account, the story is very little altered between us.

But why should I tell such a story at all?

I am willing to allow, at once, that I have very likely given it more room than it deserves in these poor Annals of mine; but the reason why I tell it at all is simply this, that, as it came from the old man's lips, it interested me greatly. It certainly did not produce the effect I had hoped to gain from an interview with him, namely a reduction to the common and present. For all this ancient tale tended to keep up the sense of distance between my day's experience at the Hall and the work I had to do amongst my cottagers and tradespeople. Indeed it came very strangely upon that experience.

"But surely you did not believe such an extravagant tale? The old man was in his dotage, to begin with."

Had the old man been in his dotage, which he was not, my answer would have been a more triumphant one. For when was dotage consistently and imaginatively inventive? But why should I not believe the story? There are people who can never believe anything that is not (I do not say merely in accordance with their own character, but) in accordance with the particular mood they may happen to be in at the time it is presented to them. They know nothing of human nature beyond their own immediate preference at the moment for port or sherry, for vice or virtue. To tell me there could not be a man so lost to shame, if to rectitude, as Captain Crowfoot, is simply to talk nonsense. Nay, gentle reader, if you—and let me suppose I address a lady—if you will give yourself up for thirty years to doing just whatever your lowest self and not your best self may like, I will warrant you capable, by the end of that time, of child-murder at least. I do not think the descent to Avernus is always easy; but it is always possible. Many and many such a story was fact in old times; and human nature being the same still, though under different restraints, equally horrible things are constantly in progress towards the windows of the newspapers.

"But the whole tale has such a melo-dramatic air!"

That argument simply amounts to this: that, because such subjects are capable of being employed with great dramatic effect, and of being at the same time very badly represented, therefore they cannot take place in real life. But ask any physician of your acquaintance, whether a story is unlikely simply because it involves terrible things such as do not occur every day. The fact is, that such things, occurring monthly or yearly only, are more easily hidden away out of sight. Indeed we can have no sense of security for ourselves except in the knowledge that we are striving up and away, and therefore cannot be sinking nearer to the region of such awful possibilities.

Yet, as I said before, I am afraid I have given it too large a space in my narrative. Only it so forcibly reminded me at the time of the expression I could not understand upon Miss Oldcastle's face, and since then has been so often recalled by circumstances and events, that I felt impelled to record it in full. And now I have done with it.

I left the old man with thanks for the kind reception he had given me, and walked home, revolving many things with which I shall not detain the attention of my reader. Indeed my thoughts were confused and troubled, and would ill bear analysis or record. I shut myself up in my study, and tried to read a sermon of Jeremy Taylor. But it would not do. I fell fast asleep over it at last, and woke refreshed.

VIII.

During the suffering which accompanied the disappointment at which I have already hinted, I did not think it inconsistent with the manly spirit in which I was resolved to endure it, to seek consolation from such a source as the New Testament—if mayhap consolation for such a trouble was to be found there. Whereupon, a little to my surprise, I discovered that I could not read the Epistles at all. For I did not then care an atom for the theological discussions in which I had been interested before, and for the sake of which I had read those epistles. Now that I was in trouble, what to me was that philosophical theology staring me in the face from out the sacred page? Ah! reader, do not misunderstand me. All reading of the Book is not reading of the Word. And many that are first shall be last and the last first. I know now that it was Jesus Christ and not theology that filled the hearts of the men that wrote those epistles—Jesus Christ, the living, loving God-Man, whom I found—not in the Epistles, but in the Gospels. The Gospels contain what the Apostles preached—the Epistles what they wrote after the preaching. And until we understand the Gospel, the good news of Jesus Christ our brother-king—until we understand Him, until we have his Spirit, promised so freely to them that ask it—all the Epistles, the words of men who were full of Him, and wrote out of that fulness, who loved Him so utterly that by that very love they were lifted into the air of pure reason and right, and would die for Him, and did die for Him without two thoughts about it, in the very simplicity of no choice—the Letters, I say, of such men are to us a sealed book. Until we love the Lord so as to do what He tells us, we have no right to have an opinion about what one of those men meant; for all they wrote is about things beyond us. The simplest woman who tries not to judge her neighbour, or not to be anxious for the morrow, will better know what is best to know, than the best-read bishop without that one simple outgoing of his highest nature in the effort to do the will of Him who thus spoke.

But I have, as is too common with me, been led away by my feelings from the path to the object before me. What I wanted to say was this: that, although I could make nothing of the Epistles, could see no possibility of consolation for my distress springing from them, I found it altogether different when I tried the Gospel once more. Indeed it then took such a hold of me as it had never taken before. Only that is simply saying nothing. I found out that I had known nothing at all about it; that I had only a certain surface-knowledge, which tended rather to ignorance, because it fostered the delusion that I did know. Know that man, Christ Jesus! Ah! Lord, I would go through fire and water to sit the last at Thy table in Thy kingdom; but dare I say now I know Thee!—But Thou art the Gospel, for Thou art the Way, the Truth, and the Life; and I have found Thee the Gospel. For I found, as I read, that Thy very presence in my thoughts, not as the theologians show Thee, but as Thou showedst thyself to them who report Thee to us, smoothed the troubled waters of my spirit, so that, even while the storm lasted, I was able to walk upon them to go to Thee. And when those waters became clear, I most rejoiced in their clearness because they mirrored Thy form—because Thou wert there to my vision—the one Ideal, the perfect man, the God perfected as king of men by working out his Godhood in the work of man; revealing that God and man are one; that to serve God, a man must be partaker of the Divine nature; that for a man's work to be done thoroughly, God must come and do it first himself; that to help men, He must be what He is—man in God, God in man—visibly before their eyes, or to the hearing of their ears. So much I saw.

And therefore, when I was once more in a position to help my fellows, what could I want to give them but that which was the very bread and water of life to me—the Saviour himself? And how was I to do this?—By trying to represent the man in all the simplicity of his life, of his sayings and doings, of his refusals to say or do.—I took the story from the beginning, and told them about the Baby; trying to make the fathers and mothers, and all whose love for children supplied the lack of fatherhood and motherhood, feel that it was a real baby-boy. And I followed the life on and on, trying to show them how He felt, as far as one might dare to touch such sacred things, when He did so and so, or said so and so; and what his relation to his father and mother and brothers and sisters was, and to the different kinds of people who came about Him. And I tried to show them what his sayings meant, as far as I understood them myself; and where I could not understand them I just told them so, and said I hoped for more light by and by to enable me to understand them; telling them that that hope was a sharp goad to my resolution, driving me on to do my duty, because I knew that only as I did my duty would light go up in my heart, making me wise to understand the precious words of my Lord. And I told them that if they would try to do their duty, they would find more understanding from that than from any explanation I could give them.

And so I went on from Sunday to Sunday. And the number of people that slept grew less and less, until at last it was reduced to the churchwarden, Mr. Brownrigg, and an old washerwoman, who, poor thing, stood so much all the week, that sitting down with her was like going to bed, and she never could do it, as she told me, without going to sleep. I therefore called upon her every Monday morning, and had five minutes' chat with her as she stood at her wash-tub, wishing to make up to her for her drowsiness; and thinking that if I could once get her interested in any thing, she might be able to keep awake a little while at the beginning of the sermon; for she gave me no chance of interesting her on Sundays—going fast asleep the moment I stood up to preach. I never got so far as that, however; and the only fact that showed me I had made any impression upon her, beyond the pleasure she always manifested when I appeared on the Monday, was, that, whereas all my linen had been very badly washed at first, a decided improvement took place after a while, beginning with my surplice and bands, and gradually extending itself to my shirts and handkerchiefs; till even Mrs. Pearson was unable to find any fault with the poor old sleepy woman's work. For Mr. Brownrigg, I do not believe the sense of any one sentence I ever uttered, down to the day of his death, entered into his brain, not to say mind or heart. With regard to him, and millions besides, I am more than happy to obey my Lord's command, and not judge.

But it was not long either before my congregations began to improve, whatever might be the cause. I could not help hoping that it was really because they liked to hear the Gospel, that is, the good news about Christ himself. And I always made use of the knowledge I had of my individual hearers, to say what I thought would do them good. Not that I ever preached at anybody; I only sought to explain the principles of things in which I knew action of some sort was demanded from them. For I remembered how our Lord's sermon against covetousness, with the parable of the rich man with the little barn, had for its occasion the request of a man that our Lord would interfere to make his brother share with him; which He declined to do, but gave both brothers a lesson such as, if they wished to do what was right, would help them to see clearly what was the right thing to do in this and every such matter. Clear the mind's eye, by washing away the covetousness, and the whole nature would be full of light, and the right walk would speedily follow.

Before long, likewise, I was as sure of seeing the pale face of Thomas Weir perched, like that of a man beheaded for treason, upon the apex of the gablet of the old tomb, as I was of hearing the wonderful playing of that husky old organ, of which I have spoken once before. I continued to pay him a visit every now and then; and I assure you, never was the attempt to be thoroughly honest towards a man better understood or more appreciated than my attempt was by the atheistical carpenter. The man was no more an atheist than David was when he saw the wicked spreading like a green bay-tree and was troubled at the sight. He only wanted to see a God in whom he could trust. And if I succeeded at all in making him hope that there might be such a God, it is to me one of the most precious seals of my ministry.

But it was now getting very near Christmas, and there was one person whom I had never yet seen at church: that was Catherine Weir. I thought, at first, it could hardly be that she shrunk from being seen; for how then could she have taken to keeping a shop, where she must be at the beck of every one? I had several times gone and bought tobacco of her since that first occasion; and I had told my housekeeper to buy whatever she could from her, instead of going to the larger shop in the place; at which Mrs. Pearson had grumbled a good deal, saying how could the things be so good out of a poky shop like that? But I told her I did not care if the things were not quite as good; for it would be of more consequence to Catherine to have the custom, than it would be to me to have the one lump of sugar I put in my tea of a morning one shade or even two shades whiter. So I had contrived to keep up a kind of connection with her, although I saw that any attempt at conversation was so distasteful that it must do harm until something should have brought about a change in her feelings; though what feeling wanted changing, I could not at first tell. I came to the conclusion that she had been wronged grievously, and that this wrong operating on a nature similar to her father's, had drawn all her mind to brood over it. The world itself, the whole order of her life, everything about her, would seem then to have wronged her; and to speak to her of religion would only rouse her scorn, and make her feel as if God himself, if there were a God, had wronged her too. Evidently, likewise, she had that peculiarity of strong undeveloped natures, of being unable, once possessed by one set of thoughts, to get rid of it again, or to see anything except in the shadow of those thoughts. I had no doubt, however, at last, that she was ashamed of her position in the eyes of society, although a hitherto indomitable pride had upheld her to face it so far as was necessary to secure her independence; both of which—pride and shame—prevented her from appearing where it was unnecessary, and especially in church. I could do nothing more than wait for a favourable opportunity. I could invent no way of reaching her yet, for I had soon found that kindness to her boy was regarded rather in the light of an insult to her. I should have been greatly puzzled to account for his being such a sweet little fellow, had I not known that he was a great deal with his aunt and grandfather. A more attentive and devout worshipper was not in the congregation than that little boy.

Before going on to speak of perhaps the most remarkable of all my parishioners, whom I have just once mentioned I believe already, I should like to say that on three several occasions before Christmas I had seen Judy look grave. She was always quite well-behaved in church, though restless, as one might expect. But on these occasions she was not only attentive, but grave, as if she felt something or other. I will not mention what subjects I was upon at these times, because the mention of them would not, in the minds of my readers, at all harmonize with the only notion of Judy they can yet by possibility have.

For Mrs. Oldcastle, I never saw her change countenance or even expression at anything—I mean in church.

"THE BLACK CAMEL."

A FEW THOUGHTS FOR BEREAVED PARENTS.

When God sent us our little Edith, it was a time of darkness and of sorrow, and the smiles that welcomed her were something like the rays of sunshine breaking through a rift in the storm-clouds, and falling upon the drenched and dripping foliage. But they were very bright smiles nevertheless, just as the sunshine is, I think, all the brighter when it thus pierces the blackness and is reflected by a myriad raindrops. And wonderful was the comfort which that little baby brought us. There she lay; tiny and helpless; clinging to us and seeming to call us to exert ourselves for her; and yet she strengthened us, and as we looked at her we gained courage. Scarcely had she opened her dark blue eyes upon the world, before, on a cold foggy winter's night, we had to take her up and carry her away, we hardly knew whither—for still the clouds hung over us, and if all around us was dark, all before us was darker still. But, as we traversed our uncertain path, carrying our precious burden with us, she supported us more than we supported her, and seemed visibly to connect us with that care which we had so often been in danger of doubting.

After a while the storm passed away, and all around us became as bright as it had previously been dark. Our home was very happy, but Edith seemed to produce for us more of that happiness than any other of the many blessings for which we had to be thankful.

Our Heavenly Father had given her to us as a star to cheer our darkness, but even now that the day had come she increased its radiance not a little.

She was soon able to run about and talk to us in her broken childish prattle, making herself easily understood, not only by us but by others who were perfect strangers to her. That she was surprisingly quick, intelligent, and affectionate, was not the mere verdict of parental fondness, but a matter of common remark with all who knew her. There was nothing fairy-like or etherial about her. She was a chubby, little, rosy-cheeked, blue-eyed, golden-haired child, full of rough antics, and not unfrequently displaying childish tempers; but there was a wonderful fascination about her, and her influence upon us was almost magical. Though unusually quick, she was in no respect precocious, but thoroughly a child; and yet somehow we seemed to learn much from her, and to be made better and more trustful and hopeful by her presence. Parents teach children much, but do not children teach parents a great deal more?

Nearly two years passed away. They were years of peace and prosperity unmarked by any very notable incident. Meanwhile our little one was becoming more and more firmly bound to our hearts until we wondered how we had lived before she was given to us, and scarcely dared to ask how we should live if she were taken from us.

The spring had come with all its freshness, and brightness, and promise, and for some weeks we had been meditating a sojourn amongst the mountains of North Wales. All our preparations were made, our luggage packed, and the day came for our departure, but on the morning of that day we were roused earlier than usual: Edith had been very restless all night, and did not seem well.

The medical man, however, said that the indisposition was only very slight, and that in a few days she would be quite well again. But our hearts told us he was wrong; and so it proved. She became gradually worse during the day; and when, in answer to our further anxious summons, the doctor came again in the evening, he told us that there was no hope. The fatal croup had got so firm a hold of our little darling, that no earthly power could release her; she would continue to grow worse, and in a few hours must inevitably die.

Years have elapsed since that dreadful sentence fell upon my ears; but even now, as I think of it, I experience something of the thrill of agony which the terrible words caused at first. So sudden!—so overwhelming! In the morning, "no fear;" at night, "no hope."

I have often heard the Turkish proverb, "The Black Camel kneels at every man's door;" but on this night, for the first time, I seemed to hear his steady tramp in the distance approaching my dwelling. The night passed slowly on; the little sufferer tossed about in our arms or upon her bed, unable to remain at rest for more than a few seconds, and in the intense and lingering agony of her disease casting such appealing looks to us for the help which she could no longer ask, and which she seemed to think we ought to give, as rent our hearts with far greater pain than even the thought of losing her occasioned. And with every moan and every convulsion of the features there came the harrowing conviction that the worst had not yet come, and that the destroyer was but tightening his grasp upon our precious child; and ever that same steady tramp fell upon my ear with increasing distinctness. Nearer and nearer the Black Camel came, but at length we even became impatient that he approached no quicker. So heartrending were our baby's sufferings, that even we, who on the previous morning had thought life almost impossible without her—we, who feared only that we had idolised her, longed for her release; and were never so much disposed to doubt our Father's care as when her agony was thus protracted. At long last it came. The poor little face turned cold and pallid; the eyes, from whose dark blue depths so much affection had beamed, became fixed and glassy; the once ruby lips lost all their colour; the breathing became fainter; and, just as the calm grey dawn of the summer's morning looked into our sorrowful chamber, a last gentle sigh passed through those pallid lips, and our little Edith was in Heaven. The Black Camel knelt at our door for a moment, and, taking up his precious burden, passed on into the dim and distant land, whither so many of our treasures have been carried out of our sight. Our child was given to us for awhile, just when our need was greatest; but, having cheered our sorrow, as perhaps only such a child could have cheered us, and having strengthened our faith in the Everlasting Love, her work here was done, though it hardly seemed begun, and He who gave her to us called her to something higher and nobler far, which even such a one was, by his grace and mercy, fitted for.

> "He would have infant trebles ringing
> The glories of the great I AM;
> He would have childish voices singing
> The hallelujahs of the Lamb."

There is nothing out of the common way in this simple recital of our first loss. No doubt almost every one who reads it could tell a similar story, for the proverb is true enough, "The Black Camel kneels at every man's door," but the purpose I have at present before me is to remind such that there is more in the proverb than at first sight appears.

No doubt the notion which the Turks have, and which generally obtains, is that the Black Camel kneels to take up and bear away as his burden what is most precious to us. Such, and such alone was my feeling when our little girl was taken from us; but I have lived some years since then, and have lived to learn that there is a deeper meaning in the saying, worth far more than that which lies on the surface.

The Black Camel takes away our treasure; but when he kneels at our door, does he not many a time leave behind a still greater treasure?

What a blank we felt when Edith was no longer visibly present with us. How our hearts sank as we went to one spot after another which had become associated with her, and found all vacant and still; when at every turn a chair, a toy, or some little article of dress attracted our notice. The little hat, beneath which we could still almost see the flashing of her merry blue eyes. The tiny boots which she had worn for the first time, and which she showed us with so much pride the very day before her death. The drinking cup from which alone she would allow her poor parched lips to be moistened during the protracted agony of the last hours. The corals which had encircled the bonnie neck, and the familiar frocks and pinafores which only seemed to be laid aside whilst she slept, to be put on again when she should presently awake. All brought fresh tears to our eyes, and made the sense of loss weigh more heavily upon our hearts. Oh! how desolate our home seemed for a while.

But at length we became sensible that though the Black Camel had taken what was so precious, he had left behind what was not less so. In one sense, we seemed even to have more of Edith than we had before. Her bodily presence was gone, and yet we had reason to acknowledge with deep thankfulness how true are the words spoken by a great teacher of our day who knows well what he says—"the children whom God brings up for us are more to us than those we bring up for ourselves; the cradle empty blesses us more than the cradle filled." Our child did not appear to be far far away from us in an unknown land. It was as though the spirit, freed from the material body, got nearer to our spirit, and exerted upon us an influence such as was not possible before. It might be fancy, but it was a fancy which wrought for us advantages which were anything but fanciful. Perhaps she was amongst the ministering spirits commissioned from our Father. A helpless little baby when she died, but now gifted with a power to do for us far more than we could ever do for her.

Often the thought of Edith has checked wrong feeling—given fervency to our prayers—power to our faith, and reality to the spiritual world as the thought of no living child could do. She kept us from doubting our Father's care when she travelled with us in the first winter of her life, but more so since she has gone to her home in heaven as we have travelled the rough wilderness path without her. The Father who has our child in his keeping will surely take care of us. The very fact that He has taken her to his own bosom strengthens our confidence in his willingness to befriend us. For we have always felt that God removed her, not only because He loved her, but because He loved us. We were sure that He gave her to us in his love, and when she died we had no thought that the gift had been withdrawn in anger, but in the same love as prompted Him to send it.

And then, was it not worth something to have our thoughts drawn heavenward, as they were drawn by our sainted child? So much of our thought and affection had been centred in her; and when she was called away, that thought and affection followed her to the better world.

A little while before her death, we had heard a story which has ever since had for us a special significance. Some years ago a party of friends were enjoying, on a fine summer's day, a boating excursion upon one of our inland lakes. Having gone a certain distance, one young lady declined to go further, saying that she would remain on one of the islands which studded the lake. She was therefore left; but the party remained away longer than they intended, and, a thick fog coming on, they were much afraid of losing her. At last, however, her clear voice was heard: "Come this way, father—come this way." The young lady is now in heaven; but still very often does her father hear the words repeated from the upper sanctuary, "Come this way, father—come this way."

Thus did we hear our little Edith calling to us scores of times from different parts of the house; still the sound rings in our ears, frequently saving us from being too much absorbed with the visible present; and I confidently look forward to hearing it one day when the sights of earth grow dim, and its sounds dull, and when it will be especially cheering to recognise the voice of my own child amongst the many that join to call from the heights of immortality.

Then further the Black Camel bore away our treasure, but it was to a place of greater safety. We have now a much more certain prospect of possessing that treasure eternally than we should have had if it had remained with us upon earth.

It is undoubtedly a great joy to have our children clustering around us here, but the pavilion of our love is not safe from the entrance of the tempter, and all our strength cannot shield them from those influences which so frequently pervert the fairest dispositions. We have so often seen early promise end in shame and sorrow, that we cannot help sometimes shuddering to think what may become of the most lovely of our children.

In more than the one case of which we have all heard, the angelic countenance of the child, from which the light of truth and affection has shone, and which the artist has enthusiastically painted and hung up in his studio as the type of holy innocence, has in a few short years, by the terrible alchemy of vice, been so transformed as to furnish for the same artist a hideous impersonation of guilt.

And so the infant that has been fondled upon the lap, the joy and hope of its parents, and the admiration of all—the very light of the home, and seemingly essential to its happiness—has, despite all affectionate and tender care, and wise counsel and holy example, developed into a being of such depravity as to be a curse to his family, wringing with unutterable woe the hearts that were once so proud of him; and they have even mourned that he was not removed while yet in his innocence.

It is very hard to have a child taken from our arms just when all its attractions are unfolding, and our whole being is wrapped up in it—but it is far more terrible to have a child spared to us until we cannot help but see that it is lost for ever. In the one case we have the confident hope of everlasting reunion,—in the other, we are certain that, should we enter heaven ourselves, we must leave our child behind us for ever in the outer darkness and the torments of the lost.

The first strong consolation which came over our spirits, calming their agitation as the Saviour's "Peace, be still," calmed the storm upon the lake, softly whispered into our ears as by the Divine Spirit himself almost at the very moment when our darling ceased to breathe, was the words—

"Safe, safe at home, where the rude tempter comes not."

Many a time now, as we sail over this tempestuous sea of life, carrying our other treasures with us and trembling again and again lest the dashing waves of temptation should sweep them away, and they should be submerged in the billows and lost to us for ever, it is very sweet to look up to our Father's house and think, we have at least one child safe there, the wildest storm cannot reach her, and when we arrive on that peaceful shore, she will be ours for ever. The transformation we shall behold in her will not be that of the pure and gentle child into the hardened and repulsive sinner, but into the glorious angelic being, radiant even amidst the radiance of heaven—fit to occupy a place with those whose white robes flash beneath the dazzling light which beams from the Throne.

So long then as these things are so, is it not rather a matter for thankfulness that God has thus made our treasure secure for us? Is it not worth our while to give up resignedly and even thankfully the temporary possession of it, or rather the temporary sight of it (for, as I have said, we still feel it to be ours), and especially considering that we have in return for our privation the honour of feeling that one has taken her place in our name, in the glorious assembly of the redeemed? In the knowledge of that fact there is, too, an incentive to spiritual diligence which is a treasure greater even than the honour. Shall our Edith be the only one bearing our name in that glorious host? Shall she be there, and they from whom she took the name be absent!

My reader, the Black Camel has knelt at your door. I think I may fairly presume this, if you have read so far, for these are but common-place words, very trite doubtless to those who do not need them, as water is insipid to those who are not thirsty; and you have only read on line after line hoping to find some comfort and help for yourself. The treasures carried from your home (for the sable visitant has perhaps been more than once) were, I doubt not, quite as precious to you as was my little Edith to me. I hope you have also found that treasures have been left with you for which you do not feel that you have paid too dearly. Whether this is so or not, to a large extent depends upon yourself.

The greatest treasures are sometimes within our grasp and we do not know it; and because we do not know it we allow them to pass away and we lose them. The angel comes, but we see in him only a stranger, and a stranger in no very winsome guise, and so we neglect to entertain him, and he who might have filled our home with blessing passes out of it dishonoured, taking back with him the gift he would fain have left. Oh! how much richer we should all have been if we had only had the patience or the penetration to look beyond the dress, or even the tones and manner of our visitors, and to discover their nature and their mission.

Never was camel burdened with gems and spices and costly merchandize so richly laden as the Black Camel which God sends to every man's door! And yet, because he comes with a demand for some of our treasure, we shut our eyes to the good which he brings us, and often petulantly refuse to have it.

Let us be wiser for the future, and as we let him carry away out of our sight for a while our precious possessions, let us gratefully accept those gifts of unutterable value which only such a messenger could bring, and which this messenger leaves only with those who are prepared to receive them.

There is another thought which must not escape us. We have none of us done with this Black Camel yet. At least once more he is certain to come, kneeling at our door for the last time, no more to take away our household gods, but to take ourselves, either from our treasures or to our treasures. If he has brought us nothing worth the having when on former occasions he has visited us, then, he will take us for ever from our treasures when he comes for the last time.

If the removal of our loved ones from our side has not done great things for us—giving us more meekness and submission—weaning us from the world—strengthening our faith in unchanging love—making the spirit world more real to us, and quickening our diligence in seeking for the inheritance of the saints; it must have hardened and soured us, and the gulf between us and our sainted friends must have been widened by every bereavement, so that at length the Black Camel will come to carry us for ever out of their reach, and the only communication coming to us from their blessed habitation, will be "They which would pass from hence to you cannot, neither can they pass to us that would come from thence."

Let you and me, then, who are weeping because our children are not, seek in all lowliness and meekness to take the good things which our Father would send us through our sorrows, and as the Black Camel comes from time to time to our door he will greatly enrich and not impoverish us; and when he halts at our dwelling for the last time, it will be to bear us home where our loved ones are gathered, waiting for us, and where

"Hand in hand firm linked at last,
And heart with heart enfolded all;
We'll smile upon the troubled past,
And wonder why we wept at all."

W. C. P.

THE BEST WAY OF DOING BUSINESS.

BY A BUSINESS MAN.

Mr. Middlewood was a well-to-do merchant, living somewhere about Battersea. Those who were well acquainted with him, and especially his fellow-merchants in the City, did not marvel at his prosperity, for they knew him to be a thorough "business man," who never came too late for a sale, nor too early for an offer. He was one of those rare men who never occupy themselves with two things at a time; who, when it is time to act do not talk, and when it is time to talk, have their words ready at once. He was also a thoroughly honest man, who never applied to deception for a profit or to falsehood for a favour. In short, he was one of the most respected merchants in the City; and a father who wanted his son to learn business thoroughly, was everywhere congratulated if he succeeded in getting a situation for him at Middlewood's.

Adversity, which had always passed the door of his office in Old Broad Street, had more than once entered the door of his house at Battersea. In the course of six years he lost his only child and his wife, and at the age of thirty he was alone in his home with the saddened heart of a mourning father and widower. He had been very happy with his young wife, though it was said that she was not so happy with him. To tell the truth, Mr. Middlewood's temper was not one of the best. He had no control of his passions, indomitable as was his desire for order. Grasping everything that came under his management, whether at home or at his office, with an iron hand, he suffered no contradiction whatever, not even from his wife, and, cordially as he loved her, yet she had to endure many a frown and bitter word, if only the slightest irregularity happened to occur in her household. In Old Broad Street he would remind his clerks that "his office was not a family parlour." But at Battersea he forgot too often that a family parlour is not an office either.

Two years had now elapsed since the death of his wife. He kept his household in the same state in which she left it—four servants, under the management of a middle-aged housekeeper whom he was firmly attached to, because she had nursed his beloved deceased ones and knew how to put up with his crotchets. Yet scarcely a day elapsed that his deep bass voice was not heard thundering through the house or in the garden, because tea was served up one minute behind time, or because the cat was allowed to slip through the garden door.

For all that, Mr. Middlewood was known as a supporter of every good cause. He was a regular attendant at church, and during his wife's lifetime family worship had been held every evening punctually at nine, with the whole household, on which occasions he always read the lesson and his wife the prayers. After his wife's death this good custom was left off, because he was often out in the evening and business required him to start too early in the morning to allow of even so much as a quarter of an hour's family devotion either before or after breakfast. Missions and charities always found in him a liberal contributor, but he never accepted a call to be a member of any Board or Committee because his time was too much taken up to allow him to give his attention to the management of concerns not his own. He was no friend of evening parties, theatres, concerts, and the like—not because he saw anything wrong in these recreations themselves, but because he had found they made him less fit for his work on the next day; but what he was very fond of was a game at chess with his next-door neighbour, Mr. Bryant, a retired banker of sixty, at whose house he spent many an evening in the week, and with whom he had many a friendly chat across the low stone wall that separated their gardens.

One fine summer afternoon, a little before sunset, Mr. Middlewood was walking in his garden, and his stentorian voice made the walls ring, while, in an angry tone, he addressed a servant, who was standing at a distance in the doorway of the kitchen. I forget what it was about, but it was a trifle at any rate. It was curious to see the contrast between poor Mary and her master, for while she stood motionless like a pillar, and pale as a sheet, his arms were going like the wings of a windmill, and his face was red as a lobster. Mr. Bryant, the banker, happened just then to be in his garden enjoying his shrubs and flowers. This was not the first time he had witnessed his neighbour's talent for scolding his servants. He thought there was a great deal of noise for nothing, and that the sooner a stop was put to it the better.

"Good evening, Mr. Middlewood. And what do you say now that Richmond is taken!"

The effect which these words, uttered in a gentle voice, produced was similar to that which is experienced when a carriage, rattling in full speed over a rough pavement, suddenly dashes upon a sandy road. The sunshine of a kind smile at once pierced through the clouds that darkened the merchant's face. He turned towards his friend, and away slipped poor Mary back into the kitchen, to shake off the shower which this time it had been her turn to pass through.

"Ah, Mr. Bryant!" he cried, "How do you do? Why, isn't it splendid! Now the blacks are free once and for ever. That cursed thing slavery will soon be swept off the face of the earth now."

"At least from the States," was the answer; "but whether there will be fewer slaves is another question. To obtain freedom is a great thing, but to abuse it is worse than slavery itself."

"Oh, the blacks will learn to use it well," cried Mr. Middlewood.

"I hope so, but it seems not to be a very easy thing to learn. I know people who, from their childhood, and for upwards of twenty, thirty years, have lived in freedom, and yet have not learnt to use it well. I believe it is one of the hardest of lessons, Mr. Middlewood."

Now Mr. Middlewood knew from experience that when his neighbour closed a sentence with his name, there was something in it that regarded himself, and he had always found that that "something" was a good thing, which it was as well for him to take notice of. Nor was it so very difficult for him this time to guess what it might be, for he had felt a little ashamed of himself when seen by Mr. Bryant squabbling with the servant.

"I believe I know what you mean," he said, passing his hand over his face. "There are masters within, sir, from whom it is not so easy to escape as from the masters without."

"Just so; and yet, until those within are completely subdued, no one can be called truly free. Man's heart is a fortress much stronger than Richmond. There is but one Conqueror who is mighty to take it, and not until He has taken it are its slaves free."

"So they ought to be at least," quoth Mr. Middlewood, with an air of doubt; "but how many good men and real Christians are there not whose temper often gets the better of them?"

"I believe so, but there are not many Christians who, after having allowed Christ to take the fortress of their heart, do not keep one or two quarters shut against Him. Moreover, many people are called Christians who have only allowed the outworks to be taken. Where Christ has taken possession of the whole man, there must be true liberty, for He is the Truth. As it is written: 'The truth shall make you free.' And again: 'If the Son shall make you free, you shall be free indeed.'"

"But do you mean to say that a man who is angry cannot be a Christian?"

"By no means. We read of the Lord himself that one time He 'looked round about with anger,' and the Apostle says, 'Be ye angry;' but he adds 'and sin not.' Instability, or weakness of character, is also a bad master in my opinion, and I am afraid that he too has many slaves. A man who never can turn angry with the evil cannot be delighted with the good either. But what I mean to say is, that, if angry, we ought to be masters of the mood, and not its bondsmen. And I believe that anger is our master, when there is plenty without to rouse it and nothing within to check it. Now where Christ dwells in the heart there is a power within stronger than all anger, even the fiercest. For though Christ may be angry sometimes, yet anger is not his essence but love. 'Learn of me,' He said, 'for I am meek and lowly in heart.'"

Mr. Middlewood did not feel all the force of these observations of his neighbour, but the little which he did feel was sufficient to make him ponder for a moment or two.

"Well," he said, after a pause, "it appears to me after all that you are overdoing Christianity a little, Mr. Bryant. I know very well that I am not a perfect man, but I believe I am a Christian at any rate. Nor do I give proofs to the contrary in my conduct, as far as I am aware. I do my duty during the week, as much as is in my power, and while giving to Cæsar what is Cæsar's, I give to God what is God's on Sunday, and on many other occasions. But if your way of looking at religion is the only true one, I am no Christian at all, notwithstanding all that. For if I understand you rightly, your opinion is that he only is a true Christian who all the week, from Sunday morning till Saturday night, thinks of nothing else than Christ, so that not one moment can slip, in which any evil passion, such as anger for instance, can get the better of him. Now this is altogether impossible, in my opinion, unless one shuts himself up in a convent, like a monk. But it is quite absurd to expect such a continuous devotional state of mind in a man who has to spend eight hours a day behind his desk in a bustling office, which is like a bee-hive, and where he has to elbow his way through heaps of bills of lading, accounts, invoices, &c., till his head spins like a mill-wheel, and all the spirit threatens to go out of him. I wonder, indeed, that such a notion can be held by a man like you, who spent some forty years of your life in a brisk banking concern."

Mr. Bryant smiled.

"I don't recollect," answered he, "I ever said to you that we ought to do nothing else all the week but think of Christ, if by thinking you mean meditating. I know very well that no man can in that sense 'think' of church and at the same time talk to a broker, examine a bill of lading, or cast an account. But if 'thinking of Christ' is understood in the sense of feeling Christ's presence in one's soul, of longing for and rejoicing in Christ, I believe it is not only possible, but a fact, that many a Christian has thought of Him in that way from morning till evening, even in the midst of the most engaging occupations. The thought of Him brightened up their faces even in the most tedious labours, kept them in temper even in the most provoking emergencies, and consoled them in the most grievous disappointments."

"Nonsense!" cried Mr. Middlewood, "I don't believe a word of it. Yes, there may be such saints, but then it must be a poor business that of theirs! I say, Mr. Bryant, it is quite impossible to think of anything else than one's business, if one is to do that business well."

"All depends upon the disposition of one's heart," observed Mr. Bryant. "If the heart is full of the love of Christ, it cannot forget Him even in the most bustling office. You remember Keble's beautiful lines:—

> 'There are in the loud stunning tide
> Of human care and crime
> With whom the melodies abide
> Of th' everlasting chime—
> Who carry music in their heart
> Through dusky lane and wrangling mart;
> Plying their daily task with busier feet
> Because their secret souls a holy strain repeat.'

And," added Mr. Bryant, "I cannot see why a man must do a poor business because he loves a certain being with all his heart. But have you ever tried the experiment, Mr. Middlewood? Did you ever feel an intense love for Christ?"

There was a pause.

"Well I think I love Him," said Mr. Middlewood. "At least I don't see why I should not."

"Then why do you love Him?"

"Why! Why, of course, because He is the Saviour."

"But is He your Saviour?"

"What do you mean by that?"

"Do you regard yourself as saved by Him from sin and eternal perdition?"

"Of course I do."

"So you are sure you will go to heaven at last?"

"I hope so."

"Everybody hopes so. But are you sure of it, as every true Christian ought to be? You know Paul said, 'To me to die is gain.'"

Mr. Middlewood was silent.

"Ay," said Mr. Bryant, "here lies the fault, Mr. Middlewood. Unless one feels oneself saved for ever, Christ has not taken possession of one's heart. Nor can such a one think all the day of Christ, because, since heaven is not his, he clings to the world. You cannot rejoice in Christ behind your desk, if you do not sit there as a saved soul, expecting to see Him soon in the joy of heaven."

"Nonsense!" said Mr. Middlewood once more, shaking his head with an air of unbelief. "It must be poor business that is done in that way. One cannot possibly do two things at a time, without doing damage to either. To think of one thing and to attend to another—I say, Mr. Bryant, that is like looking up to the sky while shooting at a hare."

The conversation here was broken off by a message to say that somebody wanted to speak to Mr. Bryant. A few days had elapsed when one evening Mr. Middlewood entered Mr. Bryant's parlour with a shining face.

"Oh, I can see what you are coming to tell me," said Mr. Bryant. "May I congratulate you?"

"Yes, Isabella is mine!" exclaimed the happy lover. "To-day I received her consent!"

"May God's blessing rest upon your union!" said Mr. Bryant, cordially shaking hands with his friend.

"I thank you. This is one of the happiest days of my life, I assure you, after so much painful uncertainty!"

The two friends now sat down, this time not to have a game at chess, but to talk about the excellences of the future bride and the marriage that was in prospect. Mr. Bryant knew her well, for she was his brother's daughter.

A few days later Mr. Bryant called at Mr. Middlewood's office in the forenoon. He found him engaged in reading his letters.

"Isabella gave me this note for you this morning," said Mr. Bryant; "but there is no hurry about it. You may read your letters first. It is only about a tea party, I believe."

But to throw down the letter which he was just reading and to open the envelope which Mr. Bryant handed to him was the work of a moment.

"The dear girl!" he said, after having read her couple of lines. "Did you see her this morning?"

"Yes; she called on me herself."

"Is she well? She had a slight headache last night."

"Oh, she is better. Now, good-bye. I won't detain you."

"Stop a moment. Don't be in a hurry. I was thinking this morning about making her a present you know. I have been turning it over in my mind all the way in the omnibus, but I could not fix upon anything definite. But while I was reading this letter of Welgrove and Co.'s, the silk merchants, it occurred to me that a silk dress would perhaps be the best. What do you think of it? Eh?"

"Well, I have no time to talk about it just now," answered Mr. Bryant, "as I want to see a friend before eleven. But I shall be back in an hour or so. Will you be in?"

"I will. In the meantime think of it, will you? You know her taste better than I do."

Scarcely an hour elapsed before Mr. Bryant found himself again in Mr. Middlewood's office. Mr. Middlewood being engaged with a gentleman, he was shown into a little parlour. The door being left ajar, he could hear every word that was spoken in the office.

"What in the world did the governor want you so long for this morning?" asked a voice.

"Why, it was about a carriage. He knows my father is a coach-builder. He seems to have made up his mind to keep a carriage and horses. He never spoke to me so kindly. He is in high spirits these few days."

"Very much so. I wonder who the David is who has harped away the evil spirits from his mind."

"I suppose it is because the war is over in America."

"Pshaw! He lost five hundred by it, the bookkeeper told me the other day. I expected it would make him as sour as a crab, but he seems not to mind it, and he is as cheerful as a lark."

The gentleman with whom Mr. Middlewood was engaged came out, and Mr. Bryant stepped in.

"Do you know that gentleman who left just now?" asked Mr. Middlewood. "What a pity you didn't come earlier. I wish you had been present; he is a merchant from Geneva. We are doing a great deal of business with him. I asked him about the best plan to spend a month in Switzerland. I think it is the best route for our wedding trip."

Mr. Middlewood now told his friend all about his conversation with the Swiss merchant, and after the subject of the silk dress was settled, Mr. Bryant departed.

That same evening Mr. Bryant saw his neighbour at his house.

"You must have done a poor business to-day," he said.

"Me?" asked Mr. Middlewood, in a tone of surprise. "Not at all. We had a very good day."

"Oh, but that's impossible!"

"How so?"

"Why, you have been thinking about things which had nothing whatever to do with your business. I found you engaged in reading a letter of Messrs. Welgrove and Co.'s, and you told me you were meanwhile thinking of a silk dress for Isabella. You called your clerk into your parlour and you spoke to him about a carriage. I suppose it had something to do with that pony-cart which you intend to give to her. And I learnt from yourself that when a Geneva merchant called upon you, you had a long talk about your proposed tour with Isabella through Switzerland. Now, I say you must have done a poor business in that way, for you told me yourself the other day, that it is impossible to think of one thing and to do another."

"I see! I see!" cried Mr. Middlewood, cheerfully. "Well, I must confess I am beaten. But then—love came into the game, you see, and who can tell what a man can or cannot do in such a case!"

Mr. Bryant was silent. He looked his friend in the face with an expression of deep concern.

"Just so," he said, "love, sincere love, in the heart is the key to the riddle. I now hope you will also come to experience that it is possible for a merchant to do his business well, and yet to think all the time of Jesus. L.

THE SHULAMITE TELLS HER STORY.

"By night on my bed I sought him whom my soul loveth: I sought him, but I found him not. I will rise now, and go about the city in the streets, and in the broad ways I will seek him whom my soul loveth: I sought him, but I found him not. The watchmen that go about the city found me: to whom I said, Saw ye him whom my soul loveth? It was but a little that I passed from them, but I found him whom my soul loveth."—Solomon's Song, iii. 1—4.

I.

In my Belovèd's garden, in my quiet bower I lay,
And having tasted of his cup I slept the hours away,
When lo! a voice within my ear—I waken'd on the spot—
I call'd, I sought for my Belov'd—I sought—but found Him not.

II.

O sorrowful my waking was, and sore perplex'd my mind,
When Him my heart did so desire my glance could nowhere find;
I sprang in terror from my bed, and cried, "I will arise,
And go about the city's streets until He meets my eyes.

III.

"And I will call and call again, nor ever will be still,
Till—O poor soul, what words are these?—why sayest thou 'I will,'
As tho' thy own weak will and sight would not alike prove vain
To reach thy loved One where He is, or bring Him back again?

IV.

"As though, indeed, it had not been of his own grace most free
That He, the King of Heaven, e'er held his sceptre out to thee."
I hurried weeping through the streets, and in the broad ways round,
But He whom my soul loveth, He, alas! I had not found.

V.

My fears, my doubts redoubled as I search'd on every side,
My sight grew ever dimmer and my heart within me died.
The watchmen found me—I stood still, and cried to them, "O tell, Tell me if you have seen Him pass, the Friend I love so well?"

VI.

Alas! my spirit counsel sought and comfort craved from man,
As tho' these watchers needs must know their Master's path and plan;
As though a mortal could make plain all secrets of his grace,
Or help us to behold Him when He wills to hide his face.

VII.

He has indeed his watchmen who upon the watch-tower stand,
He sends throughout the city's streets his tried and faithful band;
Counsel and knowledge too are theirs,—and yet they did me harm,
Because I sought in my distress to make of flesh my arm.

VIII.

I turn'd aside, they could not help—I felt 'twas so at last.
When as I but a little, but a little from them pass'd,
When I most utterly despair'd of my own skill or might,
When I confess'd all help of man to be but poor and slight;

IX.

When of my own weak will no more I dared to think or speak,
When with a sense of impotence my heart was like to break;
'Twas then I found Him, then He drew near to my soul again,
'Twas then He set me free from all my grief and fear and pain.

X.

'Twas then I found Him, held Him fast,—'twas then that He reveal'd
Why He had bow'd me down so low, and why his face conceal'd.
It was not only to enjoy that He had woo'd my soul,
Not only to be sick with love I was by Him made whole;

XI.

Not only because peace and joy He scatter'd full and free,
Was I to love the Giver Good of joy and peace to me.
No; since I in myself remain so poor, so weak, so small
That if He ever leave me, I can only fail and fall;

XII.

Therefore in rest supine no more I venture to delight,
I will not in his service shrink from toil, or pain, or fight.
I give myself to Him, nor ask what wages I shall win:
Enough that I am saved, enough that I'm absolved from sin!

XIII.

'Tis true that at the first He leads his bride to solitude,
But only that her spirit there may be with strength endued,—
Strength to do battle with the foe that threatens heart and life;
To fight without, to fight within, till death shall end the strife.

XIV.

Me too He took and led apart into his silent bowers,
Refresh'd my soul with joy's sweet wine, and gave me peaceful hours:
But now I go into the world, 'tis so his love decrees,
To tell and testify of Him so long as He shall please.

XV.

This is the lesson that He taught—I learn it with delight;
I take his easy yoke on me, I bear his burden light.
There may be darksome hours in store, and foes may gather round,
But Him whom my soul loveth—Him, once more—for aye—I've found! L. C. C.

NOTES FOR READERS OUT OF THE WAY.

Every journal has written, and every speaker has spoken, during the last few weeks, of the death of Lord Palmerston; and with hardly an exception, the fitting tribute has been paid to the memory of one who served his country so long and so ably, and who was so largely endowed with the virtues that conciliate kindly feeling. It was not to have been expected that the deepest emotions of the nation would be stirred by the departure of one who had more than completed the term of fourscore, and whom men liked rather than loved; or that the mourning of the nation would be at all so profound, as it was nearly four years ago, when death so suddenly struck down, in the person of the Prince Consort, the highest, if not the foremost, of our public men. In the wide expression of feeling called forth by Lord Palmerston's death, the chief and almost the only painful thing has been the loud and confident manner in which some of his admirers have pronounced upon his religious condition. No one would blame attached and pious relatives, in the agony of their anxiety about the spiritual state of one of whom they have stood in doubt, laying hold of every death-bed word or look that could be construed into a sign of devout feeling, and persuading themselves that the soul of their departed one was safe. But it is a different thing to hasten before the public with these treasured memorials of the death-bed, and call on all men, almost as an article of faith, to hold the same conclusion. It was in a different way that the Christian mind of the country settled into the belief it rejoices to entertain regarding the Prince Consort, whose last utterances served to indicate the connection between a blameless and useful life, and the faith from which it sprung. In the present instance, the prevailing feeling seems to be that it is a case in which we ought to "judge nothing before the time;" abstaining alike from harsh judgments against, and confident judgments in favour of, the great man who is gone.

Ever since the issuing of the royal proclamation for prayer for deliverance from the cattle plague and the cholera, there has been no small discussion in some quarters whether or not prayer in such a case could have any avail. The chief arena of the discussion has been in the columns of the Pall Mall Gazette; but with that strong tendency which the secular journals of the day show to discuss religious questions, many other newspapers have joined in the debate. Professor Tyndall, of the Royal Institution, well-known for his works on "Heat," and "The Glaciers of the Alps," and for his eminence in physical science generally, maintained in the boldest manner the invariable sequence of natural phenomena, and declared that prayer was only a sign of ignorance, as no one would pray against an effect when he knew its cause. In Edinburgh, the opposition has been led by a Congregationalist minister, whose unexpected championship has awakened an interest somewhat resembling that created by Dr. Colenso's position in relation to the controversy on the Pentateuch. Many ingenious and able answers have been given to the objection, which, however, is by no means a new one, and will be found to have been handled by several of our ablest theologians, such as Dr. Chalmers, in his Cholera Sermon in 1832, "On the Efficacy of Prayer and the Uniformity of Nature;" M. Guizot, in his "Meditations on Christianity;" and Professor Mansel, in the "Aids to Faith." It is admitted that there is a real difficulty, as there always must be, where the will of the Infinite Being comes into contact with that of the creature. On the other hand, to cast ourselves on the Divine clemency in a time of awful danger is one of the best instincts of our nature, and it is in perfect harmony with both the spirit and the letter of the word of God. It seems quite a gratuitous thing to provoke a quarrel between religion and science on such a point; for religious men are at least as ready as any to show respect for the laws of nature by trying to avert the natural causes of disease, so far as they are known; and men of science would be yielding to no superstitious feeling by joining in a devout acknowledgment of the Divine Sovereignty. Practically, the question—whether prayer or sanitary precautions should be resorted to?—is solved, as so many similar problems are solved, by the comment of our Lord: "These ought ye to have done, and not to leave the other undone."

The Charges of Bishops, both in England and Ireland, amid much that has special interest for the diocese or the church with which they are connected, often contain views of wider interest, and more universal application. Dr. Trench has lately delivered his first charge, as Archbishop of Dublin. On the vexed question of National Education in Ireland, he indicated his opinion in favour of a compromise—denominational grants where there is room enough for two schools, and grants on the present system to continue where there is not. He is very far from regarding this as the best arrangement, but as the best that is practicable under present circumstances. On the subject of revivals, Dr. Trench expressed his opinion that in themselves they were good and profitable, and only mischievous when the means employed were merely sensational appeals to the feelings. With these convictions, he had ventured upon an eight days of special services in the summer of last year, taking Bray for a centre, and including so far as possible the neighbouring parishes in the scheme. Sixteen sermons had been preached there, and seventeen in the neighbouring parishes; there had been daily communion, and two numerously-attended conferences of the clergy. The work had been of so encouraging a nature that he trusted next year to repeat the experiment in some other part of the diocese. Dr. Harold Browne has also delivered his primary charge as Bishop of Ely. Among its practical recommendations, one is in favour of weekly classes for young people who have left school, for instruction and counsel from the clergymen, who ought also to hold personal intercourse with each candidate for confirmation. He expressed his sense of the very urgent need in these times of candidates for the ministry "of high powers of thought, deep learning, the wisdom of the serpent, with the harmlessness of the dove. Never have we more needed men whose wit would be bright anywhere, but who will restrain it gladly that it should never sparkle for selfish honour, still less wound for selfish vanity, but shine only for the glory of God. And if we need such, we ought to have some places in which we can give them honour, if they do not seek it for themselves." At a meeting of the (Auxiliary) Bible Society of Oxford, Dr. Payne Smith, the recently appointed Professor of Divinity, expressed himself thus on the authority of the Bible:—"If in any point all the great fathers of the Church were agreed, it was that the Bible was the sole rule of faith, the sole authority to which orthodox and heretic alike must appeal in support of their views. Untroubled by the disputes that had arisen in modern times as to the exact nature and extent of inspiration, they held in the fullest way that Scripture was inspired, and as a matter of fact, for twelve centuries, not a voice had been raised in opposition to this doctrine, except upon the part of an obscure section of the Arians (the Anomœi), and by a monk of Constantinople (Euthymius), who, at the end of that period, had brought upon himself universal reprobation by saying, that it was no wonder there were discrepancies in the Gospels, for the Evangelists were but men, and wrote sometime after the events which they recorded happened." It may be interesting to some to know, that six years ago, collections were made for the British and Foreign Bible Society in three of the colleges of Oxford, last year in seven, and this year in ten colleges.

The autumnal session of the Baptist Union at Bradford was attended by between four and five hundred ministers and delegates. It was opened by an address from the President, the Rev. Dr. Angus, on the conditions of true prosperity in churches. This prosperity, he urged, was ever in proportion to the inspired truth they devoutly held, the loving, self-devoting spirit they cherished towards themselves and the world, and the special grace and blessing of the Holy Ghost, which was ever, in accordance with God's promise, in proportion to the earnestness and constancy of their prayers. The attention of the meeting was also directed to the state of the Baptist missions, to the persecution of their brethren in Saxony, and to the colleges of the denomination.

A similar meeting of the Congregational Union has been held at Bristol. The opening address of the Chairman—the Rev. D. Thomas—bore on the Christian nurture of the young, and on the course which would tend most, under God's blessing, to secure the children of pious parents to the Church of God. Among the other topics considered, the subject of home-missions had a somewhat prominent place. Mr. Newman Hall dwelt on the sad statistics of attendance on public worship which our large towns furnish; Salford having but 29 per cent. at worship, Preston 20, Birmingham 18, and London only 12. In London, out of three millions, there were but 374,000 at church at one time. It is calculated that there are at least a million of persons in London who never go to the house of God. The class of skilled mechanics do not go to places of worship. Not more than two or three in a hundred are regular worshippers. Dr. Pusey had truly said, "It would be better for the multitudes of London if they had been born in Calcutta, because the charity of Christian missions might have had some chance of meeting them there." Dr. Vaughan and Dr. Raleigh gave an account of their recent visit to the Congregational churches of the United States, which excited much interest.

November is always a memorable month in Edinburgh, being the commencing month of the College session, and of several collateral institutions. Friday, the 3rd of that month, was remarkable in Edinburgh for the delivery of two very noticeable discourses—one by Mr. Gladstone, Chancellor of the Exchequer, in quitting the office of Rector of the University; the other by Mr. Froude, the historian, inaugurating the season of the Philosophical Institution. Mr. Gladstone's discourse was on the place of ancient Greece in the providential order of the world. He held that, in the Providence of God, the Greeks had had an important and special function to fulfil in preparing the way for the Incarnation. To them it had been entrusted to shadow forth the connection between deity and humanity—to represent the indwelling of God in the human form, and thus prepare the world for the advent of the "Word made flesh." The body of the discourse consisted of illustrations of this position, derived from the respect for human life among the Greeks, their admiration of the human form, the honour they paid to woman, and other such things, especially in the heroic and the Homeric periods. It has not been generally thought that Mr. Gladstone was very successful in establishing his theory, especially as he himself acknowledged that at the time of the Advent the state of feeling and practice in Greece had degenerated in a marked and lamentable way, even on the points which he had selected. But the devout tone that marked the discourse was very noticeable, and the testimony to the special inspiration and the blessed revelations of the Hebrew Scriptures, was given with marked emphasis, and called forth from the audience the loudest burst of applause. "There is no need," he remarked, "in order to a due appreciation of our debt to the ancient Greeks, that we should either forget or disparage the function which was assigned by the Almighty Father to his most favoured people. Much profit, says St. Paul, had the Jew in every way. He had the oracles of God: he had the custody of the promises: he was the steward of the great and fundamental conception of the unity of God, the sole and absolute condition under which the Divine idea could be upheld among men at its just elevation. No poetry, no philosophy, no art of Greece, ever embraced, in its most soaring and widest conceptions, that simple law of love towards God and towards our neighbour, on which 'two commandments hang all the law and the prophets,' and which supplied the moral basis of the new dispensation. There is one history, and that the most touching and most profound of all, for which we should search in vain through all the pages of the classics—I mean the history of the human soul in its relations with its Maker; the history of its sin, and grief, and death, and of the way of its recovery to hope and life, and to enduring joy. For the exercises of strength and skill, for the achievements and for the enchantments of wit, of eloquence, of art, of genius, for the imperial games of politics and war, let us seek them on the shores of Greece. But if the first among the problems of life be, how to establish the peace and restore the balance of our inward being; if the highest of all conditions in the existence of the creature be his aspect towards the God to whom he owes his being, and in whose great hand he stands, then let us make our search elsewhere. All the wonders of the Greek civilisation heaped together are less wonderful than is the single Book of Psalms. Palestine was weak and despised, always obscure, oftentimes and long trodden down beneath the feet of imperious masters. Greece for a thousand years,

'Confident from foreign purposes,' repelled every invader from her shores, and, fostering her strength in the keen air of freedom, she defied, and at length overthrew, the mightiest of empires; and when finally she felt the resistless grasp of the masters of all the world, them too, at the very moment of her subjugation, she subdued to her literature, language, arts, and manners. Palestine, in a word, had no share of the glories of our race; they blaze on every page of the history of Greece with an overpowering splendour. Greece had valour, policy, renown, genius, wisdom, wit,—she had all, in a word, that this world could give her; but the flowers of Paradise, which blossom thinly, blossomed in Palestine alone."

Mr. Froude's discourse was on "The Influence of the Reformation on the Scottish people." It was chiefly important as repelling charges that have of late been so often brought against the religion of Scotland. Considering the high quarters from which these charges have come, and the confident tone in which they have been uttered, it was no slight thing to hear a historian of Mr. Froude's eminence, research, and impartiality, proclaim and prove that John Knox had not only saved his country, but, in a sense, created the Scottish nation. "Passing over knight and noble, he had touched the farmer, the peasant, the petty tradesman, and the artisan, and turned the men of clay into men of steel." And as to the character of the people moulded under these influences, there was much to be said in their favour. "There have rarely been seen in this world a set of people who have thought more about right and wrong, and the judgment about them of the upper powers. Longheaded thrifty industry, a sound hatred of all waste, imprudence, idleness, extravagance—the feet planted firmly upon the earth—a conscientious sense that the worldly virtues are nevertheless very necessary virtues; that without them honesty, for one thing, is not possible, and that without honesty no other excellence, religious or moral, is worth anything at all—this is the stuff of which Scottish life was made, and very good stuff it is. It has been called gloomy, austere, harsh, and such other epithets. . . . I should rather say, that the Scotch had been an unusually happy people. Intelligent industry, the honest doing of daily work, with a sense that it must be done well, under penalties; the necessaries of life moderately provided for; and a sensible content with the situation of life in which men are born—this through the week, and at the end of it the 'Cottar's Saturday Night,' the homely family, gathered reverently and peacefully together, and irradiated with a sacred presence. Happiness! such happiness as we human creatures are likely to know upon this world will be found there, if anywhere!"

Some very interesting letters have lately appeared in the Guardian on the religious condition and prospects of Italy. The writer's standpoint is not the same as our own, but the letters, which are dated from Florence, show signs of much candour and care. He has nothing good to report, either of the priests, or of the masses, or of the upper class belonging to the Roman Catholic Church. The priests are corrupt; not perhaps to the full extent of some scandals that are in circulation, but certainly as practising a tyranny and extortion on the death-bed and at the confessional that justify the charges of the author of the celebrated "Le Maudit." Among the masses there is as much superstition as ever, perhaps more; all other altars are deserted for that of Mary, and even in the cathedral of Florence, there is hardly a soul at high mass, while at the same time, and in the same place, the chapel of Mary is blazing with lights and thronged with devotees of all classes and sexes, though chiefly females. Among the higher ranks, religion seems not to be a subject of the slightest interest. An Italian nobleman of great distinction, as well as of great simplicity and religious earnestness of character, assured the writer that he did not know of another man of his order in Florence who professed to be actively and openly concerned about the interests of religion. Among the younger members of the upper class simple disbelief and infidelity are common. But on the other hand, there are striking symptoms of an earnest religious movement among the lower classes. Amongst them are to be found schools to teach children, chapels in which to preach to grown-up people, numberless controversial publications, dépôts and shops at which they are sold below their cost price, distribution of the Scriptures on a large scale, subscriptions, associations—in a word, Propaganda, with all its ardent features and reality. The basis of this movement is chiefly from the Waldenses, and partly from foreign—chiefly British, and emphatically Scottish—agencies. Some of the Protestants complain of the excessive rigidity of the Waldenses, and have thrown off all church organisation and forms. The writer goes on to give the following remarkable account of Dr. De Sanctis, the Waldensian leader in Italy:—

"This very remarkable man seems to me to be doing far more in his own sphere than Passaglia, and to be the living and working representative of Italian religious reform in the only shape in which it is as yet really in action. He is at the head of a theological school or seminary consisting of some twenty young men, whom he can hardly fail to imbue with a portion of his own indomitable fire and energy, and with whom he resides in a large building, still called by courtesy a Palazzo, once the property of the Archbishop of Florence, and purchased by foreign and, of course, chiefly English funds, for the foundation of this college. In a large and commodious chapel belonging to the same, De Sanctis preaches every Sunday to an audience far more numerous than I expected to find in Tuscany, and far more earnest and attentive than any similar congregation I saw either in Turin, Milan, or elsewhere. To be sure, the preacher was a man of different vein and calibre, possessing a remarkable power of rousing and fixing the sympathies and attention of a congregation such as he addressed, composed almost entirely of the humbler classes. And yet De Sanctis is anything but a man of imposing appearance, or answering to our idea of a divinity teacher. He wears no gown or ecclesiastical vestment of any kind, dresses absolutely like a layman, even to wearing a spotted neck-tie, turn-down collar, and breast-pin; and when he entered the church at a side door, laid down his brown straw hat and walking-stick upon the communion-table in front of the pulpit previous to ascending the latter. This was carrying sans façon pretty nearly as far as it could go in such matters. But his teaching has been above his appearances when I have heard him, and his power over his hearers evidently very great. His publications are very numerous and widely disseminated. You meet with them everywhere; and though far less bulky, their effect must be infinitely greater than that produced by Passaglia's heavy productions, which no one seems to read except those who do not need them, or his newspapers, which no one seems to read at all. Italy is quite weary of and indifferent to mere scholastic theology, and must be roused by a trumpet of quite a different sound if she is to be roused at all. The popularity and sale of some of De Sanctis's publications are immense. The sixteenth edition of 'La Confessione' has just appeared. The 'Ritratto di Maria,' or portrait of the Blessed Virgin, drawn from the Gospels, promises to be immensely popular. The 'Il Purgatorio' is at the second edition, and 'La Messa' and 'Il Papa' equally in favour as specimens of popular controversy. The most widely-spread of all his publications, however, is his almanack, called 'L'Amico di Casa,' price twopence, almost universally used among the people, both Catholic and Protestant, in spite of the opposition of the priests, and a most damaging exposure of the legends indulged in by Romish publishers in similar works. There can be doubt that these writings, now that they can no longer be checked or controlled by physical and material opposition, will end by producing a wide effect upon the population. The movement, such as it exhibits itself at present, springs evidently from below. It is asserted, on good authority, that De Sanctis, after he had fled from Rome and taken refuge, I believe, at Malta, was offered a bishopric if he would return to his allegiance; nor can we wonder at the authority he had thrown off being desirous at almost any cost to stop the mouth of so formidable and well-initiated an opponent."

In the United States of America the re-union of the Churches of North and South, divided by the civil war, is occupying much attention. In the case of the Episcopal Church, where no separation took place till the war began, there seems every prospect of a speedy re-union. The case of the Presbyterian Churches is more complicated. For a considerable time the Presbyterian Churches have been divided into two—old and new schools. In the Southern States these two branches united during the war. In the other States they are still separate, and the question to which of them the United Southern Church will go, is not simplified by the terms on which either branch professes itself willing to receive them. Both branches have pronounced the Southern Churches guilty of treason, and demand a humble acknowledgment of this sin as a condition of re-union. In the case of the Methodist Episcopal Church, which in the South still advocates slavery, the breach, it is thought, will be still more difficult to heal.—It is interesting to observe how well the contributions to the cause of missions have kept up, amid all the excitement of the war. The American Board of Missions, at its late sitting at Chicago, has raised, during the year, 534,763 dollars, which defrays all expenses, and leaves a small balance in the treasury.

The account of the state of Christianity in Madagascar, which Mr. Ellis has given on his return home, is extremely interesting. The number of native Christians in the capital of Madagascar he reckons at 10,000, and in other parts of the island 5,000. A considerable proportion of the converts belong to the upper classes of society, and in the families of the nobles and officers of the capital many of their children who have attained adult age have renounced the superstitions of their country, and are sincere worshippers of the true God, and believers in Jesus Christ. The zeal and activity of the converts is very exemplary and striking. Every individual who professes to believe the Gospel, labours to make known its truths, and commend its blessings to his neighbour; and this accounts, under the Divine blessing, for the astonishing increase in the numbers, both of the congregations and the churches, during the short period of Mr. Ellis's residence at the capital.

Through a Wesleyan Missionary, accounts have been received of an interesting endeavour to form a regular government, which has been made by the people of the Fiji islands. A meeting, presided over by the British Consul, was held at Ovalau, on the 8th and 9th of May, at which the principal chiefs were present, and agreed upon a constitution, conferring on one of their number, to be elected annually, the office of president, appointing a general assembly of chiefs to be held once a year, reserving to each of the seven chiefs local supremacy in his own territory, appointing a code of laws to be prepared for the entire group, and adopting a national flag for distinction from their neighbours. It was agreed to adopt such of the Tongan laws as were deemed applicable to Fiji, and various suggestions were forwarded to each state for consideration during the year. An interesting illustration of the simultaneous march of Christianity and civilisation.

Turning now to the field of Literature, we call attention to two remarkable books—remarkable as illustrating the occasional union of much personal Christian excellence with opinions from which most of our readers would recoil. The first is a Letter by Dr. Pusey; the second is the Life of the late Mr. Robertson, of Brighton.

In a letter of more than four hundred pages, to his friend and fellow-worker, Mr. Keble, Dr. Pusey asserts his grounds for holding "the Church of England a portion of Christ's one holy Catholic Church, and a means of restoring visible unity." In opposition to Dr. Manning, he holds that the Church of England has in no way departed from the catholic faith, the heritage and the foundation of the Church universal. She is a portion of the one Catholic Church, though unfortunately not in visible communion with other portions of it, in much the same way as the Greek Church is not in visible communion with the Latin, or the two portions of the Latin Church, during the great western schism, were not in visible communion with each other. But the truth is held by the Church of England, and the Church of Rome is the same. A great part of the letter is devoted to the establishment and illustration of this position. Dr. Pusey holds that, fairly explained, the articles and homilies are not so Protestant, and the authoritative dogmas of the Roman Church not so ultramontane as they at first appear. In fact, it only requires a candid mind and a loving heart to reconcile them to each other. But on one point, he admits a most formidable exception, and a dismal obstacle to the union he so longs for. This is the Romish doctrine regarding Mary. His soul is oppressed by the overwhelming evidence of the degree to which practically, in the minds of Roman Catholics, Mary is made to divide and even supersede the mediatorial functions of Jesus. And his distress reaches its climax when he considers how the present Pope has elevated the immaculate conception of Mary into an article of faith. For if Pio Nono has done this in regard to the Immaculate Conception, what is to prevent other Popes doing the same in regard to many other beliefs, practically held by Roman Catholic people? He finds some consolation in the fact that the Pope had no right to do as he did; that his "constitution" establishing the Immaculate Conception was irregular and uncanonical, and also that it was very far from expressing the universal opinion of the bishops of the Church. A very interesting portion of the letter and the appendix, consists of a summary of the views of the bishops, and others who were opposed to the "constitution." Singularly enough, among these opponents were all the professors at Maynooth. Another heavy blow and great discouragement befel Dr. Pusey, after his letter was written, and forms the subject of a very dolorous postscript. This was the perusal of the Pope's celebrated Encyclical Letter of last year. Dr. Pusey was thunderstruck by the degree to which the claim of personal infallibility is confessedly advanced by the Pope. Here too he finds some consolation in the fact that his claim is unwarranted, and that, supposing it conceded in the case of previous Popes, the greatest inconsistencies and absurdities must follow. However curious this letter may be, as thedream of one who to a very subtle mind unites a devout soul and a loving heart, it is amazing that Dr. Pusey can see so little difference between the Roman Catholic and any Biblical Church. The great gulf between Churches that in the spirit of Holy Scripture place Jesus before the sinner as the great mediator, and Churches that practically draw away the soul from Him, cannot be filled up by Dr. Pusey's subtle explanations. Dr. Pusey speaks in a kindly tone of other bodies of Protestants. His allusions to them are respectful, with no sting of bitterness or contempt. Amid all his strange speculations and dangerous views, a tone of deepest reverence and love pervades the letter for the one Lord and only Saviour of the sinner. However little alive we may hold him to be to the tendency of his views and system to obscure the mediatorial glory of Jesus, we can have no doubt of his own profound devotion to Him whose blood cleanseth from all sin; and as little can we question that his heart's desire and prayer is, that the world may be brought to know and love its only Saviour, and to revere the Name that is above every name.

The "Life and Letters of Frederick W. Robertson, M.A., Incumbent of Trinity Chapel, Brighton, edited by Stopford A. Brooke, M.A.," gives a deeply interesting account of one of the most remarkable and impressive preachers of our day. Born in 1816; educated at the Edinburgh Academy and at Oxford; a curate, for a short time at Winchester and at Cheltenham, and afterwards incumbent of St. Ebbe's, Oxford, and finally of Trinity Chapel, Brighton, he died in 1853 at the early age of thirty-seven, having, in the middle of his ministerial life, passed through a change in theological opinion remarkable alike for its completeness and its rarity. At first he was thoroughly attached to the evangelical school; at Oxford he was noted for his earnest and consistent piety; he was a rigid sabbatarian, and a warm advocate of Calvinistic theology. The change he underwent not only withdrew him from Calvinistic theology and the fellowship of the Evangelical body, but gave him an intense dislike to the system, and led him to speak strongly against the ordinary view of the atonement, of the inspiration of the Scriptures and of the obligation of the Sabbath. Yet the change was accompanied with no laxity of life and no abatement of earnestness; his attachment to the person of the Saviour was as strong as ever, and his zeal for the promotion of personal religious earnestness and inward excellence burned with inextinguishable ardour. His preaching was more than popular in the ordinary sense, it was singularly effective, and that among two classes that would hardly have been expected to appreciate him together —men of highest intellect and culture on the one hand, and the working classes on the other. His published sermons have been even more widely influential than when preached; having not merely had a most extensive circulation, but having been read and admired by a much greater variety of classes than the sermons of any other preacher of the day. The memoir throws considerable light on all this. Mr. Robertson was a man of the most intensely sympathetic nature, with a nervous temperament developed to a pitch of sensibility that showed the action of disease. The illness of which he died was an affection of the brain. His sympathetic temperament led him to recoil from what he considered the dogmatism of the school in which he had been brought up; and fancying that their system discouraged views to which he attached the highest importance—views regarding the person of the Saviour, the spirit of self-sacrifice, and the supreme importance of inward excellence—he persuaded himself that its influence was pernicious, and expressed himself accordingly. He rejected the evangelical theology because he thought it excluded such things; whereas a more thoroughly comprehensive view of truth would have shown that it included them all, and that the exclusion was only practised by its narrower adherents. But with these drawbacks, it is impossible not to be deeply impressed with the singular beauty and purity of his character, the fervour of his love for Christ, the intensity of the pain he suffered on account of the sins and sorrows of humanity, the noble devotion with which he threw in his lot with the poor and the oppressed, and his fearless courage in uttering his sentiments, no matter what outcry might be raised against him. He was one of those who early saw the importance of what is now so generally admitted to be important—the condition of the working classes in England; and the service he rendered about the trying period of 1848-9 in restraining the wild spirit which had come over from the Continent, in guiding the working classes wisely, and in promoting a spirit of sympathy between employers and employed, and between rich and poor generally, was one of the most prominent features of his life.

Whatever may at one time have been "A Dutchman's difficulties with the English language," there is very little sign of Mr. de Liefde's having had much to do with them in the composition of his beautiful and most attractive book, "Six Months among the Charities of Europe." As the composition of a foreigner whose first lessons in English were obtained from the English Bible, these handsome volumes would be very remarkable, even if they had no higher interest or value. We do not need to tell the readers of the Sunday Magazine of the charm that belongs to M. de Liefde's writings—the happy spirit which breathes in them, the directness, the raciness, the picturesqueness of his style. We do not need to tell of his strong attachment to the great truths of the Word of God,—how he ever writes as one whose own spirit has been bathed in the great love of God in Christ, and who delights to reflect on other hearts the sunshine that has brightened his own. His visits to the Charities of Europe must have been congenial work. They were paid at three different times; and altogether, six-and-twenty charities were visited, though he has not described in his volumes more than fifteen. The reader will find here a most graphic account of several institutions well-known to fame, and of others whose usefulness is hardly smaller, though their celebrity may be less. The Rauhe Haus at Horn; the Deaconess House at Kaiserswerth; Father Zeller's School at Beuggen; the Asylum at Düsselthal; Pastor Heldring's Establishments near Hemmen; those of Mr. J. Bost at Laforce; the Agricultural Colonies at Rijsselt and at Sainte Foy, are among those that are fully described in this book. It is impossible to read of these without feeling rebuked for apathy, listlessness, and coldness in the great cause of Christian love. The Gospel of Christ has a fresh glory thrown back on it from these remarkable fruits of its loving spirit. M. de Liefde says most truly:—"I have always been of opinion that nowhere could a better proof of the Divine origin of Christianity and of the truth of the Gospel be found, than in the story, simply told, of some charitable institutions. Whatever the Christian religion may apparently have in common with other religions, this much is certain, that true self-denying charity, which seeks the lost, loves the poor, and consoles the sufferer, is exclusively its own. There never were such things as charities known in Heathendom, however civilized; nor were they even known in Israel before He appeared who taught his people to love their enemies, and to exercise charity towards the harlot, the publican, and the sinner."

ANNALS OF A QUIET NEIGHBOURHOOD.

BY THE VICAR.

IX.

On the afternoon of my second Sunday at Marshmallows, I was standing in the churchyard, casting a long shadow in the light of the declining sun. I was reading the inscription upon an old headstone, for I thought everybody was gone; when I heard a door open, and shut again before I could turn. I saw at once that it must have been a little door in the tower, almost concealed from where I stood by a deep buttress. I had never seen the door open, and I had never inquired anything about it, supposing it led merely into the tower.

After a moment it opened again, and, to my surprise, out came, stooping his tall form to get his grey head clear of the low archway, a man whom no one could pass without looking after him. Tall, and strongly built, he had the carriage of a military man, without an atom of that sternness which one generally finds in the faces of those accustomed to command. He had a large face, with large regular features, and large clear grey eyes, all of which united to express an exceeding placidity or repose. It shone with intelligence—a mild intelligence—no way suggestive of profundity, although of geniality. Indeed there was a little too much expression. The face seemed to express all that lay beneath it.

I was not satisfied with the countenance; and yet it looked quite good. It was somehow a too well-ordered face. It was quite Greek in its outline; and marvellously well-kept and smooth, considering that the beard, to which razors were utterly strange, and which descended half-way down his breast, would have been as white as snow, except for a slight yellowish tinge. His eyebrows were still very dark, only just touched with the frost of winter. His hair, too, as I saw when he lifted his hat, was still wonderfully dark for the condition of his beard.—It flashed into my mind, that this must be the organist who played so remarkably. Somehow I had not happened yet to inquire about him. But there was a stateliness in this man amounting almost to consciousness of dignity; and I was a little bewildered. His clothes were all of black, very neat and clean, but old-fashioned and threadbare. They bore signs of use, but more signs of time and careful keeping. I would have spoken to him, but something in the manner in which he bowed to me as he passed, prevented me, and I let him go unaccosted.

The sexton coming out directly after, and proceeding to lock the door, I was struck by the action. "What is he locking the door for?" I said to myself. But I said nothing to him, because I had not answered the question myself yet.

"Who is that gentleman," I asked, "who came out just now?"

"That is Mr. Stoddart, sir," he answered.

I thought I had heard the name in the neighbourhood before.

"Is it he who plays the organ?" I asked.

"That he do, sir. He's played our organ for the last ten years, ever since he came to live at the Hall."

"What Hall?"

"Why the Hall, to be sure,—Oldcastle Hall, you know."

And then it dawned on my recollection that I had heard Judy mention her uncle Stoddart. But how could he be her uncle?

"Is he a relation of the family?" I asked.

"He's a brother-in-law, I believe, of the old lady, sir, but how ever he come to live there I don't know. It's no such binding connection, you know, sir. He's been in the milintairy line, I believe, sir, in the Ingies, or somewheres."

I do not think I shall have any more strange parishioners to present to my readers; at least I do not remember any more just at this moment. And this one, as the reader will see, I positively could not keep out.

A military man from India! a brother-in-law of Mrs. Oldcastle, choosing to live with her! an entrancing performer upon an old, asthmatic, dry-throated church organ! taking no trouble to make the clergyman's acquaintance, and passing him in the churchyard with a courteous bow, although his face was full of kindliness if not of kindness! I could not help thinking all this strange. And yet—will the reader cease to accord me credit when I assert it?—although I had quite intended to inquire after him when I left the vicarage to go to the Hall, and had even thought of him when sitting with Mrs. Oldcastle, I never thought of him again after going with Judy, and left the house without having made a single inquiry after him. Nor did I think of him again till just as I was passing under the outstretched neck of one of those serpivolants on the gate; and what made me think of him then, I cannot in the least imagine; but I resolved at once that I would call upon him the following week, lest he should think that the fact of his having omitted to call upon me had been the occasion of such an apparently pointed omission on my part. For I had long ago determined to be no further guided by the rules of society than as they might aid in bringing about true neighbourliness, and if possible friendliness and friendship. Wherever they might interfere with these, I would disregard them—as far on the other hand as the disregard of them might tend to bring about the results I desired.

When, carrying out this resolution, I rang the door-bell at the Hall, and inquired whether Mr. Stoddart was at home, the butler stared; and, as I simply continued gazing in return, and waiting, he answered at length, with some hesitation, as if he were picking and choosing his words:

"Mr. Stoddart never calls upon any one, sir."

"I am not complaining of Mr. Stoddart," I answered, wishing to put the man at his ease.

"But nobody calls upon Mr. Stoddart," he returned.

"That's very unkind of somebody, surely," I said.

"But he doesn't want anybody to call upon him, sir."

"Ah! that's another matter. I didn't know that. Of course nobody has a right to intrude upon anybody. However, as I happen to have come without knowing his dislike to being visited, perhaps you will take him my card and say that if it is not disagreeable to him, I should like exceedingly to thank him in person for his sermon on the organ last Sunday."

He had played an exquisite voluntary in the morning.

"Give my message exactly, if you please," I said, as I followed the man into the hall.

"I will try, sir," he answered. "But won't you come up-stairs to mistress's room, sir, while I take this to Mr. Stoddart?"

"No, I thank you," I answered. "I came to call upon Mr. Stoddart only; and I will wait the result of your mission here in the hall."

The man withdrew, and I sat down on a bench, and amused myself with looking at the portraits about me. I learned afterwards that they had hung, till some thirty years before, in a long gallery connecting the main part of the house with that portion to which the turret referred to so often in Old Weir's story was attached. One particularly pleased me. It was the portrait of a young woman—very lovely—but with an expression both sad and—scared, I think, would be the readiest word to communicate what I mean. It was indubitably, indeed remarkably, like Miss Oldcastle. And I learned afterwards that it was the portrait of Mrs. Oldcastle's grandmother, that very Mrs. Crowfoot mentioned in Weir's story. It had been taken about six months after her marriage, and about as many before her death.

The butler returned, with the request that I would follow him. He led me up the grand staircase, through a passage at right angles to that which led to the old lady's room, up a narrow circular staircase at the end of the passage, across a landing, then up a straight steep narrow stair, upon which two people could not pass without turning sideways and then squeezing. At the top of this I found myself in a small cylindrical lobby, papered in blocks of stone. There was no door to be seen. It was lighted by a conical skylight. My conductor gave a push against the wall. Certain blocks yielded, and others came forward. In fact a door revolved on central pivots, and we were admitted to a chamber crowded with books from floor to ceiling, arranged with wonderful neatness and solidity. From the centre of the ceiling, whence hung a globular lamp, radiated what I took to be a number of strong beams supporting a floor above; for our ancestors put the ceiling above the beams, instead of below them as we do, and gained in space if they lost in quietness. But I soon found out my mistake. Those radiating beams were in reality book-shelves. For on each side of those I passed under I could see the gilded backs of books standing closely ranged together. I had never seen the contrivance before, nor, I presume, was it to be seen anywhere else.

"How does Mr. Stoddart reach those books?" I asked my conductor.

"I don't exactly know, sir," whispered the butler. "His own man could tell you, I dare say. But he has a holiday to-day; and I do not think he would explain it either; for he says his master allows no interference with his contrivances. I believe, however, he does not use a ladder."

There was no one in the room, and I saw no entrance but that by which we had entered. The next moment, however, a nest of shelves revolved in front of me, and there Mr. Stoddart stood with outstretched hand.

"You have found me at last, Mr. Walton, and I am glad to see you," he said.

He led me into an inner room, much larger than the one I had passed through.

"I am glad," I replied, "that I did not know, till the butler told me, your unwillingness to be intruded upon; for I fear, had I known it, I should have been yet longer a stranger to you."

"You are no stranger to me. I have heard you read prayers, and I have heard you preach."

"And I have heard you play; so you are no stranger to me either."

"Well, before we say another word," said Mr. Stoddart, "I must just say one word about this report of my unsociable disposition.—I encourage it; but am very glad to see you notwithstanding.—Do sit down."

I obeyed.

"I was so bored with visits after I came, visits which were to me utterly uninteresting, that I was only too glad when the unusual nature of some of my pursuits gave rise to the rumour that I was mad. The more people say I am mad, the better pleased I am, so long as they are satisfied with my own mode of shutting myself up, and do not attempt to carry out any fancies of their own in regard to my personal freedom."

Upon this followed some desultory conversation, during which I took some observations of the room. Like the outer room, it was full of books from floor to ceiling. But the ceiling was divided into compartments, harmoniously coloured.

"What a number of books you have!" I observed.

"Not a great many," he answered. "But I think there is hardly one of them with which I have not some kind of personal acquaintance. I think I could almost find you any one you wanted in the dark, or in the twilight at least, which would allow me to distinguish whether the top edge was gilt, red, marbled, or uncut. I have bound a couple of hundred or so of them myself. I don't think you could tell the work from a tradesman's. I'll give you a guinea for the poor-box if you pick out three of my binding consecutively."

I accepted the challenge; for although I could not bind a book, I considered myself to have a keen eye for the outside finish. After looking over the backs of a great many, I took one down, examined a little further, and presented it.

"You are right. Now try again."

Again I was successful, although I doubted.

"And now for the last," he said.

Once more I was right.

"There is your guinea," said he, a little mortified.

"No," I answered. "I do not feel at liberty to take it, because, to tell the truth, the last was a mere guess, nothing more."

Mr. Stoddart looked relieved.

"You are more honest than most of your profession," he said. "But I am far more pleased to offer you the guinea upon the smallest doubt of your having won it."

"I have no claim upon it."

"What! Couldn't you swallow a small scruple like that for the sake of the poor even? Well, I don't believe you could.—Oblige me by taking this guinea for some one or other of your poor people. But I am glad you weren't sure of that last book. I am indeed."

I took the guinea, and put it in my purse.

"But," he resumed, "you won't do, Mr. Walton. You're not fit for your profession. You won't tell a lie for God's sake. You won't dodge about a little to keep all right between Jove and his weary parishioners. You won't cheat a little for the sake of the poor! You wouldn't even bamboozle a little at a bazaar!"

"I should not like to boast of my principles," I answered; "for the moment one does so, they become as the apples of Sodom. But assuredly I would not favour a fiction to keep a world out of hell. The hell that a lie would keep any man out of is doubtless the very best place for him to go to. It is truth, yes, The Truth that saves the world."

"You are right, I daresay. You are more sure about it than I am though."

"Let us agree where we can," I said, "first of all; and that will make us able to disagree, where we must, without quarrelling."

"Good," he said. "Would you like to see my workshop?"

"Very much, indeed," I answered.

"Do you take any pleasure in applied mechanics?"

"I used to do so as a boy. But of course I have little time now for anything of the sort."

"Ah! of course."

He pushed a compartment of books. It yielded, and we entered a small closet. In another moment I found myself leaving the floor, and in yet a moment we were on the floor of an upper room.

"What a nice way of getting up stairs!" I said.

"There is no other way of getting to this room," answered Mr. Stoddart. "I built it myself; and there was no room for stairs. This is my shop. In my library I only read my favourite books. Here I read anything I want to read; write anything I want to write; bind my books; invent machines; and amuse myself generally. Take a chair."

I obeyed, and looked about me.

The room had many books in detached book-cases. There were various benches against the walls between, —one a bookbinder's; another a carpenter's; a third had a turning-lathe; a fourth had an iron vice fixed on it, and was evidently used for working in metal. Besides these, for it was a large room, there were several tables with chemical apparatus upon them, Florence-flasks, retorts, sand-baths, and such like; while in a corner stood a furnace.

"What an accumulation of ways and means you have about you," I said; "and all, apparently, to different ends."

"All to the same end, if my object were understood."

"I presume I must ask no questions as to that object?"

"It would take time to explain. I have theories of education. I think a man has to educate himself into harmony. Therefore he must open every possible window by which the influences of the All may come in upon him. I do not think any man complete without a perfect development of his mechanical faculties, for instance, and I encourage them to develop themselves into such windows."

"I do not object to your theory, provided you do not put it forward as a perfect scheme of human life. If you did, I should have some questions to ask you about it, lest I should misunderstand you."

He smiled what I took for a self-satisfied smile. There was nothing offensive in it, but it left me without anything to reply to. No embarrassment followed, however, for a rustling motion in the room the same instant attracted my attention, and I saw, to my surprise, and, I must confess, a little to my confusion, Miss Oldcastle. She was seated in a corner, reading from a quarto lying upon her knees.

"Oh! you didn't know my niece was here? To tell the truth, I forgot her when I brought you up, else I would have introduced you."

"That is not necessary, uncle," said Miss Oldcastle, closing her book.

I was by her instantly. She slipped the quarto from her knee, and took my offered hand.

"Are you fond of old books?" I said, not having anything better to say.

"Some old books," she answered.

"May I ask what book you were reading?"

"I will answer you—under protest," she said, with a smile.

"I withdraw the question at once," I returned.

"I will answer it notwithstanding. It is a volume of Jacob Behmen."

"Do you understand him?"

"Yes. Don't you?"

"Well, I have made but little attempt," I answered. "Indeed, it was only as I passed through London last that I bought his works; and I am sorry to find that one of the plates is missing from my copy."

"What plate is it? It is not very easy, I understand, to procure a perfect copy. One of my uncle's copies has no two volumes bound alike. Each must have belonged to a different set."

"I can't tell you what the plate is. But there are only three of those very curious unfolding ones in my third volume, and there should be four."

"I do not think so. Indeed I am sure you are wrong."

"I am glad to hear it—though to be glad that the world does not possess what I thought I only was deprived of, is selfishness, cover it over as one may with the fiction of a perfect copy."

"I don't know," she returned, without any response to what I said. "I should always like things perfect myself."

"Doubtless," I answered; and thought it better to try another direction.

"How is Mrs. Oldcastle?" I asked, feeling in its turn the reproach of hypocrisy; for though I could have suffered, I hope, in my person and goods and reputation, to make that woman other than she was, I could not say that I cared one atom whether she was in health or not. Possibly I should have preferred the latter member of the alternative; for the suffering of the lower nature is as a fire that drives the higher nature upwards. So I felt rather hypocritical when I asked Miss Oldcastle after her.

"Quite well, thank you," she answered, in a tone of indifference, which implied either that she saw through me, or shared in my indifference. I could not tell which.

"And how is Miss Judy?"

"A little savage, as usual."

"Not the worse for her wetting, I hope."

"Oh! dear no. There never was health to equal that child's. It belongs to her savage nature."

"I wish some of us were more of savages, then," I returned; for I saw in her eyes signs of exhaustion which moved my sympathy.

"You don't mean me, Mr. Walton, I hope. For if you do, I assure you your interest is quite thrown away. Uncle will tell you I am as strong as an elephant."

But here came a slight elevation of her whole figure; and a shadow, at the same moment, passed over her face. I saw that she felt she ought not to have allowed herself to become the subject of conversation.—Meantime her uncle was busy at one of his benches, filing away at a piece of brass fixed in the vice. He had thick gloves on. And indeed it had puzzled me before to think how he could have so many kinds of work and yet keep his hands so smooth and white as they were. I could not help thinking the results could hardly be of the most useful description if they were all accomplished without some loss of whiteness and smoothness in the process. Even the feet that keep the garments clean must be washed themselves in the end.

When I glanced away from Miss Oldcastle in the embarrassment produced by the repulsion of her last manner, I saw Judy in the room. At the same moment Miss Oldcastle rose.

"What is the matter, Judy?" she said.

"Grannie wants you," said Judy.

Miss Oldcastle left the room, and Judy turned to me.

"How do you do, Mr. Walton?" she said.

"Quite well, thank you, Judy," I answered. "Your uncle admits you to his workshop, then?"

"Yes, indeed. He would feel rather dull, sometimes, without me. Wouldn't you, Uncle Stoddart?"

"Just as the horses in the field would feel dull without the gad-fly, Judy," said Mr. Stoddart, laughing.

Judy, however, did not choose to receive the laugh as a scholium explanatory of the remark, and was gone in a moment, leaving Mr. Stoddart and myself alone. I must say he looked a little troubled at the precipitate retreat of the damsel; but he recovered himself with a smile, and said to me,

"I wonder what speech I shall make next to drive you away, Mr. Walton."

"I am not so easily got rid of, Mr. Stoddart," I answered. "And as for taking offence, I don't like it, and therefore I never take it. But tell me what you are doing now."

"I have been working for some time at an attempt after a perpetual motion, but, I must confess, more from a metaphysical or logical point of view than a mechanical one."

Here he took a drawing from a shelf, explanatory of his plan.

"You see," he said, "here is a top, made of platinum, the heaviest of metals, except iridium—which it would be impossible to procure enough of, and which would be difficult to work into the proper shape. It is surrounded, you will observe, by an air-tight receiver, communicating by this tube with a powerful air-pump. The plate upon which the point of the top rests and revolves is a diamond; and I ought to have mentioned that the peg of the top is a diamond likewise. This is of course for the sake of reducing the friction. By this apparatus communicating with the top, through the receiver, I set the top in motion—after exhausting the air as far as possible. Still there is the difficulty of the friction of the diamond point upon the diamond plane, which must ultimately occasion repose. To obviate this, I have constructed here, underneath, a small steam-engine, which shall cause the diamond plate to revolve at precisely the same rate of speed as the top itself. This, of course, will prevent all friction."

"Not that with the unavoidable remnant of air, however," I ventured to suggest.

"That is just my weak point," he answered. "But that will be so very small!"

"Yes; but enough to deprive the top of perpetual motion."

"But suppose I could get over that difficulty, would the contrivance have a right to the name of a perpetual motion? For you observe that the steam-engine below would not be the cause of the motion. That comes from above, here, and is withdrawn, finally withdrawn."

"I understand perfectly," I answered. "At least I think I do. But I return the question to you: Is a motion which, although not caused, is enabled by another motion, worthy of the name of a perpetual motion; seeing the perpetuity of motion has not to do merely with time, but with the indwelling of self-generative power—renewing itself constantly with the process of exhaustion?"

He threw down his file on the bench.

"I fear you are right," he said. "But you will allow it would have made a very pretty machine."

"Pretty, I will allow," I answered, "as distinguished from beautiful. For I can never dissociate beauty from use."

"You say that! with all the poetic things you say in your sermons! For I am a sharp listener, and none the less such that you do not see me. I have a loophole for seeing you. And I flatter myself, therefore, I am the only person in the congregation on a level with you in respect of balancing advantages. I cannot contradict you, and you cannot address me."

"Do you mean, then, that whatever is poetical is useless?" I asked.

"Do you assert that whatever is useful is beautiful?" he retorted.

"A full reply to your question would need a ream of paper and a quarter of quills," I answered; "but I think I may venture so far as to say that whatever subserves a noble end must in itself be beautiful."

"Then a gallows must be beautiful because it subserves the noble end of ridding the world of malefactors?" he returned promptly.

I had to think for a moment before I could reply.

"I do not see anything noble in the end," I answered. "If the machine got rid of malefaction, it would indeed have a noble end. But if it only compels it to move on, as a constable does—from this world into another—I do not, I say, see anything so noble in that end. The gallows cannot be beautiful."

"Ah, I see. You don't approve of capital punishments."

"I do not say that. An inevitable necessity is something very different from a noble end. To cure the diseased mind is the noblest of ends; to make the sinner forsake his ways, and the unrighteous man his thoughts, the loftiest of designs; but to punish him for being wrong, however necessary it may be for others, cannot, if dissociated from the object of bringing good out of evil, be called in any sense a noble end. I think now, however, it would be but fair in you to give me some answer to my question. Do you think the poetic useless?"

"I think it is very like my machine. It may exercise the faculties without subserving any immediate progress."

"It is so difficult to get out of the region of the poetic, that I cannot think it other than useful: it is so wide-spread. The useless could hardly be so nearly universal. But I should like to ask you another question: What is the immediate effect of anything poetic upon your mind?"

"Pleasure," he answered.

"And is pleasure good or bad?"

"Sometimes the one, sometimes the other."

"In itself?"

"I should say so."

"I should not."

"Are you not, then, by your very profession, more or less an enemy of pleasure?"

"On the contrary, I believe that pleasure is good, and does good, and urges to good. Care is the evil thing."

"Strange doctrine for a clergyman."

"Now, do not misunderstand me, Mr. Stoddart. That might not hurt you, but it would distress me. Pleasure, obtained by wrong, is poison and horror. But it is not the pleasure that hurts, it is the wrong that is in it that hurts; the pleasure hurts only as it leads to more wrong. I almost think myself, that if you could make everybody happy, half the evil would vanish from the earth."

"But you believe in God?"

"I hope in God I do."

"How can you then think that He would not destroy evil at such a cheap and pleasant rate?"

"Because He wants to destroy all the evil, not the half of it; and destroy it so that it shall not grow again; which it would be sure to do very soon if it had no antidote but happiness. As soon as men got used to happiness, they would begin to sin again, and so lose it all. But care is distrust. I wonder now if ever there was a man who did his duty, and took no thought. I wish I could get the testimony of such a man. Has anybody actually tried the plan?"

But here I saw that I was not taking Mr. Stoddart with me (as the old phrase was). The reason I supposed to be, that he had never been troubled with much care. But there remained the question, whether he trusted in God or the Bank?

I went back to the original question.

"But I should be very sorry you should think, that to give pleasure was my object in saying poetic things in the pulpit. If I do so, it is because true things come to me in their natural garments of poetic forms. What you call the poetic is only the outer beauty that belongs to all inner or spiritual beauty—just as a lovely face—mind, I say lovely, not pretty, not handsome—is the outward and visible presence of a lovely mind. Therefore, saying I cannot dissociate beauty from use, I am free to say as many poetic things—though, mind, I don't claim them: you attribute them to me—as shall be of the highest use, namely, to embody and reveal the true. But a machine has material use for its end. The most grotesque machine I ever saw that did something, I felt to be in its own kind beautiful; as God called many fierce and grotesque things good when He made the world—good for their good end. But your machine does nothing more than raise the metaphysical doubt and question, whether it can with propriety be called a perpetual motion or not?"

To this Mr. Stoddart making no reply, I take the opportunity of the break in our conversation to say to my readers, that I know there was no satisfactory following out of an argument on either side in the passage of words I have just given. Even the closest reasoner finds it next to impossible to attend to all the suggestions in his own mind, not one of which he is willing to lose, to attend at the same time to everything his antagonist says or suggests, that he may do him justice, and to keep an even course towards his goal—each having the opposite goal in view. In fact, an argument, however simply conducted and honourable, must just resemble a game at football; the unfortunate question being the ball, and the numerous and sometimes conflicting thoughts which arise in each mind forming the two parties whose energies are spent in a succession of kicks. In fact, I don't like argument, and I don't care for the victory. If I had my way, I would never argue at all. I would spend my energy in setting forth what I believe—as like itself as I could represent it, and so leave it to work its own way, which, if it be the right way, it must work in the right mind,—for Wisdom is justified of her children; while no one who loves the truth can be other than anxious, that if he has spoken the evil thing it may return to him void: that is a defeat he may well pray for. To succeed in the wrong is the most dreadful punishment to a man who, in the main, is honest. But I beg to assure my reader I could write a long treatise on the matter between Mr. Stoddart and myself; therefore, if he is not yet interested in such questions, let him be thankful to me for considering such a treatise out of place here. I will only say in brief, that I believe with all my heart that the true is the beautiful, and that nothing evil can be other than ugly. If it seems not so, it is in virtue of some good mingled with the evil, and not in the smallest degree in virtue of the evil.

I thought it was time for me to take my leave. But I could not bear to run away with the last word, as it were: so I said,

"You put plenty of poetry yourself into that voluntary you played last Sunday. I am so much obliged to you for it!"

"Oh! that fugue. You liked it, did you?"

"More than I can tell you."

"I am very glad."

"Do you know those two lines of Milton in which he describes such a performance on the organ?"

"No. Can you repeat them?"

"'His volant touch'
Instinct through all proportions, low and high,
Fled and pursued transverse the resonant fugue.'"

"That is wonderfully fine. Thank you. That is better than my fugue by a good deal. You have cancelled the obligation."

"Do you think doing a good turn again is cancelling an obligation? I don't think an obligation can ever be returned in the sense of being got rid of. But I am being hypercritical."

"Not at all.—Shall I tell you what I was thinking of while playing that fugue?"

"I should like much to hear."

"I had been thinking, while you were preaching, of the many fancies men had worshipped for the truth; now following this, now following that; ever believing they were on the point of laying hold upon her, and going down to the grave empty-handed as they came."

"And empty hearted, too?" I asked; but he went on without heeding me.

"And I saw a vision of multitudes following, following where nothing was to be seen, with arms outstretched in all directions, some clasping vacancy to their bosoms, some reaching on tiptoe over the heads of their neighbours, and some with hanging heads, and hands clasped behind their backs, retiring hopeless from the chase."

"Strange!" I said; "for I felt so full of hope while you played, that I never doubted it was hope you meant to express."

"So I do not doubt I did; for the multitude was full of hope, vain hope, to lay hold upon the truth And you, being full of the main expression, and in sympathy with it, did not heed the undertones of disappointment, or the sighs of those who turned their backs on the chase. Just so it is in life."

"I am no musician," I returned, "to give you a musical counter to your picture. But I see a grave man tilling the ground in peace, and the form of Truth standing behind him, and folding her wings closer and closer over and around him as he works on at his day's labour."

"Very pretty," said Mr. Stoddart, and said no more.

"Suppose," I went on, "that a person knows that he has not laid hold on the truth, is that sufficient ground for his making any further assertion than that he has not found it?"

"No. But if he has tried hard and has not found anything that he can say is true, he cannot help thinking that most likely there is no such thing."

"Suppose," I said, "that nobody has found the truth, is that sufficient ground for saying that nobody ever will find it? or that there is no such thing as truth to be found? Are the ages so nearly done that no chance yet remains? Surely if God has made us to desire the truth, He has got some truth to cast into the gulf of that desire. Shall God create hunger and no food? But possibly a man may be looking the wrong way for it. You may be using the microscope, when you ought to open both eyes and lift up your head. Or a man may be finding some truth which is feeding his soul, when he does not think he is finding any. You know the Fairy Queen. Think how long the Redcross Knight travelled with the Lady Truth—Una, you know—without learning to believe in her; and how much longer still without ever seeing her face. For my part, may God give me strength to follow till I die. Only I will venture to say this, that it is not by any agony of the intellect that I expect to discover her."

Mr. Stoddart sat drumming silently with his fingers, a half-smile on his face, and his eyes raised at an angle of forty-five degrees. I felt that the enthusiasm with which I had spoken was thrown away upon him. But I was not going to be ashamed therefore. I would put some faith in his best nature.

"But does not," he said, gently lowering his eyes upon mine after a moment's pause—"does not your choice of a profession imply that you have not to give chase to a fleeting phantom? Do you not profess to have, and hold, and therefore teach the truth?"

"I profess only to have caught glimpses of her white garments,—those, I mean, of the abstract truth of which you speak. But I have seen that which is eternally beyond her: the ideal in the real, the living truth, not the truth that I can think, but the truth that thinks itself, that thinks me, that God has thought, yea, that God is, the truth being true to itself and to God and to man—Christ Jesus, my Lord, who knows, and feels, and does the truth. I have seen Him, and I am both content and unsatisfied. For in Him are hid all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge. Thomas à Kempis says: 'Cui æternum Verbum loquitur, ille a multis opinionibus expe-ditur.'" (He to whom the eternal Word speaks, is set free from a press of opinions.)

I rose, and held out my hand to Mr. Stoddart. He rose likewise, and took it kindly, conducted me to the room below, and ringing the bell, committed me to the care of the butler.

As I approached the gate, I met Jane Rogers going home from the village. I stopped and spoke to her. Her eyes were very red.

"Nothing amiss at home, Jane?" I said.

"No, sir, thank you," answered Jane, and burst out crying.

"What is the matter, then? Is your——"

"Nothing's the matter with nobody, sir."

"Something is the matter with you.

"Yes, sir. But I'm quite well."

"I don't want to pry into your affairs; but if you think I can be of any use to you, mind you come to me."

"Thank you kindly, sir," said Jane; and, dropping a courtesy, walked on with her basket.

I went to her parents' cottage. As I came near the mill, the young miller was standing in the door with his eyes fixed on the ground, while the mill went on hopping behind him. But when he caught sight of me, he turned, and went in, as if he had not seen me.

"Has he been behaving ill to Jane?" thought I.

As he evidently wished to avoid me, I passed the mill without looking in at the door, as I was in the habit of doing, and went on to the cottage, where I lifted the latch, and walked in. Both the old people were there, and both looked troubled, though they welcomed me none the less kindly.

"I met Jane," I said, "and she looked unhappy; so I came on to hear what was the matter."

"You oughtn't to be troubled with our small affairs," said Mrs. Rogers.

"If the parson wants to know, why the parson must be told," said Old Rogers, smiling cheerily, as if he at least would be relieved by telling me.

"I don't want to know," I said, "if you don't want to tell me. But can I be of any use?"

"I don't think you can, sir,—leastways, I'm afraid not," said the old woman.

"I am sorry to say, sir, that Master Brownrigg and his son has come to words about our Jane; and it's not agreeable to have folk's daughter quarrelled over in that way," said Old Rogers. "What'll be the upshot on it, I don't know, but it looks bad now. For the father he tell the son that if ever he hear of him saying one word to our Jane, out ov that mill he goes, as sure as his name's Dick. Now, it's rather a good chance, I think, to see what the young fellow's made of, sir. So I tells my old 'ooman here; and so I told Jane. But neither on 'em seems to see the comfort of it somehow. But the New Testament do say a man shall leave father and mother, and cleave to his wife."

"But she ain't his wife yet, Old Rogers," interposed his wife.

"No more she can be, 'cept he leaves his father for her."

"And what'll become of them then, without the mill?"

"You and I never had no mill, old 'ooman," said Rogers; "yet here we are, very nearly ripe now,—ain't us, wife?"

"Medlar-like, Old Rogers, I doubt,—rotten before we're ripe," replied his wife, quoting a more humorous than refined proverb.

"Nay, nay, old 'ooman. Don't 'ee say so. The Lord won't let us rot before we're ripe."

"But, anyhow, it's all very well to talk. Thou knows how to talk, Rogers. But how will it be when the children comes, and no mill?"

"To grind 'em in, old 'ooman?"

Mrs. Rogers turned to me, who was listening with real interest, and much amusement.

"I wish you would speak a word to Old Rogers, sir. He never will speak as he's spoken to. He's always too merry, or too serious. He either takes me up short with a sermon, or he laughs me out of countenance that I don't know where to look."

Now I was pretty sure that Rogers's conduct was simple consistency, and that the difficulty arose from his always acting upon one or two of the plainest principles of truth and right; whereas his wife, good woman—for the bad, old leaven of the Pharisees could not rise much in her somehow—was always reminding him of certain precepts of behaviour to the oblivion of principles. "A bird in the hand," &c.—"Marry in haste," &c.—"When want comes in at the door, love flies out at the window," were amongst her favourite sayings; although not one of them was supported by her own experience. For instance, she had married in haste herself, and never, I believe, had once thought of repenting of it, although she had had far more than the requisite leisure for doing so. And many was the time that want had come in at her door, and the first thing it always did was to clip the wings of Love and make him less flighty, and more tender and serviceable. So I could not even pretend to read her husband a lecture.

"He's a curious man, Old Rogers," I said. "But as far as I can see, he's in the right, in the main. Isn't he now?"

"Oh, yes, I daresay. I think he's always right about the rights of the thing, you know. But a body may go too far that way, you know. It won't do to starve, sir."

Strange confusion—or, ought I not rather to say—ordinary and common-place confusion of ideas!

"I don't think," I said, "anyone can go too far in the right way."

"That's just what I want my old 'ooman to see, and I can't get it into her, sir. If a thing's right, it's right, and if a thing's wrong, why wrong it is. The helm must either be to starboard or port, sir."

"But why talk of starving?" I said. "Can't Dick work? Who could think of starting that?"

"Why, my old 'ooman here. She wants 'em to give it up and wait for better times. The fact is, she don't want to lose the girl."

"But she hasn't got her at home now."

"She can have her when she wants her, though—leastways after a bit of warning. Whereas if she was married, and the consequences a follerin' at her heels, like a man-o'-war with her convoy, she would find she was chartered for another port, she would."

"Well, you see, sir, Rogers and me's not so young as we once was, and we're likely to be growing older every day. And if there's a difficulty in the way of Jane's marriage, why I take it as a Godsend."

"How would you have liked such a difficulty, Mrs. Rogers, when you were going to be married to your sailor here? What would you have done?"

"Why whatever he liked, to be sure. But then, you see, Dick's not my Rogers."

"But your daughter thinks about him much in the same way as you did about this dear old man here when he was young."

"Young people may be in the wrong. I see nothing in Dick Brownrigg."

"But young people may be right sometimes, and old people may be wrong sometimes."

"I can't be wrong about Rogers."

"No, but you may be wrong about Dick."

"Don't you trouble yourself about my old 'ooman, sir. She allus was awk'ard in stays, but she never missed them yet. When she's said her say, round she comes in the wind like a bird, sir."

"There's a good old man to stick up for your old wife. Still I say, they may as well wait a bit. It would be a pity to anger the old gentleman."

"What does the young man say to it?"

"Why, he says like a man, he can work for her as well's the mill, and he's ready, if she is."

"I am very glad to hear such a good account of him. I shall look in, and have a little chat with him. I always liked the look of him. Good morning, Mrs. Rogers."

"I'll see you across the stream, sir," said the old man, following me out of the house.

"You see, sir," he resumed, as soon as we were outside, "I'm always afraid of taking things out of the Lord's hands. It's the right way, surely, that when a man loves a woman, and has told her so, he should act like a man, and do as is right. And isn't that the Lord's way? And can't He give them what's good for them. Mayhap they won't love each other the less in the end if Dick has a little bit of the hard work that many a man that the Lord loved none the less has had before him. I wouldn't like to anger the old gentleman, as my wife says; but if I was Dick, I know what I would do. But dont'ee think hard of my wife, sir, for I believe there's a bit of pride in it. She's afeard of bein' supposed to catch at Richard Brownrigg, because he's above us, you know, sir. And I can't altogether blame her, only we ain't got to do with the look o' things, but with the things themselves."

"I understand you quite, and I'm very much of your mind. You can trust me to have a little chat with him, can't you?"

"That I can, sir."

Here we had come to the boundary of his garden—the busy stream that ran away as if scared at the labour it had been compelled to go through, and was now making the best of its speed back to its mother-ocean, to tell sad tales of a world where every little brook must do some work ere it gets back to its rest. I bade him good day, jumped across it, and went into the mill, where Richard was tying the mouth of a sack as gloomily as the brothers of Joseph must have tied their sacks after his silver cup had been found.

"Why did you turn away from me, as I passed half-an-hour ago, Richard?" I said, cheerily.

"I beg your pardon, sir. I didn't think you saw me."

"But supposing I hadn't?—But I won't tease you. I know all about it. Can I do anything for you?"

"No, sir. You can't move my father. It's no use talking to him. He never hears a word anybody says. He never hears a word you say o' Sundays, sir. He won't even believe the Mark Lane Express about the price of corn. It's no use talking to him, sir."

"You wouldn't mind if I were to try?"

"No, sir. You can't make matters worse. No more can you make them any better, sir."

"I don't say I shall talk to him; but I may try it, if I find a fitting opportunity."

"He's always worse—more obstinate, that is, when he's in a good temper. So you may choose your opportunity wrong. But it's all the same. It can make no difference."

"What are you going to do, then?"

"I would let him do his worst. But Jane doesn't like to go against her mother. I'm sure I can't think how she should side with my father against both of us. He never laid her under any such obligation, I'm sure."

"There may be more ways than one of accounting for that. You must mind, however, and not be too hard upon your father. You're quite right in holding fast to the girl; but mind that vexation does not make you unjust."

"I wish my mother were alive. She was the only one that ever could manage him. How she contrived to do it nobody could think; but manage him she did, somehow or other. There's not a husk of use in talking to him."

"I daresay he prides himself on not being moved by talk. But has he ever had a chance of knowing Jane—of seeing what kind of a girl she is?"

"He's seen her over and over."

"But seeing isn't always believing."

"It certainly isn't with him."

"If he could only know her! But don't you be too hard upon him. And don't do anything in a hurry. Give him a little time, you know. Mrs. Rogers won't interfere between you and Jane, I am pretty sure. But don't push matters till we see. Good-bye."

"Good-bye, and thank you kindly, sir.—Ain't I to see Jane in the meantime?"

"If I were you, I would make no difference. See her as often as you used, which I suppose was as often as you could. I don't think, I say, that her mother will interfere. Her father is all on your side."

I called on Mr. Brownrigg; but, as his son had forewarned me, I could make nothing of him. He didn't see, when the mill was his property, and Dick was his son, why he shouldn't have his way. And he was going to have it. His son might marry any lady in the land; and he wasn't going to throw himself away that way.

I will not weary my readers with the conversation we had together. All my missiles of argument were lost as it were in a bank of mud, the weight and resistance of which they only increased. My experience in the attempt, however, did a little to reconcile me to his going to sleep in church; for I saw that it could make little difference whether he was asleep or awake. He, and not Mr. Stoddart in his organ-sentry-box, was the only person whom it was absolutely impossible to preach to. You might preach at him; but to him?—no.

X.

As Christmas drew nearer and nearer, my heart glowed with the more gladness; and the question came more and more pressingly—Could I not do something to make it more really a holiday of the Church for my parishioners? That most of them would have a little more enjoyment than they had had all the year through, I had ground to hope; but I wanted to connect this gladness—in their minds I mean, for who could dissever them in fact?—with its source, the love of God, that love manifested unto men in the birth of the Human Babe, the Son of Man. But I would not interfere with the Christmas Day at home. I resolved to invite as many of my parishioners as would come, to spend Christmas Eve at the Vicarage.

I therefore had a notice to that purport affixed to the church door; and resolved to send out no personal invitations whatever, so that I might not give offence by accidental omission. The only person thrown into perplexity by this mode of proceeding was Mrs. Pearson.

"How many am I to provide for, sir?" she said, with an injured air.

"For as many as you ever saw in church at one time," I said. "And if there should be too much, why so much the better. It can go to make Christmas Day the merrier at some of the poorer houses."

She looked discomposed, for she was not of an easy temper. But she never acted from her temper; she only looked or spoke from it.

"I shall want help," she said, at length.

"As much as you like, Mrs. Pearson. I can trust you entirely."

Her face brightened; and the end showed that I had not trusted her amiss.

I was a little anxious about the result of the invitation—partly as indicating the amount of confidence my people placed in me. But although no one said a word to me about it beforehand except Old Rogers, as soon as the hour arrived, the people began to come. And the first I welcomed was Mr. Brownrigg.

I had had all the rooms on the ground-floor prepared for their reception. Tables of provision were set out in every one of them. My visitors had tea or coffee, with plenty of bread and butter, when they arrived; and the more solid supplies were reserved for a later part of the evening. I soon found myself with enough to do. But before long, I had a very efficient staff. For after having had occasion, once or twice, to mention something of my plans for the evening, I found my labours gradually diminish, and yet everything seemed to go right; the fact being that good Mr. Boulderstone, in one part, had cast himself into the middle of the flood, and stood there immoveable both in face and person, turning its waters into the right channel, namely, towards the barn, which I had fitted up for their reception in a body; while in another quarter, namely, in the barn, Dr. Duncan was doing his best, and that was simply something first-rate, to entertain the people till all should be ready. From a kind instinct these gentlemen had taken upon them to be my staff, almost without knowing it, and very grateful I was. I found, too, that they soon gathered some of the young and more active spirits about them, whom they employed in various ways for the good of the community.

When I came in and saw the goodly assemblage, for I had been busy receiving them in the house, I could not help rejoicing that my predecessor had been so fond of farming that he had rented land in the neighbourhood of the vicarage, and built this large barn, of which I could make a hall to entertain my friends. The night was frosty—the stars shining brilliantly overhead—so that, especially for country people, there was little danger in the short passage to be made to it from the house. But, if necessary, I resolved to have a covered-way built before next time. For how can a man be the parson of a parish, if he never entertains his parishioners? And really, though it was lighted only with candles round the walls, and I had not been able to do much for the decoration of the place, I thought it looked very well, and my heart was glad that Christmas Eve—just as if the Babe had been coming again to us that same night. And is He not always coming to us afresh in every childlike feeling that awakes in the hearts of his people?

I walked about amongst them, greeting them, and greeted everywhere in turn with kind smiles and hearty shakes of the hand. As often as I paused in my communications for a moment, it was amusing to watch Mr. Boulderstone's honest, though awkward endeavours to be at ease with his inferiors; but Dr. Duncan was just a sight worth seeing. Very tall and very stately, he was talking now to this old man, now to that young woman, and every face glistened towards which he turned. There was no condescension about him. He was as polite and courteous to one as to another, and the smile that every now and then lighted up his old face, was genuine and sympathetic. No one could have known by his behaviour that he was not at court. And I thought—Surely even the contact with such a man will do something to refine the taste of my people. I felt more certain than ever that a free mingling of all classes would do more than anything else towards binding us all into a wise patriotic nation; would tend to keep down that foolish emulation which makes one class ape another from afar, like Ben Jonson's Fungoso, "still lighting short a suit;" would refine the roughness of the rude, and enable the polished to see with what safety his just share in public matters might be committed into the hands of the honest workman. If we could once leave it to each other to give what honour is due; knowing that honour demanded is as worthless, as insult undeserved is hurtless! What has one to do to honour himself? That is and can be no honour. When one has learned to seek the honour that cometh from God only, he will take the withholding of the honour that comes from men very quietly indeed.

The only thing that disappointed me was, that there was no one there to represent Oldcastle Hall. But how could I have everything a success at once?—And Catherine Weir was likewise absent.

After we had spent a while in pleasant talk, and when I thought nearly all were with us, I got up on a chair at the end of the barn and said:

"Kind friends,—I am very grateful to you for honouring my invitation as you have done. Permit me to hope that this meeting will be the first of many, and that from it may grow the yearly custom in this parish of gathering in love and friendship upon Christmas Eve. When God comes to man, man looks round for his neighbour. When man departed from God in the Garden of Eden, the only man in the world ceased to be the friend of the only woman in the world; and, instead of seeking to bear her burden, became her accuser to God, in whom he saw only the Judge, unable to perceive that the infinite love of the Father had come to punish him in tenderness and grace. But when God in Jesus comes back to men, brothers and sisters spread forth their arms to embrace each other, and so to embrace Him. This is, when He is born again in our souls. For, dear friends, what we all need is just to become little children like Him; to cease to be careful about many things, and trust in Him, seeking only that He should rule, and that we should be made good like Him. What else is meant by 'Seek ye first the kingdom of God and his righteousness, and all these things shall be added unto you?' Instead of doing so, we seek the things God has promised to look after for us, and refuse to seek the thing He wants us to seek—a thing that cannot be given us, except we seek it. We profess to think Jesus the grandest and most glorious of men, and yet hardly care to be like Him; and so when we are offered his Spirit, that is, his very nature within us, for the asking, we will hardly take the trouble to ask for it. But to-night, at least, let all unkind thoughts, all hard judgments of one another, all selfish desires after our own way, be put from us, that we may welcome the Babe into our very bosoms; that when He comes amongst us—for is He not like a child still, meek and lowly of heart?—He may not be troubled to find that we are quarrelsome, and selfish, and unjust."

I came down from the chair, and Mr. Brownrigg being the nearest of my guests and wide awake, for he had been standing, and had indeed been listening to every word according to his ability, I shook hands with him. And positively there was some meaning in the grasp with which he returned mine.

I am not going to record all the proceedings of the evening; but I think it may be interesting to my readers to know something of how we spent it. First of all, we sang a hymn about the Nativity. And then I read an extract from a book of travels, describing the interior of an Eastern cottage, probably much resembling the inn in which our Lord was born, the stable being scarcely divided from the rest of the house. For I felt that to open the inner eyes even of the brain, enabling people to see in some measure the reality of the old lovely story, to help them to have what the Scotch philosophers call a true conception of the external conditions and circumstances of events, might help to open the yet deeper spiritual eyes which alone can see the meaning and truth dwelling in and giving shape to the outward facts. And the extract was listened to with all the attention I could wish, except, at first, from some youngsters at the further end of the barn, who became, however, perfectly still as I proceeded.

After this followed conversation, during which I talked a good deal to Jane Rogers, paying her particular attention, indeed, with the hope of a chance of bringing old Mr. Brownrigg and her together in some way.

"How is your mistress, Jane?" I said.

"Quite well, sir, thank you. I only wish she was here."

"I wish she were. But perhaps she will come next year?"

"I think she will. I am almost sure she would have liked to come to-night; for I heard her say——"

"I beg your pardon, Jane, for interrupting you; but I would rather not be told anything you may have happened to overhear," I said, in a low voice.

"Oh, sir!" returned Jane, blushing a dark crimson; "it wasn't anything particular."

"Still, if it was anything on which a wrong conjecture might be built"—I wanted to soften it to her—"it is better that one should not be told it. Thank you for your kind intention, though."

Meantime Dr. Duncan was talking to one of his own patients, old Mrs. Trotter, to whose wants he ministered far more from his table than his surgery. I have known that man, hearing of a case of want from his servant, send the fowl he was about to dine upon, untouched, to those whose necessity was greater than his. But this is not the place; I will tell you more about him afterwards.

"Jane," I said, "will you do me a favour?"

"That I will, sir, if I can."

"Sing that Christmas carol I heard you sing last night to your mother."

"I didn't know anyone was listening, sir."

"I know you did not. I came to the door with your father, and we stood and listened."

She looked very frightened. But I would not have asked her had I not known that she could sing like a bird.

"I am afraid I shall make a fool of myself," she said.

"We should all be willing to run that risk for the sake of others," I answered.

"I will try then, sir."

So she sang, and her clear voice soon silenced the speech all round.

"Babe Jesus lay on Mary's lap;
The sun shone in his hair;
And so it was she saw, mayhap,
The crown already there.

"For she sang: 'Sleep on, my little King!
Bad Herod dares not come;
Before Thee, sleeping, holy thing,
Wild winds would soon be dumb.

"I kiss Thy hands, I kiss Thy feet,
My King, so long desired;
Thy hands shall never be soiled, my sweet,
Thy feet shall never be tired.

"For Thou art the King of men, my son;
Thy crown I see it plain;
And men shall worship Thee, every one,
And cry, Glory! Amen.'

"Babe Jesus opened his eyes so wide!
At Mary looked her Lord.
And Mary stinted her song and sighed.
Babe Jesus said never a word."

When Jane had done singing, I asked her where she had learned the carol; and she answered,—

"My mistress gave it me. There was a picture to it of the Baby on his mother's knee."

"I never saw it," I said. "Where did you get the tune?"

"I thought it would go with a tune I knew; and I tried it, and it did. But I was not fit to sing to you, sir."

"You must have quite a gift of song, Jane!" I said.

"My father and mother can both sing."

Mr. Brownrigg was seated on the other side of me, and had apparently listened with some interest. His face was ten degrees less stupid than it usually was. I fancied I saw even a glimmer of some satisfaction in it. I turned to Old Rogers.

"Sing us a song, Old Rogers," I said.

"I'm no canary at that, sir; and besides, my singing days be over. I advise you to ask Dr. Duncan there. He can sing."

I rose and said to the assembly:

"My friends, if I did not think God was pleased to see us enjoying ourselves, I should have no heart for it myself. I am going to ask our dear friend Dr. Duncan to give us a song.—If you please, Dr. Duncan."

"I am very nearly too old," said the doctor; "but I will try."

His voice was certainly a little feeble; but the song was not much the worse for it. And a more suitable one for all the company he could hardly have pitched upon.

"There is a plough that has no share,
But a coulter that parteth keen and fair.
But the furrows they rise
To a terrible size,
Or ever the plough hath touched them there.
'Gainst horses and plough in wrath they shake:
The horses are fierce; but the plough will break.

"And the seed that is dropt in those furrows of fear,
Will lift to the sun neither blade nor ear.
Down it drops plumb,
Where no spring times come;
And here there needeth no harrowing gear:
Wheat nor poppy nor any leaf
Will cover this naked ground of grief.

"But a harvest-day will come at last
When the watery winter all is past;
The waves so grey
Will be shorn away
By the angels' sickles keen and fast;
And the buried harvest of the sea
Stored in the barns of eternity."

Genuine applause followed the good doctor's song. I turned to Mr. Boulderstone.

"I am greatly obliged to you, Mr. Boulderstone, for the help you have given me this evening. I've seen you talking to everybody, just as if you had to entertain them all."

"I hope I haven't taken too much upon me. But the fact is, somehow or other, I don't know how, I got into the spirit of it."

"You got into the spirit of it because you wanted to help me, and I thank you heartily."

"Well, I thought it wasn't a time to mind one's peas and cues exactly. And really it's wonderful how one gets on without them. I hate formality myself."

The dear fellow was the most formal man I had ever met.

I then asked Mr. Brownrigg to take Jane Rogers into the house, and give her something to eat in return for her song. He yielded somewhat awkwardly, and what passed between them I do not know. But when they returned, she seemed less frightened at him than when she heard me make the proposal. And ere the evening was over, I may as well mention now, that I heard Mr. Brownrigg take leave of Jane with the words—

"Give us a kiss, my girl, and let bygones be bygones."

Which kiss I heard with delight. For had I not been a peacemaker in this matter? And had I not then a right to feel blessed?—But the understanding was brought about simply by making the people meet—compelling them, as it were, to know something of each other really. Hitherto this girl had been a mere name, or phantom at best, to her lover's father; and it was easy for him to treat her as such, that is, as a mere fancy of his son's. The idea of her had passed through his mind; but with what vividness any idea, notion, or conception could be present to him, my readers must judge from my description of him. So that obstinacy was a ridiculously easy accomplishment to him. For he never had any notion of the matter to which he was opposed—only of that which he favoured. It is very easy indeed for such people to stick to their point.

After this I read two or three of Wordsworth's ballads to them, and they listened even with more interest than I had been able to hope for. The fact was that the happy and free-hearted mood they were in "enabled the judgment." I wish one knew always by what musical spell to produce the right mood for receiving and reflecting a matter as it really is. Every true poem carries this spell with it in its own music, which it sends out before it as a harbinger, or properly a herberger, to prepare a harbour or lodging for it. But then it needs a quiet mood first of all, to let this music be listened to.

For I thought with myself, if I could get them to like poetry and beautiful things in words, it would not only do them good, but help them to see what is in the Bible, and therefore to love it more. For I never could believe that a man who did not find God in other places as well as in the Bible ever found Him there at all. And I always thought, that to find God in other books enabled us to see clearly that he was more in the Bible than in any other book, or all other books put together.

After supper we had a little more singing. And to my satisfaction nothing came to my eyes or ears, during the whole evening, that was undignified or ill-bred. Of course, I knew that many of them must have two behaviours, and that now they were on their good behaviour. But I thought the oftener such were put on their good behaviour, giving them the opportunity of finding out how nice it was, the better. It might make them ashamed of the other at last.

There were many little bits of conversation I overheard, which I should like to give my readers; but I cannot dwell longer upon this part of my Annals. Especially I should have enjoyed recording one piece of talk, in which Old Rogers was evidently trying to move a more directly religious feeling in the mind of Dr. Duncan. I thought I could see that the difficulty with the noble old gentleman was one of expression. But after all the old foremast-man was a seer of the Kingdom; and the other, with all his refinement, and education, and goodness too, was but a child in it.

Before we parted, I gave to each of my guests a sheet of Christmas Carols, gathered from the older portions of our literature. For most of the modern hymns are to my mind neither milk nor meat—mere wretched imitations. There were a few curious words in these, but I thought it better to leave them as they were; for they might set them inquiring, and give me an opportunity of interesting them further, some time or other, in the history of a word; for, in their ups and downs of fortune, words fare very much like human beings.

And here is my sheet of Carols :—

AN HYMNE OF HEAVENLY LOVE.

O blessed Well of Love! O Floure of Grace!
O glorious Morning-Starre! O Lampe of Light!
Most lively image of thy Father's face,
Eternal King of Glorie, Lord of Might,
Meeke Lambe of God, before all worlds behight,
How can we Thee requite for all this good?
Or what can prize that Thy most precious blood?

Yet nought Thou ask'st in lieu of all this love,
But love of us, for guerdon of Thy paine:
Ay me! what can us lesse than that behove?
Had He required life of us againe,
Had it beene wrong to ask his owne with gaine?
He gave us life, He it restored lost;
Then life were least, that us so little cost.

But He our life hath left unto us free,
Free that was thrall, and blessed that was bann'd;
Ne ought demaunds but that we loving bee,
As He himselfe hath lov'd us afore-hand,
And bound therto with an eternall band,
Him first to love that us so dearely bought,
And next our brethren, to his image wrought.

Him first to love great right and reason is,
Who first to us our life and being gave,
And after, when we fared had amisse,
Us wretches from the second death did save;
And last, the food of life, which now we have,
Even He himselfe, in his dear sacrament,
To feede our hungry soules, unto us lent.

Then next, to love our brethren, that were made
Of that selfe mould, and that self maker's hand,
That we, and to the same againe shall fade,
Where they shall have like heritage of land,
However here on higher steps we stand,
Which also were with selfe-same price redeemed
That we, however of us light esteemed.

Then rouze thy selfe, O Earth! out of thy soyle,
In which thou wallowest like to filthy swyne,
And doest thy mynd in durty pleasures moyle,
Unmindfull of that dearest Lord of thyne;
Lift up to Him thy heavie clouded eyne,
That thou this soveraine bountie mayst behold,
And read, through love, his mercies manifold.

Beginne from first, where He encradled was
In simple cratch, wrapt in a wad of hay,
Betweene the toylfull oxe and humble asse,
And in what rags, and in how base array,
The glory of our heavenly riches lay,
When Him the silly shepheards came to see,
Whom greatest princes sought on lowest knee.

From thence reade on the storie of his life,
His humble carriage, his unfaulty wayes,
His cancred foes, his fights, his toyle, his strife,
His paines, his povertie, his sharpe assayes,
Through which He past his miserable dayes
Offending none, and doing good to all,
Yet being malist both by great and small.

With all thy hart, with all thy soule and mind,
Thou must Him love, and his beheasts embrace:
All other loves, with which the world doth blind
Weake fancies, and stirre up affections base,
Thou must renounce and utterly displace,
And give thy selfe unto Him full and free,
That full and freely gave himselfe to thee.

Then shall thy ravisht soul inspired bee
With heavenly thoughts farre above humane skil,
And thy bright radiant eyes shall plainly see
Th' idee of his pure glorie present still Before thy face, that all thy spirits shall fill
With sweete enragement of celestial love,
Kindled through sight of those faire things above.

SPENSER.

NEW PRINCE, NEW POMP.

BEHOLD a silly tender Babe,
In freezing winter night,
In homely manger trembling lies;
Alas! a piteous sight.

The inns are full, no man will yield
This little Pilgrim bed;
But forced He is with silly beasts
In crib to shroud his head.

Despise Him not for lying there,
First what He is enquire;
An orient pearl is often found
In depth of dirty mire.

Weigh not his crib, his wooden dish,
Nor beast that by Him feed;
Weigh not his mother's poor attire,
Nor Joseph's simple weed.

This stable is a Prince's court,
The crib his chair of state;
The beasts are parcel of his pomp,
The wooden dish his plate.

The persons in that poor attire
His royal liveries wear;
The Prince himself is come from heaven—
This pomp is praised there.

With joy approach, O Christian wight!
Do homage to thy King;
And highly praise this humble pomp
Which He from heaven doth bring.

SOUTHWELL.

A DIALOGUE BETWEEN THREE SHEPHERDS.

1. WHERE is this blessed Babe
That hath made
All the world so full of joy
And expectation;
That glorious Boy
That crowns each nation
With a triumphant wreath of blessedness?

2. Where should He be but in the throng,
And among
His angel-ministers, that sing
And take wing
Just as may echo to his voice,
And rejoice,
When wing and tongue and all
May so procure their happiness?

3. But He hath other waiters now.
A poor cow,
An ox and mule stand and behold,
And wonder,
That a stable should enfold
Him that can thunder.

Chorus. O what a gracious God have we!
How good! How great! Even as our misery.

JEREMY TAYLOR.

A SONG OF PRAISE FOR THE BIRTH OF CHRIST.

AWAY, dark thoughts; awake, my joy;
Awake, my glory; sing;
Sing songs to celebrate the birth
Of Jacob's God and King.
O happy night, that brought forth light,
Which makes the blind to see!
The day-spring from on high came down
To cheer and visit thee.

The wakeful shepherds, near their flocks,
Were watchful for the morn;
But better news from heav'n was brought,
Your Saviour Christ is born.
In Bethlem-town the infant lies,
Within a place obscure,
O little Bethlem, poor in walls,
But rich in furniture!

Since heaven is now come down to earth,
Hither the angels fly!
Hark, how the heavenly choir doth sing
Glory to God on High!
The news is spread, the church is glad,
Simeon, o'ercome with joy,
Sings with the infant in his arms,
Now let thy servant die.

Wise men from far beheld the star,
Which was their faithful guide,
Until it pointed forth the Babe,
And Him they glorified.
Do heaven and earth rejoice and sing—
Shall we our Christ deny?
He's born for us, and we for him:
Glory to God on High.

OUR FATHER'S BUSINESS; OR, METHODS TO DO GOOD.

BY THE EDITOR.

III.—OUR CHIEF END.

"WHEN thou sittest to eat with a ruler, consider diligently what is before thee, and put a knife to thy throat, if thou be a man given to appetite." This passage, in which Solomon, by a startling metaphor, teaches the propriety of self-restraint, illustrates one of the most remarkable features of the Bible—this, namely, that though the conditions of men are infinitely varied, each one may find something appropriate to itself there. Our globe floats in an ocean of air; and as that, the atmosphere which surrounds it, descends to the bottom of the deepest mine, and also rises to the summit of the highest mountain; as it covers continents and seas alike; as, an element of universal life, it is found in all dwellings, and is fitted for men in all variety of conditions; so is the Word of God. Thus, whether they dwell in a palace or a prison, whether they celebrate a feast or observe a fast, whether they are prosperous or unfortunate in business, whether they hang rejoicing over a cradle or sit weeping by a coffin, whether they enjoy health or lie pining on a bed of sickness, whether they are occupied with the things of this world or of the next, whatever be the relation in which they stand to others,—that of sovereign or subject, parent or child, brother or sister, companion or neighbour, bosom friend or deadly foe,—there are none but will find something in the Bible written for them, and for their case.

While spreading itself thus over the whole surface of society, and directing us in the vast variety of cases which society offers, this book in some instances presents remarkable illustrations of the adage "much in little." Like a river which, flowing in a broad and spacious bed, contracts its limits, and collects its waters to pour them through a rocky channel not broader than a brave man could leap, the Bible gathers up all its directions to men in all manner of circumstances to present them in one short, single, comprehensive sentence. For instance, the duties we owe to God and to our neighbours, which fill so many of its chapters and have filled so many volumes of divinity, it gathers up into this short saying, "Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart, and with all thy soul, and with all thy mind; and thy neighbour as thyself." On these, says our Lord, hang all the law and the prophets. Enunciating the motives from which our conduct should spring, these condense into one sentence the whole duty of man. With a condensation no less remarkable, and an application equally broad, the Apostle Paul enunciates, not the motives but the object of our conduct, not the feelings that should move us, but the end we should move to, in this single but equally memorable sentence, "Whether therefore ye eat, or drink, or whatsoever ye do, do all to the glory of God."

This is the End for which we should live; and what a noble end this, compared with the mean, base, paltry, selfish, sinful objects for which so many live! Let a domestic who kindles a fire or sweeps a floor, do so for God's glory, let her go about her meanest avocations with a desire to honour the God she serves and the religion she professes; like the lark that from its lowly nest ascends on quivering wing to fill the blue sky over him with a flood of melody, let a ploughman, rising to this object, draw his furrow and go through his work with a view to God's glory, as well as to his master's interests and his own, and here indeed "the end sanctifies the means;" the secular becomes a sacred, the meanest an exalted and honourable occupation. By this motive we ally ourselves to the angels who sing God's praise and shine to his glory. Rising higher still, we become one with God himself. Our aim is his: He does all things for his own glory. In a sense we live the life and die the death of him who, praying, "Father, glorify thy Son, that thy Son also may glorify thee," undertook the work of redemption, and brought to light in the latent attribute of Mercy the brightest jewel of his Father's crown.

A grand end to live for, how many are the strong yet most tender, the common yet most sacred ties, that bind us to it, it were impossible to tell. We have more reason for living to God's glory than any angel has. He made us; he has preserved our fragile life; he has provided for our daily wants. But to man He has been merciful and gracious, besides being abundant in goodness and in truth—having borne with us, and pitied us, and spared us, and loved us, and, not sparing his own Son, redeemed us, and by his gracious Spirit called us out of darkness into his marvellous light. And so the warmest love to God should burn in human bosoms; and in the heavenly choir the highest notes should be sung, not by angels, but by those whom Jesus has redeemed to God by his blood out of every kindred, and nation, and people, and tongue. In taking our nature into union with his own, God conferred the rarest and highest honour on humanity; nor, since he redeemed men with the blood of his Son, do the highest angels wear crowns so bright as the thief of the cross, or the woman that was a sinner. As in the families of men the youngest child is seated by day next to its father, and lies closest by night to its mother's breast; or as in the material heavens it is not the largest but the smallest planets that revolve in orbits nearest to the sun; so in consequence of redeeming love, though in his original position inferior to angels, man occupies in the family of God, and in those heavens of which the visible are but the starry pavement, a place nearest to the throne. And thus by the law that to whom much is given, of them shall much be required, those whom God has most loved are most bound to love, those whom he has most glorified are most bound to glorify him.

We may regard the glory of God in a wider aspect than in its connection with our pleasure or our duty. There are in nature, ordained of God, laws of limited operation, and others, acting everywhere and on everything, of universal operation. There is no place in the world, for instance,—neither on the sea nor its shore, neither at the bottom of the darkest mine nor on the snowy summit of the loftiest mountain,—where a stone, if dropped from the hand, does not fall, drawn downward by the earth's attraction. Nor is this, which is called the law of gravitation, bounded by earth, her spacious seas or sounding shores. It reaches the utmost limits of creation; so that the law by which its rattle drops from an infant's hand, or the tear from its cheek, is the very law that rolls the planets in their orbits and fixes the stars in heaven. Now he who appears—so far as science has travelled the realms, and penetrated the mysteries, of creation—to have made all matter, worlds equally with grains of sand, suns of light equally with drops of rain, celestial equally with terrestrial things, subject to the imperial law of gravitation, with a sweep more universal still, because embracing both the spiritual and the material universe, has made all things for his own glory. Insects as well as angels, the flowers that spangle the meadow as well as the stars that spangle the sky, the lamp of the glowworm as well as the light of the sun, the lark that sings in the air and the saint that is singing in Paradise, the still small voice of conscience as well as the thunders that rend the clouds, or the trump that shall rend the tomb,—these and all things else manifest God's attributes and proclaim his praise. They glorify him; and for that end—the loftiest that God, angel, or man can aim at—they were made. As is said in Scripture, "The Lord hath made all things for himself: yea, even the wicked for the day of evil."

There is a sense indeed in which we, puny creatures whom he could crush before the moth, may defeat God in this object, may defraud him of his due. "Will a man rob God?" is the question he himself puts; and, speaking to the Jews, answers thus—"Ye have robbed me of tithes and offerings." But while, to use his own strong language, men may rob God of the love, service, time, and talents which are his due, of his glory they can no more rob him than they can pluck from his hand the sceptre, or from his brows the crown, of the universe. For though the atheist denies his existence,—the fool saying in his heart, "There is no God;" and the infidel his Word,—spurning it as an old superstition or cunningly-devised fable; and others, less bold but equally undutiful, like Simon Magus who sought the Holy Ghost to make money of his gifts, may profess for worldly ends to serve him, while in reality, the slaves of vicious passions, they serve his enemy, the devil, how abortive are all their efforts to rob him of his glory? "He that sits in heaven laughs, the Lord holds them in derision;" making the ungodly passions and very wrath of man so to praise him, that they who will not glorify him with the services of earth and on the harps of heaven, shall be compelled, as objects of his righteous indignation, to glorify him in the fires of hell. Not that he wishes it so. God is not willing that any should perish. Not that He has any pleasure in the death even of the wicked. Not but that he would have all men to come and be saved. he spared not his Son that he might spare us. But he will have his glory out of all men. Let men, therefore, "kiss the Son lest he be angry, and they perish from the way." "Every tree that bringeth not forth good fruit, shall be cut down and cast into the fire;" nor will God be defrauded of his glory. The tree that is not good for fruit shall be found good for fuel.

For example, Pharaoh had no intention whatever of serving God and promoting his glory. Nothing was further from his thoughts; as appears from the insolent and defiant tone of his answer to the message conveyed to him from God by Moses and Aaron: "Thus saith the Lord God of Israel, Let my people go!" "Who is the Lord that I should obey his voice to let Israel go? I know not the Lord, neither will I let Israel go!" Thus, the proud king of Egypt throws down the gage of battle; and daring the God of Israel to do his worst, puts the people under a more grievous and grinding bondage. Yet see how God took his glory out of this man; making Egypt a theatre on which to display his sovereign and almighty power in a series of unparalleled and stupendous miracles! Moses throws his rod on the palace floor; and so soon as the straight, dry, dead wood touches the ground, it turns, and twists, and hisses, and rears its crest, a living serpent,—putting the astonished courtiers to sudden flight. He stretches it on the river—and all the waters of Egypt change into blood;—the goblet with its loathsome draught drops from the hand of the thirsty; and the Nile rolls its red flood from shore to shore onward to the sea, crimsoning her foaming waves. He raises it; and loud thunders rend the sky, nor cease till there is neither standing tree nor living beast in the fertile fields of Egypt—all lie crushed and killed by balls of fire and tremendous bolts of ice. Miracle succeeds miracle; each fit of Pharaoh's obstinacy affording God an opportunity of glorifying himself through one who refused to glorify him. Nor was the last of these judgments the least remarkable. For though it was to his own destruction, it was eminently to God's glory that Pharaoh, seeing the sea open its gates to let Israel go, rushed down into the deep, lashing his horses like a madman. And when Moses, standing against the morning skyline on a rock of the other shore, again stretched out his rod, the parted waters, obedient to the signal, rushed together, to roar and foam in one wild tumultuous sea over the banners and chariots, the pride and hosts of Egypt. The sea has moaned over many a wreck, but never made one like that, over which her avenging waves go rejoicing; and never did any man she flung on her shore less intend to glorify God than he over whom, and the drowned host the waves floated to their feet, Moses and the whole congregation sang, "I will sing unto the Lord, for he hath triumphed gloriously: the horse and his rider hath he thrown into the sea. Thy right hand, O Lord, is glorious in power: thy right hand hath dashed in pieces the enemy; thou didst blow with thy wind, the sea covered them: they sank as lead in the mighty waters. Who is like unto thee among the gods? who is like thee, glorious in holiness, fearful in praises, doing wonders? Sing ye to the Lord, for he hath triumphed gloriously; the horse and his rider hath he thrown into the sea!"

But let us confine our attention to the glory of God as the end for which we should be willing, and should be happy, to live. Without entering into the merits of the different catechisms used by Protestant Churches, all will admit that none open with an introduction more grand than that of the Westminster Divines. Whatever judgment may be formed of the building itself, no porch or vestibule, no introduction could exceed in loftiness and grandeur the manner in which it opens—with this question, namely, and its appropriate answer, "What is the chief end of man?"—"The chief end of man is to glorify God and enjoy him for ever." With that, like the catechism, our life should open, and should also close; the glory of God, and not our own, being the end we ought to have in view in all its plans and purposes, its actions and arrangements. And it may serve to illustrate the subject, and also promote a good practical end, to consider here the case which St. Paul puts, namely that of eating and drinking to the glory of God.

Now I remark that we eat and drink to this end when we share our food with the needy. It were not to glorify God, it were not to be like the children of our Father in heaven, it were not to recommend religion in the eyes of the world, it were not to adorn the doctrine of God our Saviour, it were not to be like Jesus Christ, for Christians to pamper their appetite and indulge their love of a luxurious table to the loss of those who suffer want, and are ready to perish. I refer not only to times of public calamity, of high prices and low wages, of scant harvests and stern winters, of such destruction of crops as some years ago sent our Highlanders to their stormy shores to pluck the tangle and gather shells for food, and turned Ireland into a Hadadrimmom, or valley of weeping. At all times and everywhere, but especially in our crowded cities, there are families sorely pinched for the common necessaries of life; people who struggle for existence, and find it hard to feed the hungry mouths of children, or keep body and soul together. In many cases, perhaps, their vices have reduced them to this misery; and it is sometimes a serious and difficult question whether, and how far, charity should interpose between crime and its consequences. God has wisely ordained suffering to be the penalty of sin, and appointed pain the guardian of virtue as well as of life. Were it otherwise, were the indolent to enjoy the same advantages as the industrious, were vice as conducive to health and wealth and pleasure as virtue, this world would not be fit to live in. Therefore, however painful it may be to refuse relief and pass by the sufferer, as if our hearts, instead of bleeding for them, were as hard as stone, our duty in certain cases and to some extent may require us to allow men, by reaping as they have sowed, to learn that "the way of transgressors is hard." But God makes his sun to shine upon the evil and the good; and we are to be the children of our Father in heaven, which we cannot be, blessing others—the many who suffer want in this world and no blame to them, poor children, the fatherless, and the stranger, unless in the very matter of our tables and of ministering to our appetites we have respect to God's glory. Were there no waste on the part of some, how much less want would there be on the part of others? If Dives had not fared sumptuously, Lazarus had fared comfortably, every day. The waste that goes on in many houses, the luxuries under which tables groan and health suffers, would supply the wants, and diffuse contentment through the homes, of thousands; and they only who, thinking that there is room and bread enough at their Father's table for them and others, make room for these, and from their own superfluity supply their neighbour's plate and fill his cup, eat to God's glory; glorify God at the table in eating, as well as in the temple in worshipping; and breathe the spirit of him, our divine Pattern, who, when the fare was but barley loaves and fishes, said, "Gather up the fragments, that nothing may be lost!"

I remark again, we eat and drink to God's glory when we abstain from excess—from the gluttony that, on the one hand, makes man a beast, and the drunkenness that, on the other hand, makes him a devil. The last, as a national, at least our most prevailing sin, has the chief claim on our notice. The evils of intemperance we would not have cause to lament, and be ashamed of; it would not be the blot of our country and the disgrace of our Churches, the curse of so many families and the "skeleton" in so many houses, were God's glory our end in eating and in drinking, as in all things else. But such wide-spread desolation has this hideous vice wrought on the peace and prosperity of families, on the bodies and souls of those for whom Jesus died, that many, who do not go the length of saying that there is sin in the use of stimulants, go the length (and I am not ashamed to confess myself one of the number) of saying that these do so much more ill than good, are so dangerous to all and so deadly to many, that for security against their abuse, it is best, unless as medicines, to abstain from their use. A matter this to which the apostolic rule applies, "Let every man be fully persuaded in his own mind."

I know that great errors have been propagated, and even great crimes committed, from mistaken views of what was for the glory of God. For that end, Saul of Tarsus — as many bloody bigots have done since then—persecuted the Church of God, and was so exceedingly mad against Christ's people that his very name struck terror into their hearts. In shedding Stephen's blood, and breathing forth slaughters, this Jew thought he did God service. He aimed at God's glory; but by how great a distance did he miss the mark? People, I admit, may be as far wrong as Saul, or even Jehu, when, pursuing his selfish and ambitious ends, he reined in his fiery steeds and invited the prophet to share his chariot, saying, "Come, see my zeal for the Lord." But though it may sometimes be doubtful whether a sober man is on the way to heaven, there is, and can be, no doubt that a drunkard is on the way to hell. It may be a question with a humble, downcast, trembling believer, seated at the Lord's table, whether, when he raises the wine cup of communion to his lips, he is drinking to the glory of God; but there can be no question that God is not glorified, but dishonoured, by the cup which turns man's heart to stone and his head to madness,—which destroys his reason, and damns his soul. No drunkard, says the Bible, "shall inherit the kingdom of God."

All who love God and their fellow-creatures, who are animated with a spark of the love which brought our blessed Saviour to this world and the cross, should, as pre-eminently one grand way of living to the glory of God, conspire together to check, and, were that possible, to extinguish and trample out this terrible vice. It may be said of its evils, their name is legion. For one God's providence makes poor, drunkenness reduces a thousand to poverty; for one born without reason, it deprives thousands of reason; for one sober man who commits suicide, by the accidents which it produces and the diseases which it generates it sends thousands by their own hands to an untimely grave; and in broken-hearted wives and starving children kills many more than the murderers who fall on scaffolds—than battles that redden earth's soil with soldiers' blood. It is calculated that, by its direct or indirect influence, drunkenness costs this country, year by year, of lives not less than sixty thousand, and of money not less than sixty millions—a sum greater by twenty times than all this Christian nation contributes for the purposes of education, for the maintenance and propagation of the Gospel. Is this to eat and drink to the glory of God? Alas! it becomes us to exclaim with Ezra, "I blush, and am ashamed to lift up my head." May God give us grace to amend our ways and doings, as those whom Christ charges with the care of his own sacred cause and of his Father's glory!

It was a precious legacy Jesus bestowed on John, the best-loved of the disciples, in his mother. Before his conception, Gabriel, leaving the throne of God, winged his way down to Mary's door, to astonish the humble virgin, not more by his appearance than by this strange address—"Hail, thou that art highly favoured! the Lord is with thee: blessed art thou among women." After his conception, but before his birth, her cousin, whom she had gone to visit, received Mary as if she had been a queen—"Blessed," cried Elisabeth, as she gazed on her face, perhaps bent lowly at her feet, "blessed art thou among women, and blessed is the fruit of thy womb. And whence is this to me, that the mother of my Lord should come to me?" After his birth, the aged Simeon stood on the verge of another world, and holding the blessed babe in his withered arms, poured forth a strain equally inspired in its heavenly source and lofty in its glorious import; only that it closed with words of ominous meaning. A sword is to pierce the mother's soul. What sword? Long a mystery to Mary, the hour has come that it ceases to be so. It is now unsheathed, glittering before her dazzled eyes, buried in her quivering heart. Jesus, her Son, is hanging on the bloody tree, and dies amid the scorn of man, and to appearance under the wrath of God. The sword is piercing her soul. Jesus sees it; and all the son is moved within him. Pattern to the children of men, he forgets his own sorrows in his mother's; and, turning his eye from her fainting form to fix it on John, he commits her to the tenderest, kindest, and best-loved of his disciples, in these touching and most expressive words—"Behold thy mother!" A precious charge indeed! What danger was not John ready to face, what sacrifices to submit to, what self-denial and hardship to endure, that he might supply the wants of Mary, and shield a head so honoured from the storms and ills of life!

Had this legacy been bequeathed to us from the cross where he hung, bleeding to save us, had Jesus with dying look and voice committed his mother to our charge, he had not committed to us a trust more precious than we have. Christians have, indeed, a still greater, dearer charge. I speak not of pastors, to whom Christ says, "Feed my sheep, feed my lambs,"—of those, the ministers of the Gospel, to whose care, in souls purchased by his dying blood, he has committed nor of parents, to whom, as he commits in each child an immortal spirit to their guardian arms, he says, in the words of Pharaoh's daughter, "Nurse this child for me!" Not to one and another, not to this or that class, but to all his people, without distinction of age, office, or rank, he has committed the sacred cause of his own and of his Father's glory. How great the responsibility, how weighty, as well as how honourable, the charge of the humblest Christian! And since according to the tenor of his life God will be honoured, or dishonoured; since the divine glory will thereby be either promoted, or hindered; since sinners will thereby be either drawn to religion, or driven from it; since the hands of ministers will thereby be either strengthened, or weakened; and since in God's providence souls will thereby be either lost or saved, and the Christian himself become to others either the savour of death unto death, or the savour of life unto life—how should God's people feel the solemnity and awfulness of their position? Let them put forth their utmost efforts, and put up their most earnest prayers, that they may make their light so to shine before men that God may be glorified—that others may see their good works, and glorify their Father which is in heaven.

> Treasures greater far
> Than east or west unfold;—

KING DAVID

AS THE PROPHET OF CHRIST.

That which distinguishes David not only from all earthly kings, but even from all the other pious kings of Judah, is the fact that he was not only a sovereign but a prophet. It is true, the prophetic office was never solemnly conferred upon him, as it was, for instance, upon Elisha, nor was it in his character of prophet that he appeared in public life. Yet to the Church he is not less known as a prophet than as a king; nay, his prophetic character is so much blended with his royalty, that believers may call him a prophet-king, just as Melchisedec is called a priest-king.

An eminent Swiss clergyman justly says that David "not only uttered prophecies, but did and lived prophecies;—that his person and position in history, his whole life and labours, were prophetic." * Of all the living types of Christ in the Old Testament, he was one of the most perfect. With the exception of Joseph, the son of Jacob, I do not know one man in the holy history whose life reflects with such minuteness and clear detail the image of the promised Messiah. His adversities foreshadowed the sufferings, his prosperity the triumph, of the spiritual King of Israel. While describing his own experiences, he could not help picturing, though less clearly, the experiences of Christ, who was to be born of him. The Holy Spirit so guided his pen, that David's individuality was often completely identified with that of his Divine Son; for his hallowed fancy, breaking through the limits of his own personal experiences, stepped over into those which were to be exclusively peculiar to Christ, and he described these with as great intensity of perception and power of utterance as if he had really experienced them himself. The Apostle in the Epistle to the Hebrews (vii. 9, 10) says that Levi, while yet in the loins of Abraham, paid tithes; and so we may say that Jesus, while yet in the loins of David, wrote his own history.

It is this close, let me say essential connection, with the person of Christ, which places David in the list of the few holy men chosen by God, and from whose names it pleased Him to borrow a title, when revealing Himself to his people. There are only five men mentioned in the Old Testament whose names were honoured in this special manner, viz., Shem, Abraham, Isaac, Jacob and David. Much loved and highly honoured by God in other respects as Enoch, Noah, Moses and many others were, yet their names never occur as constituents of the title with which God chose to be known. He never reveals Himself as the God of Enoch or the God of Moses, but He is once called the God of Shem (Gen. ix. 26) and He reveals himself as the God of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, and as the God of David. These were the chief paternal ancestors of Jesus, and they formed, as it were, five pillars, which bore that golden chain predestined to end in the Rock of Ages, Christ, and thus, from the earliest times, connected our human race with Emmanuel, God with us.* Among these greatly favoured ones David was the most prominent, because in him the promises which were given to the other patriarchs obtained their highest expression. The light of Messianic prophecy, which hitherto had been more or less dim and diffuse, was in him concentrated and made so definite as to be reflected with even increasing lustre through all the revelations of later prophets.

The history of this extraordinary man cannot be well understood unless it is regarded as the history of one of the chief bearers of God's revelations. It is in this light that he is mainly presented to us by his sacred biographer. Had his life been written by such men as Herodotus or Tacitus, who concerned themselves solely with the social and political importance of their heroes, many of his deeds, of which we now know but very little, would have been copiously related; while many others, of which we now have detailed and accurate accounts, would scarcely have been mentioned even. Biblical history is distinguished from profane history in this, that it does not so much purpose to record the doings of men, as the history of the revelation of God to men and through men. The parts of a man's biography which it dwells longest upon are invariably those a mere historian would have passed over, but in which the man's relation to God's revelation is most clearly brought out. David's conquests, for instance, must have been considerable. The methods by which he subjected the immense territory between the frontiers of Egypt and the Euphrates must have given proof of uncommon military skill and prowess. Yet the sacred historian merely refers to them; points to them, as it were, in passing. His sufferings under Saul's persecutions, on the contrary, of which, probably, an ordinary historian would have made cursory mention, are in the Bible fully and graphically reported, because they formed the school in which the heart of that "man of God" was trained so as to make him truly a "man after God's heart." It is only from some small, almost incidental, scraps of the sacred record that we know of David's extraordinary talents as a politician, a general, and a poet; but oftentimes it is from the most elaborate pictures that we obtain knowledge of his confidence in God in times of trouble, and of his deep contrition in times of sin and guilt.

Though anointed by Samuel as king of Israel, as

* Since the appearance of Christ on earth, God has exchanged his former titles for that of the "God and Father of Jesus Christ." All other names, however honourable and venerable, must disappear before this one. The former names derived their signification from their relation to his. I will not say that Christian preachers who, in their sermons or prayers, speak of or address God as "the God of Jacob," are guilty of an offence against Christ, but they countenance a strange anachronism. It is not seemly to connect God's character with a lesser name, where the highest name has been given. We do not meet with one passage in the New Testament which favours the idea that the Apostles ever called God the God of Jacob.

Saul's successor, yet, strange to say, David for awhile remained a shepherd. The performance of the solemnity at that early period may perhaps be best explained by bearing in mind the educational purpose God had in view. This young man, though designated for the highest place amongst men, was to exercise himself in perfect submission to, and constant dependence upon God, by "following the sheep" even till the moment the finger of the Lord should beckon him to come forward. That discipline was necessary for a youth, who, though undoubtedly gifted with extraordinary natural talents, might nevertheless be easily tempted to rely upon his own strength and wisdom. Such discipline would in any circumstances have been salutary; but it was especially necessary for a young man who was appointed to be a king in a theocratic kingdom, where perfect submission to the order of God was essential to the well-being of the State. It was through want of such a humble, devout spirit that Saul lost the throne; it was through perseverance in a humble, devout spirit that David kept it. Thus, while typifying by his profession as a shepherd the faithfulness and care of the great Shepherd of the sheep, David at the same time foreshadowed by his obedience the character of Him who "sought not his own will but the will of the Father who had sent Him" (John v. 30), and who was "obedient unto death, even the death of the cross" (Phil. ii. 8).

A remarkable feature in David's character was his love of music, especially of those tender melodies which are so congenial to the quiet of the shepherd's life. In a young man who evinced a courage which did not shrink from fighting even a lion and a bear, this was significant and striking. It showed that, powerful hero as he was, the key-note of his heart sounded peace and harmony. Gallantly he stood out against injustice and oppression; a more terrible antagonist the enemies of God knew not. Yet his was not the spirit of Ishmael, "whose hand was against every man, and against whom was every man's hand." If it were required, he could make the hills and valleys resound with the clangour of battle; but the harsh sounds of uncontrolled passion and the rude licence of war did not accord with his tastes. There were many noisy, harsh-sounding instruments in his semi-barbaric days: but his fancy was for the mellow, tuneful harp, whose strings he knew well how to strike. The sweet tones which he could draw from the chords drove away even the evil spirit of melancholy from Saul's soul. The humble shepherd, harp in hand, stood before the king, and proved able to conquer an enemy greater than he was. In this, David was a striking type of Him who, with the gentle breath of the Gospel, was to dispel the terror of death from sinners' hearts, and to destroy the works of the prince of this world.

It was his musical skill that first brought David to the royal Court. Here a new world must have disclosed itself to the keen eyes of the young shepherd. His conduct in later times showed that he had not witnessed it in vain. He returned to his sheep, to his solitude and his harp. Moses lived some years at the Court of Pharaoh, and then went to herd Jethro's sheep. So David spent some time at the Court of Saul, and returned to his calling; and he knew both were preparations for the destiny in store for him. While playing his harp in his solitude, he could remember witnessing the dangers and sorrows of a throne, resting secure upon the Word of God. He could reflect, too, how a poor man who fears God is richer and happier than a king and a Court which have swerved from the right way. To know this, was expedient for a young man who himself was one day to sit upon a throne.

Some time later we see David sent by his father as a messenger to his brothers in the camp. Israel was at that time at war with the Philistines, whose chief champion, Goliath, defied the armies of the living God. The indignation with which David heard the impious and insulting language of the giant showed that he was animated by a different spirit from that of Saul and his men. His glorious victory over the monster Philistine was the turning-point of his outward life. The shepherd then becomes a soldier. Saul cannot help honouring the young hero with a permanent situation at his Court, though inwardly he is consumed with envy of one he feels may be a formidable rival. That period of David's life now opens in which he typifies Christ as suffering under the persecutions of the prince of this world, who, consequently, is foreshadowed by the person of Saul. The anointed one who "abode not in the truth," and "kept not his first estate," but became a liar and a murderer, turns his deadly anger against the beloved of God, who has been anointed in his stead, and to whom the throne, the dominion, and all the power in the kingdom have been given. In the days of Christ "the common people heard Him gladly," till the worldly power had risen openly against Him. So David, in the commencement of his public life, was the favourite of the people, till Saul threw off his disguise, and declared himself his implacable enemy. David was then abandoned by the timid multitude, and left alone with the faithful few. The band of friends who, notwithstanding his having become an outlaw and an outcast, yet continued to believe in his divine unction, and to expect his future elevation to the throne, typified the Church of Christ, which, in the face of Christ's rejection by the world, persistently believes that He is the Messiah, the Anointed One. Among the few who clave faithfully to the fugitive hero, Jonathan, his brother-in-law, was undoubtedly the first,—standing alone in the unparalleled purity and nobility of his character. He certainly typifies the Church of Christ in her boundless love and faithful devotedness to her "Elder Brother, Saviour, and King." Jonathan knew well that David's success would be his ruin, and also that of his father's house. Yet such was his reverence for the anointed of God, and such his love for David, that he hated his own life, i. e., his own personal interest and his father's house, for David's sake. In a typical manner, he thus illustrated that saying: "If any man come to Me and hate not his father and mother, he cannot be my disciple."

Adversity is the true school for great men. In it David learnt his lessons. He had ascended to the highest position in the kingdom, had attained the seat next to the throne, but he was suddenly, as with one stroke, cast down into the dust again. He was almost killed by the javelin of his infuriated father-in-law; a lucky turn of his body saved him. Had it not been for the cunning artifice of his wife he would have been murdered in his own house by the messengers of Saul. He is deprived of his rank and his comforts, and he becomes poorer than the poorest. Even Samuel, the grey-headed venerable prophet, has it not in his power to shelter him permanently. He must flee from country and people, as if he were a malefactor. Perhaps it was in a moment of weakness that he resolved to take refuge with the king of the Philistines at Gath. Here he was welcome as the object of Saul's hatred, but suspected at the same time as the conqueror of Goliath. Affecting to be a maniac, he succeeds in escaping from his pursuers, only to be hunted like a stag on the mountains of Judah. Here, that little band of faithful companions, who formed the nucleus of his future military power, gathered round him. They were a poor, miserable-looking band of men, who in their distress and need applied to him for help, protection, and consolation. In this, they foreshadowed those poor and needy, those helpless and hopeless sinners, who were to go to Christ for salvation.

A long series of hardships, persecutions, and disappointments ensued, in which David and his friends often found themselves on the brink of despair or of perdition; and, but for the marked interference of that God in whom he trusted, he would have fallen a victim to Saul's implacable wrath. Here the fire of purification through which God led him attained its highest heat, and it is wonderful to see how here his faith rises ever higher and higher. The darker the shade the malignity of his enemy throws about him, the more gloriously shines the lustre of his piety, generosity, and true nobility of character. Though living a thousand years before the Gospel was preached, yet he proves himself to have known its fundamental principle, in that he spared, twice over, the life of his cowardly persecutor. He loved his enemy; he gave blessing for cursing; he recompensed not evil for evil, but committed himself to Him that judgeth righteously. We can understand how a man, who was led in such a way and showed such a spirit, would be the root out of which, one day, the Branch of Life was to grow.

This period of David's life has something extraordinarily attractive to our human feeling. It reads, in fact, like a novel: it is so full of plot and adventure. Yet we feel, from the quiet tone of its composition, the sobriety of its style, and the ingenious simplicity of its descriptions, that the narrative is no fiction, but plain fact. It is the history of that portion of David's life which, but for the sacredness of its character, we might be tempted to call his romantic period. Though it was really now that the foundation of his intellectual and religious development was laid, yet, to the casual looker-on, the development of his bodily capacities and natural talents appears in the foreground. Buoyant with youthful strength and enthusiasm, the hero reaches his full growth, displaying a splendour of knightly prowess and nobility such as the middle ages, even in its highest blossoming-time, cannot cope with. Those days of friendship and love engross all our thoughts and feelings when reading David's life in our youth. In later days we see him placed in circumstances where we can only follow him at a distance. Here, however, we think we could have taken our place by his side, feeling as he feels, thinking as he thinks; for this period contains nothing but what corresponds with our own experiences as friends and brothers, as strugglers through life's difficulties. Hence the truly beneficial effect which the study of David's life has upon the formation of our moral and religious character. We witness a human being subject to like passions as we are, and at the same time rising above them, and walking with God. This example, while rendering null the pretexts of our faint-heartedness and worldly-mindedness, strengthens our faith and excites our energy as soldiers of Christ. It could never have that effect if this period of David's life savoured in the slightest of what was mythical and unreal. The veracity and inspiration of the Bible are, perhaps, nowhere more evident than here. Notwithstanding that there is so much opportunity, and indeed temptation, to throw a sort of mythical halo round the head of a hero, the penman keeps entirely clear of all such fabulous exaggerations as characterise the early historical records of all other nations, rendering them richer in amusing poetry than in moral influence.

The times at which David came to the throne required a ruler who to the strength of a young man added the experience of a hero trained and strengthened in the school of adversity. With the death of Saul and Jonathan the throne became vacant, and the tribe of Judah felt no hesitation in acknowledging their much-respected kinsman, from whose sceptre they expected happier days than they had enjoyed under that of his deceased enemy. It was no easy matter, however, to take in hand the reins of such a government. There was war without and discord within. The battle in which Saul lost his life was a dreadful calamity to Israel, which seemed to lie in helpless exhaustion at the feet of its conquerors. Besides, the social condition of the people was very low. The incessant wars with the neighbouring Philistines had not only prevented the development of the national life, but also in such a measure drained the natural resources that industry was at a stand-still. Only a few years before this there was not a single smith to be found in the realm who was able to make a sword or a spear. A regular military organisation, without which nothing beyond a state of semi-barbarism is realizable, was not possible in such circumstances. Fortunately David possessed, in the men who had been his stanch companions in his troubles, a well-trained and exercised body of warriors, who could form the basis for a regular army. At their head were the three sons of Zeruiah, and the mighty but violent Joab. In these men he possessed a strong arm with which to fight his enemies abroad. But the greater their power and influence, the more wisdom and prudence were required on David's part, to keep them harmless in the country itself. A powerful party still supported the cause of Saul, and were opposed to a king of the tribe of Judah. Ish-bosheth, Saul's son, was chosen king of the northern tribes, while David ruled only over the tribe of Judah at Hebron. The opposition king was an insignificant man; but he had a strong supporter in his late father's gallant field-marshal, Abner. Had David followed the advice of the sons of Zeruiah, he would have waged war with Ish-bosheth, and perhaps have conquered him. But by going to war he would, most likely, have estranged the people from his person, and never have gained their affections again. If he was to become king of the whole kingdom, he thought it was God that should make him so. He wished no throne founded in his brother's blood. So the two kingdoms continued for seven years; not in public war, it is true, but yet not in peace and friendship.

At length this unpleasant, and in many respects injurious, state of things was brought to an end. Two scoundrels murdered Ish-bosheth, and Joab murdered Abner. It was now shown how limited David's power really was, and how much circumspection he had to apply to prevent the outbreak of a civil war. Though with all his heart detesting and condemning the murder of the noble Abner, yet he did not punish the guilty Joab. "I am this day weak," he said, "though anointed king; and these men, the sons of Zeruiah, are too hard for me. The Lord shall reward the doer of evil according to his wickedness." Scripture does not comment upon this act of David. From affection towards his person we are prone to look upon it as an evidence of his wisdom and prudence. Still we should perhaps be more correct if we looked upon it as an evidence of what might be called the weak point in his character, to which the greater part of his troubles in later life may be traced back—I mean his want of a sense of justice and righteousness, strong enough to make him sternly look his friends in the face when they were doing wrong.

Not that he was void of a sense of righteousness. He manifested that very strongly on several occasions, when a traitor or an oppressor was to be punished. But it seems that when such passions as friendship and love came into play, he was not always able to resist the pressure of misguiding good-nature or of uncontrolled self-indulgence. No doubt the man who, after having heard Nathan's parable of the poor man's lamb, thus gives vent to his feeling of indignation, "As the Lord liveth, the man that hath done this thing shall surely die," displays, at the moment, a strong sense of justice. But if that sense of justice had been as strong as it ought to have been, and as it has often manifested itself in other characters, he would not possibly have been able, deliberately and in cold blood, to order Uriah to be killed. It appears indeed that, owing to his habit of conniving at the misbehaviour of his friends and favourites, jurisdiction was rather imperfect under his reign. It must have been so before Absolom, when trying to steal the hearts of the people, could promise to settle their matters, since "there was no man deputed of the king to hear them." Nor does the glance which Scripture allows us to cast into David's family life give us the impression that the spirit in which his children were trained was as compatible with justice as it was with love.

We should be unjust, however, if we judged a man who lived in the shadow of the law of Moses by the light in which we are now enabled to live. David knew what was said "by them of old time," but he never saw in the flesh Him who had the authority of placing his "But I say unto you" above their precepts. We should be unreasonable if we expected of him a purity of moral sense such as can only be observed in those living under the full light of Christian revelation. Accustomed as we are to look upon David as the author of those psalms which present to the Church of God a treasure of knowledge which even the most advanced in Christian wisdom and experience cannot exhaust, we are apt to suppose that he also in his moral development must have reached a height which placed him at least upon a level with the most morally-developed Christian. History, however, relates facts of David's life which testify to the contrary. Nor is this to be marvelled at, if we bear in mind the important truth that, under the Old Testament dispensation, a man's prophetical gifts were not at all a just standard by which to measure the height of his moral development, or even the extent of his spiritual knowledge. As to the latter, the Apostle Peter distinctly tells us that the prophets, after having uttered their prophecies under the temporary inspiration of the Holy Ghost, had themselves to inquire and to search what the Spirit of Christ, which was in them, did signify (1 Peter i. 10, 11). So we must believe that David has in his psalms uttered many a sentence the meaning of which was as obscure to him as it is clear now to us. There may also in the same psalms occur sentences which, by the prophetic light of the Spirit, describe a purity of moral perception characterizing a future dispensation, but which yet went far beyond David's own personal moral sphere, and were altogether strange to the dispensation in which he lived. Not to speak of the number of his wives and concubines, I will only point to this fact, that the same man who in Ps. v. 6, is assured that God "shall destroy them that speak leasing," spoke a lie to the priest Abimelech at Nob, when telling him that he was journeying on business for Saul. Nor does it seem that his conscience ever reproached him on account of that trespass; for it was even on the occasion of his having "changed his behaviour before Abimelech," that he wrote the 34th Psalm, in which, it is true, he exhorts others "to keep their tongue from evil, and their lips from speaking guile" (ver. 13), but utters not one word of repentance for having transgressed that commandment himself. It appears from this, that he did not look upon his then behaviour as a transgression against the moral law. On the contrary, he describes himself in the 4th and 6th verses as a man who at that moment "sought the Lord," and "cried unto the Lord," so that He "heard him, and saved him out of all his troubles."

David's subsequent behaviour at the Court of king

Achish at Gath, where he feigned himself to be a lunatic, and the double-tongued way in which he dealt with that king afterwards at Ziklag, also show that, according to his standard of morality, such words as "guile and leasing" must have had a more limited signification than we believe the Gospel allows. We must agree that, taking into account the low level of civilisation on which his age stood, David was indeed foremost among his cotemporaries. Not long before his time the people had been delivered up to a complete state of anarchy: "There was no king in those days in Israel, and every man did that which was right in his own eyes" (Judges xvii. 6). Saul's government, which succeeded to this state of confusion, had not contributed much towards improving the moral condition of the people. In such a state of things, a man like David—who, as he tells us in the 51st Psalm, could with tears bewail his adultery and murder, and who revered the servants of God, who served no other God but Jehovah, and kept his oaths most conscientiously, who honoured his parents (during the days of his persecutions he brought them in safety to the land of Moab), and who sacrificed everything for the maintenance of religion—was, in a moral sense, from his shoulders upward, higher than any of the people.

But excellent as was David's moral character for the time in which he lived, it was not merely that moral character which made him "a man after God's heart." Even supposing his moral conduct had been as irreproachable as that of the young man who could say to Christ: "All these things have I kept from my youth up" (Matt. xix. 20), he never would have occupied such a high place among the Old Testament saints had not a higher motive than what we understand by a pure moral principle animated him. It was the decidedly pious, God-seeking and God-honouring disposition of his heart, which made him the true David—the beloved of the Lord. It was his faith in Jehovah, as the only God of heaven and earth, as the only source of salvation, happiness, and blessing. It is true he was a sinner like all of us, but he thereby became exactly one of the strongest proofs for the truth, without which we all of us should be lost, that a man may be a friend, a beloved one of God, though a sinner. In his life it is very clearly brought out that two men may deserve the name of sinner, and that they may yet differ like day and night as to the disposition of their heart. Saul and David both often transgressed the law of God, and, according to the standard of human judgment, David was perhaps even more guilty than Saul. But Saul fled with his sins away from God, proudly to retain them as his own; while David with his sins took refuge with God, in order to have them taken away. Both to Saul and to David sin was a temporary source of pleasure; but to David that pleasure soon changed itself into grief. Thus even his sins brought out all the clearer that the key-note of his soul was a thirst after holiness, a perfect peace of the heart through union with the Holy One of Israel. This "thirsting after God" characterised him throughout his whole life. We observe it in him from the first moment we make his acquaintance. It was because the Lord "looketh on the heart" that the young shepherd was preferred above his brethren. And no wonder. That young shepherd, when following the sheep, found his delight in tuning his harp to the praise of his God. It was not the prospect of being praised by the people, and rewarded by the king, that prompted him to take up his sling against Goliath, but his burning zeal for the honour of the God of Israel, whose holy name he had heard reviled. Thus as love to his God directed his enmity (Ps. cxxxix. 21), so it also guided his friendship. Had Jonathan not loved the Lord as he loved him, David would never have pressed him to his bosom. Accordingly, when his enemies had become so many that they "would daily swallow him up," it is in his God that he puts his trust (Ps. lvi. 2-4); and when his friends forsake him, it is in his God that he "encourages himself" (1 Sam. xxx. 6). To him God is his life's beginning and end, the only true foundation and rock. When he breaks out into exultation, it is because he knows himself near to Him, and when he pours out his heart in doleful lamentations, it is because he feels that his sins have made a separation between that God and his soul.

No wonder that such a man should have proved an instrument in the hand of the Holy Spirit to describe the person and character of the promised Messiah, in such a manner as no other prophet approached unto. No other prophet, Isaiah not excepted, pictures to us the inward life of the Saviour with that careful minuteness and tenderness of colouring, which makes many a psalm of David little else than a photograph of our Lord's experiences in the various stages of his life. Isaiah also describes our Lord's sufferings; but we have only to put the 53rd of Isaiah in juxtaposition with the 22nd Psalm, to notice at once the difference between these two unparalleled prophetic pictures. Isaiah chiefly depicts the sufferings in their outward form: he describes how the Lord was despised and rejected of men; how He was wounded and bruised, slain and buried; but he leaves it to the reader's imagination to picture out what the soul of Christ must have suffered. The whole of that prophecy is, in fact, like a vision, for the prophet, all through the chapter, speaks in the third person of the Holy Sufferer, whose wounded and bruised image is, as it were, before his eyes. So he has only to paint what he beholds. But the 22nd Psalm is no vision. Nor could most of the sufferings which are here described be so seen. They are invisible sufferings, mental agonies, excruciating torments of the inner man, which could not possibly be brought before another man by means of visible emblems. The man who is to describe such sufferings must, in some measure at least, have felt and experienced them; he must, to some extent, have known what it is to be "forsaken by God;" what it is to be in such a state of horror as to cry out, "My heart is like wax, it is melted in the midst of my bowels." Still more so is this true where the mental sufferings of our adorable Substitute are described, as is the case in the 38th Psalm. These sufferings could never have been depicted so truly except by a man who had himself in some measure felt the unspeakable grief which a God-loving soul feels when, burdened with the guilt of sin, it finds itself in the presence of that holy and just God, and experiences, not only outward tribulation, but also that inward anguish which comes of an awakened conscience. Now, what we know of David's life and experience gives us ground for looking upon him as a man who, so far as it was possible for a sinful man, on the one hand resembled Christ in his unquestionable love to God, and on the other resembled Him as a sufferer under the persecutions of wicked men, and also as a sufferer under the soul-crushing burden of sin. It is true, in David's case it was the burden of his own sins he bore, whereas in the case of Christ it was the burden of others' sins which was felt. It may be somewhat inconceivable to our limited understanding, but if we believe that Christ really suffered in our stead as our true substitute, we must also believe that He as really felt the painful effects of our sins upon his soul as we know He felt them upon his body. The fact that Christ, when hanging on the cross, took David's Eli, Eli, lama sabachthani on his lips, places this truth beyond any doubt. On an immensely greater scale, and with immensely greater intensity, his soul must have felt itself in a position similar to that in which David's soul was when he wrote these words. But likewise must David, when writing them, have felt himself in a state of mind similar to that of Christ, though of course in an immensely narrower compass and weaker degree. It is owing to this identity between the person of David and that of Christ that the former could write in the first person while at the same time he was speaking of the latter. When exclaiming (Ps. xxxviii. 8), "I am feeble and sore broken: I have roared by reason of the disquietness of my heart," &c., he is describing his own personal suffering, but at the same time the future suffering of his great Son, whose sufferings stood to his in the same proportion as the boundless ocean stands to one of its constituent drops. But as these descriptions were not merely issuing from an impulse of David's own will (for "the prophecy came not in old time by the will of man," 2 Pet. i. 21), but from the moving influence of the Holy Ghost, the drop often swelled to David's mind as if essaying to take in the whole ocean. In other words, David's feelings and perceptions were often so extended and intensified under the agency of the Spirit as to render it evident to the enlightened reader, that One greater than David is speaking through him. Hence, his psalms abound with expressions which are evidently too strong to be understood only of his own experiences. These expressions must have so looked to himself, when he read them after the inspiration had subsided, and his mind had returned to something of its ordinary state. They then, certainly, constituted that portion of his writings which caused him to inquire and to search diligently what the Spirit that was in him did signify, when it testified beforehand the sufferings of Christ. In these hallowed inquiries he must especially have been engaged when reading those expressions in his psalms, in which he describes his faith and hope in the future glory.

As David was identified with Christ in his suffering, so he was in his hoping and believing. It was the same God on whom he relied as Christ put his trust in; and the glory which he looked forward to was the same which was constantly before the eyes of Christ. What he believed and hoped was, so to speak, a microscopic photograph of the faith and hope of Jesus. Here again the Holy Spirit often caused him, when writing down his psalms, to expand his inspired imagination beyond himself, and to burst through the limits of his own experiences into those of his divine Antitype. Undoubtedly he always believed that one day he would rise again from the dead; but he never could have believed that he would not suffer corruption. Yet, while expressing his faith that God would not leave his soul in hell, he at the same time exults in the prospect that God will not suffer his Holy One to see corruption. We have the authority of the Apostle Peter (Acts ii. 29-31) for our belief that David, through speaking in the first person, "spake of the resurrection of Christ, that his soul was not left in hell, neither his flesh did see corruption." This is a clear instance of the unity, and at the same time of the difference, that existed between David and Christ. There is much in these expressions which David could apply to himself. Certainly, God would not leave his soul in hell, i. e., in the Hades. Nay, he could feel assured that one day he would rise with an incorruptible body out of the pit of corruption. Still, the expressions, as they were written there before his eyes, were too strong to be exclusively applicable to himself. He has seen corruption, and he knew he would see it. But he also knew that God had sworn with an oath to him, that of the fruits of his loins according to the flesh He would raise up Christ to sit on his throne. So he must have come to the conclusion, that at least one part of that prophecy was only applicable to that great Fruit of his loins. "Seeing this before," the Apostle says, "he spoke of the resurrection of Christ."

To those who are able to compare spiritual things with spiritual, David may be said to be the Christ of the Old Testament and Christ the David of the New. The more we study the life and person of the one, the more we shall be able to understand the person and life of the other.

JOHN DE LIEFDE.

WHEN OUR CHILDREN ARE ABOUT US.

"Come to me, O ye children!
For I hear you at your play,
And the questions that perplexed me
Have vanished quite away.

"What are all our contrivings,
And the wisdom of our books,
When compared with your caresses,
And the gladness of your looks?

"Ye are better than all the ballads
That ever were sung or said;
For ye are the living poems,
And all the rest are dead."

Long ago, in the dawn of the world's history, in a distant country, there lived a man who had once been prosperous, happy, respected, in a very high degree; but who, all at once, fell into great poverty and trouble. He lost all his property, all his children, and well-nigh his own life. He stood one day, or sat on the ground, bemoaning himself among his friends, recalling with a fond sadness vanished scenes, and bygone years. He talked much and long—as men are apt to talk, in hours of confidence, with listening friends about them—of what he had been and done in other days. It is a melancholy tale of departed glory—a dirge such as, happily, very few men can sing over their own life. We listen the more eagerly to his wailing, because the sorrow is so vast and so exceptional. He mourns like a king discrowned and exiled. He lights up for us in the melancholy reminiscence, the palaces of pleasure that had been darkened, and the high walks of honour and usefulness he has now ceased to tread. He speaks of a "secret" once with him, now lost: of "a candle" which once shone in his tabernacle, but which now burns no more: of a Divine "presence" sheltering, sufficing, which then "preserved" him, but from which he seems now cast out. Then ran the oil out of the rock for his anointing: then butter washed his steps. When he went, in those days, to the gate of the city, there was reverence: when he took his seat in the street there were the tokens of a universal regard—young men standing aside, aged men rising up, princes keeping silence. As he moved about from place to place the air became vocal with benedictions—the poor, the fatherless, and the widow joining in sweet chorus to his praise,—and so on through the multiform aspects of a prosperity now withered and dead like autumn leaves. Who can but listen when so great a mourner speaks? Who can fail to sympathise with him in reverses so entire and desolating?

"But probably he has some chief comforts remaining. His children will be about him, to soothe his griefs, and beguile the sense of his losses. They—young and fresh—will stay their father in his great need, and ere long they will make life green about him again." Ah, no! This touches the tenderest point in all his sorrow. He takes up their names also into his lament. He tells us that they are all gone; and he secures, as he could in no other way, the freshest and homeliest sympathy of every true father and mother in the world, just by one short, thrilling note in his long, sad dirge of grief—"When my children were about me!" Is not that the tenderest touch of all? Does it not take us in a moment to our own homes, and back along the line of past years, and away to churchyards far and near, and up to heaven? Let us linger for a little on an expression so full of suggestiveness, and—not forgetting the Patriarch who gives us the seed for our thought—let us apply his words in different ways to ourselves.

I.

When our children are children, we should really have them "about us." Job's children (for by this time we all know that he is the mourner) were "about him" in the days of his prosperity. I do not know that we should be justified in supposing that he had his children in much closer personal association with him than was usual with godly parents of the time. It is certainly worthy of notice that they are named particularly at the opening and the ending of the book. We are told the number of his sons, and the names of his daughters. He tells us, too, how "fair" they were, and we seem to see the sheen of their Arabian beauty. He tells us of "sons" and of "sons' sons" even to "four generations." He "saw" them all. We feel that he took delight in seeing them, in having them "about him," when he was a young father, and when he was an old Patriarch.

The highest and godliest nurture still is that which keeps the children beside the parents through the earlier years of life, in the fresh formative time, when there are beginnings of things that will never end. When the little birds are in the nest the parent birds are seldom far or long away. The human instinct prompting to love, and care, and nourishment, ought to be as strong. It usually is for a while. But in many cases only for a while, a little while. Many things arise to interrupt the continuity, and impair the energy of parental presence and influence by that presence, with children. Many things—some of them without our will, some of them directly the fruit of our will or state.

The occupations of life with capable men and women are numerous, engrossing, and very exhausting. So that even a loving father, who is toiling for his children all day long, coming home spent at night, is not sorry to find that his children are two stories nearer heaven than he, and that he is not likely to see any more of them for the day. In the morning he must "take time by the forelock," and business by its opportunities, and men as he can find them;—he has no leisure for the children. So comes and goes many a precious day in which little hearts are forming themselves, and little lives are taking shape in character, thoughts growing into principles, feelings becoming settled emotions—all without so much as there might be of that calm and great thing—a parent's presence. Such a man has his children in his house, but he has not got them "about him." Nobody in the world would think of them as neglected children. All the neighbourhood knows them to be as clean as the morning and as fresh as the rose. The only pity is that father, and perhaps mother too, do not see so much as they should do of the beauty of the growing—do not catch the morning and evening and noonday fragrance of their own children, and do not shed on them more of that sweet and priceless element in a child's education—a parent's present care and love, so that the beauty may not fade, so that the fragrance may not die.

The child's education in many cases, surely in too many, brings on an early separation from home and parental presence. It is found not to be convenient, or judged not desirable, to have home and school together—going to school in the morning, coming home at night. But it seems to me, that where that is at all possible, it is by much the best arrangement for at least the earlier years of youth. Undoubtedly absence from home has its own advantages to the young. The power of such absence is sometimes wonderful, in developing character, increasing self-reliance, vivifying early memories, endearing the home from which absence is something of a daily banishment. But if that absence comes too soon, the probability will be so much less that the young scholar has in him the germs of right character to be developed; the youthful memories will be the fewer; the resistance to temptation will be the less; and the moral result of the whole more doubtful. It is God's way that the children, while young, should be "about" the parents. That was the way in the olden time. Happily it has been the way down through all time. It has ripened the richest fruits of goodness in human character. It has made the noblest men and women. Still it will be found, in all but exceptional cases, that home—be it ten[illegible] in all but except[illegible] of the city—and daily presence of father and mother—be they of high or low degree—are more for the child than any other persons or things that can be substituted. They are great days for after meaning, and far-off power and influence, the days when "our children are about us."

II.

When our children are about us, we should consider with Job that we are prosperous. We have at least this element of prosperity although the rest may be wanting, or may not be in such fullness as the Patriarch possessed them. The rivers of oil do not flow for you, perhaps. The city streets do not give reverence. No one refrains talking because you are present. You are very *un*like Job in some of these outward respects. But you are like him at least in this, that "your children are about you." And because they are yours, they are as much to you as his ever were to him. Perhaps you have one as bright as his Jemima (although Jemima was not born when he spoke thus, and the children mentioned here were all dead and gone), as bright as Jemima (the day); one as fragrant as Kezia (cassia), shedding perfume through the house; or one as plentiful in goodness as Keren-Happuch. You know what your children are; strangers do not. Nothing is more common in society than pleasantries about the partialities of parents; but perhaps few pleasantries have in general less foundation. That there are parents who can see no faults in their children, although these faults are patent to every one else, and who therefore allow them to grow up self-willed, rude, a nuisance to all about them, is unfortunately true. Such parents generally have, soon or late, in these very children, full punishment of their own blindness. But we are persuaded that the case in general is rather this,—that what strangers or unobservant neighbours would hastily call a parent's partiality, is really only a feeling produced, or a course of conduct drawn out by a parent's better knowledge. Only those who are in close relations with children can tell what they are. How they are tempted! How they struggle! How they overcome! How they do their noble acts, and also sink into their own little meannesses occasionally among the toys! in the playground! with their lessons! How shall a stranger or a friend presume to conclude that your boy is rude because he is salient? As well call the clematis rude that will climb over the wall; or the little burn that will have its leaps before it is quenched in the silent river. How shall he say that your girl is forward, because she is frank; or stupid, because she is shy? He had better be careful and not quite so sure. Children are great mysteries. Friends do not understand them. Teachers do not understand them. Theorists do not understand them. Foot rule experience will never measure them. Nor can the parental experiences of by-gone times serve much for living parents and children. Each child is a new problem to be solved. Each child is "a new thing under the sun"—the only new thing there is. All else is old. Matter is as old as creation; spirits are as new as the moment of time, or the creative inspiration of God from which they were born. Each child comes into the world charged with a manifold life, gifted and dowered with faculties, forces, laws, affections, sublime possibilities. A child is a great mystery, as yet unrevealed to any; but the nearest approach to an understanding of the mystery is just that thing which is called slightingly "a parent's partiality." No doubt there is the instinctive feeling which accounts for much. But there is also the better knowledge.

The children are about us, thus, as a part of our prosperity. So regard them. So enjoy them. Take heed that the affection, which we justify, is not merely human, but divine. Put them where this now childless man puts his, in the vivid but mournful picture he draws of his vanished joys, in divine presence in the house—"the Almighty with you, your children about you!" "Lo the children are an heritage from the Lord, and the fruit of the womb is his reward." The blessing of the Lord is making you rich—rich indeed if you have "the secret," if you have "the children."

Children are not only a blessing, they are also a trouble and a care, and many parents dwell mostly on that side of the children. They see them through the shadows of the cares they have about them. They are vexed with their thoughtlessness. They are wearied many a time, as they well may be, with all the toilsome and ceaseless attentions they require. They are discouraged by their little naughty ways. "Let us pass over to the other side," and see them in the light of the land from which they came, and to which, by God's help, we may lead them back. Look at the glory on their faces. See the sweet blossomings of better things, which may indeed be nipt, but which may also ripen, and all the more surely if you will think so, to richest fruit. Looking thus upon them from the side where "their angels" see them, "who do always behold the face of Our Father in heaven," you will forget the toil, and the worry, and the care; you will not remember against them former transgressions; you will forgive them all their sins; you will bring them up with you as into the old patriarch's tent, as into Jacob's Bethel; you will present them all, "the infant of days" included, before the Lord. And as a prosperous man or woman, as one whom the Lord hath blessed, you will say over the old words: "When the Almighty is with me! when my children are about me!"

III.

When our children are about us, we should tend them very carefully, and train them up in the way they should go, that when they are old they may not depart from it. Everything else that constitutes any considerable part of a man's prosperity, requires to be kept and nourished—his house, his pictures, his garden, his fields, his money, his friendships, his position in life, his character, all need watching and nourishing continually. Let him play the sluggard with any of them and they are so far lost. For they are parts of a world that "never continueth in one stay." It is eminently so with the children. We lose them every day even when we have them, if we do not keep them as a man keeps his treasure. They can only be kept by training, growth, development. They are houses—little "banqueting houses"—where our loves and hopes have sweetest entertainment. But if they are not kept, you will soon see the weather-stain, the gaping rent, the incipient decay. If the house is to wear and retain "the similitude of a palace," it must be "polished" day by day. They are little pictures, fairer than human hand ever painted, in which the gazing eye will find far depths, rich colourings, the endless play of light and shadow, the mantling of the individual expression, and a living beauty through the whole that cannot be described. But as the most valuable pictures grow vile with blots when hung within touch of the rude and careless, or hideous with cobwebs and dust when left in a deserted room, so those sweet living pictures soon catch the stains of rude commerce and careless society, when too much exposed to them; soon darken and degenerate if they are but neglected. They are gardens, fairer and more fragrant than Solomon's, in which he "planted trees of all kinds of fruit." But you will soon see the weed, the wildness, the overgrowth, if you do not dig, and cut, and bend, and train, and water. It is instructive that the best flowers and plants of the garden are mostly the ultimate forms and products of far simpler and wilder things. The beauty and the fruitfulness, the deeper colouring, the double blossoming, the affluent size, the luscious flavour—these are all refinements and elaborations of skill and taste. Well, a family is just a garden of God, where are those living immortal plants called children (who all have something of the wildness of nature in them), and by gracious help we are to nurture and raise them up into the finer and nobler forms of grace. We are to labour until we have them so that we can ask our best "Beloved" to "come into his garden to eat his pleasant fruits." If a garden be too fine an emblem for all conditions of human life, take the plainer emblem of the field. How beautiful and how bountiful is a harvest field when the corn is yellow-ripe, and the glad farmer walks behind the long row of reapers and watches the busy sickle and the falling swath! But what ploughing was in that field long ago, when the day was short and the snow was falling! What harrowing of the clods amid the chill spring showers! What plentiful sowing during seed-time! What anxious watching days when the weather was fitful! Now, "when the children are about us," is the time for the ploughing, and the harrowing, and the sowing, and the watching. By and by "cometh harvest," bringing over-payment of all toil, presaging the richer garnerage of heaven.

All Christain training is summed up in this: "Bring them up in the nurture and admonition of the Lord." This general exhortation has so many parts in it that we cannot even name them. But these are some.

Look to the health of the body, for that is the basis in this world of other things. No studies or accomplishments should be allowed to injure that; for that, when injured, will affect injuriously all the higher things.

Consider, as far as may be, the temperament and peculiarity of each. There is a divine individualism of each soul, before which, when we find it, we should bow down as in the presence of a pure work of God, and to which we should yield as we do to the great steady laws.

Give the mind knowledge of proper kinds, in due measures, at seasonable times.

Develop the affections, truly and tenderly, under the leadings and breathings of the royal law of love.

Try to put habits into the life of industry, carefulness, and benevolence, from the very first, that the powers may work by these more easily.

Provide for times of recoil and relaxation. Never be afraid of play—of what even might seem idleness to another if you are sure that it is wholesome rest. When are children to learn to think, how are they to get the love of prayer, if they have not their little spaces of quietness allowed them like others? Some of them I fancy have no great affection for "the little busy bee" that is always brought humming about their heads as a teacher. They will be apt to like the owl quite as well, which does nothing but look as he sits up on the tree, hooting at the silent night. But the bee herself is as idle and luxurious as any creature can be, for more than half the year. Let the bee be a winter teacher as well as a summer one, and join relaxation to activity.

Above all, try to secure the whole heart for God. Everything must bend to that. The whole manifold culture should grow up into that. Throw around them, as you may instrumentally, so much of the Fatherhood of God, that they shall not be able without a tremendous and distressing struggle to leave it, and when at last away from it shall not be able to live without it. Let them know, without mistake, from your own lips, in face-to-face communication, that the good Shepherd loves them, is watching them with kindly care, is calling them by name, and waiting for their following. When they follow Him, you may sing in gladness and thankfulness of heart. You may consider that God has given you plentiful harvest.

IV.

"When our children are about us," we should be careful, not only to teach but to learn the lessons which they can teach us. Children teach lessons which are taught in no other school than the one they keep; or at any rate in no other so well. They are Professors in Christ's College. He gives to each, a chair; and although their audience sometimes is but scant, and their prelections little heeded, they go on teaching still. Since the day when that little child, unknown by name to the world, in fame immortal, stood up in the centre of the eager group at the Saviour's bidding, and by his ingenuousness and simplicity gave his lecture to Disciples, Apostles, Pharisees, Fathers and Mothers, and all beholders, the children have been teaching in the kingdom; and they will teach until the last returning sinner enters as a little child into the kingdom of heaven.

They teach faith. What believers they are! They hardly ever doubt. How they trust your word, your wisdom, your strength, your love, as soon as you give them the least occasion. Your little boy or girl would cling to you in utter simple trust, and lie in your arms a little believer, if you stepped from the Table Rock at Niagara, or from a vessel's side into the sea.

They teach contentment. For they are pleased with simple pleasures. They are happy when the sun shines; and if the day is dark, they can find happiness under the clouds. They have not "learned" as yet, "in whatsoever state they are, therewith to be content." But they are content if the outward conditions of life are tolerably pleasant. They have no remembrance of the sorrows of yesterday, no apprehension of the tears of to-morrow.

They teach humility, for they do not "exercise themselves in great matters, or in things too high for them." Their plans are short and small. If they misgive—well. Never mind, they can build again. There is plenty of sand on the shore.

Ah, how well were it if we could learn from them in these respects! There is a whole group of virtues which our children, while yet they are about us, are teaching us, whether we are learning them or not. It is beautiful, and yet sad, to see the children teaching when the parents and others are not learning. The parents perhaps have their plans of social ambition, and are striving hard to rise. The children are content if the sun is bright, if grass is green, if flowers are pretty, if bread is sweet and water cool, if the floor is firm enough to walk upon, and the bed is soft enough for sleep. The parents have their cares and their fears lest they should have to go downward in the social scale. Because they are a little poorer than once, they are going to lose some of their friends. (What worthy friends they must be! and oh, what a sorrowful pity to lose them!) Or, they are going into a smaller house, because, perhaps, they do not any longer need the larger, or because it is now a little above their circumstances. They will go away sometimes into another neighbourhood, just that they may go down that little incline unseen. "The children" all this time would take any friends that were pleasant—cottagers' children, workmen's children, would do quite well. A few hours would suffice to begin a real friendship. They would go to any house that sheltered them, and be pleased with the little rooms as a nice change from the larger. Nay, they would go with you if you had not a house to go to at all. They would wander with you, cheerily enough, along country lanes, and beside hedgerows and old walls. They would sleep with you by hay-ricks and in harvest fields, or under the shelter of the trees, soothed and rocked to rest, unless the weather were too chill, by the music of the pines, and pleased by the new lamplight of the stars.

If it be said that a good deal of such contentment is the result of sheer ignorance, and therefore cannot be seriously proposed to reasonable persons for their instruction or imitation, a good answer is, that the cares and anxieties of grown-up people are largely the fruit of mere imagination and mistake. They conjure up difficulties which have no real existence; they fear evils that never come; they are poor often in imaginary poverty; sick with pains they never feel; dark when the sun is shining; dying and dead a hundred times before the real dying and the one only death "appointed" come. Surely, therefore, it were well if the care-furrowed faces of father and mother could in any way catch at least a little of the smoothness and openness and "sufficient unto the day" look, of their "children when they are about them."

V.

When our children are about us, we should anticipate the time when, as in the case of the Patriarch, they will all be away.

"How the children leave us, and no traces Linger of that smiling angel-band—
Gone! For ever gone, and in their places
Weary men and anxious women stand."

Watch, and within the brief circuit of a year, sometimes even in the course of a few months, you will see a change in the little faces. Take photographs of them, and if you happen to lay them by for a few years, and then open the book, you will have a surprise. You will have something like the feeling—"Why, I have lost these children. Surely they have gone from me. Has God taken them?" No. They are "about" you still. They are beside you now, looking at the pictures, much amused that they should be pictures of themselves. They can see no resemblance to the image they see every day in the glass. So they vanish from us, even when they live, and we see them no more. The infant is the infant but for a little. The little girl with the ringlets is a wayfarer who is tarrying with you only for a night. She will go on again in the morning towards womanhood. And the sunny boy will keep her company on the way to his manhood. Very soon now you will see touches of the manhood and the womanhood on their faces. Then will come their loves, their marriages, their cares, their children—and you will be grandfather and grandmother before you know. Many are taking these honours continually while yet they are not old. Their children conspire to crown them without their leave, although, generally, much to their delight. Then a few years more, and your children's children will leave you as they shoot up into men and women. You will have to reach across two generations then to find the children.

Nor can we forget that there are always some who far outstrip the rest—who do not glide away on feet along the earthly ways, but who have wings woven in silence on which they fly up to the fields of heaven. We have spoken of the facial change as children grow to be men and women: but there is another change which sometimes comes on a young face, which betokens a growth quite out of this world, and a putting on of the beauty and glory of another. A change this, sad at first to see, sorrowful exceedingly to our earthly affections. Yet a change growing more and more fair to look on, a rebuke to our sorrow, a life-long memory to our love.

"Have we not caught that smiling
On some beloved face,
As if some heavenly sound were wiling
The soul from our earthly place:
The distant sound and sweet,
Of the Master's coming feet.

"We may clasp the loved one faster,
And plead for a little while;
But who can resist the Master?
And we read, by that brightening smile,
That the tread we do not hear
Is drawing surely near.

"Then, gently enters the Master;
Through the room his garments sweep,
And our trembling hearts beat faster,
And our eyes forget to weep:
For now, we can hear Him say,
'Thou shalt be there to-day.'"

And so we lose them. And many a Job stands amid the relics of the past, looking back, and plaintively or thankfully recalling the days when the children were about him. Well, but look forward. Antedate the time. Anticipate the inevitable severance, and work for the formation of the deeper, the immortal union. If you have wealth—heart property—in these children, as children, know it now; for the riches will "make to themselves wings, and flee away." If you have nurture to give them, suitable to their tenderness, preparation for their strength, give it now; in a little while they will be too hard and strong in nature's growth to take it. If there are lessons which the Master would have you learn of them while they are yet young, and which they cannot teach, nor you learn of them when they are older, then learn the lessons now, for soon the little faces will be seen no more at your table, the patter of the little feet heard no more in your rooms.

ALEXANDER RALEIGH.

THE THREE BOYS.

I.

THERE dwelt a child in a mountain cave,
Where all was sheltered, and calm, and still,
And a tranquil lake on its slumbering wave
Mirrored the form of each fir-clad hill.
Wild clusters of roses round it grew,
O'er which the breath of the south wind blew;
And spots of greenness in wood or glade
Lay half in the sunshine and half in shade.
That home with an endless peace was blest;
No evil discord might mar its rest;
No fitful tempest-howl was heard,
Nor boding scream of ill-omened bird;
No sound but the music the streamlets make,
And the gentle plash of the rippling lake,
And the thrush's voice from the friendly trees,
And the nightingale's holiest melodies.
No sight but water, and rock, and wood,
All beauties of the field and flood;
And the deep blue sky which bends over all,
Where the stars hold nightly festival,
And the Eastern sun, like a glorious king,
Rides forth in his rare apparelling;
Or, fairer and gentler far than day,
The moon's soft beams on the waters play.

Such was the home of the mountain boy,
And it filled his heart with a solemn joy;
For Nature was there to feed his eye
With all her beauties of form and hue;
And his ear drank in her harmony,
As the thirsty flower drinks the evening dew.

And within was treasured a goodly store
Of volumes filled with a golden lore:
He read of the Truths which in every age
Have flowed from the lips of bard and sage—
And of men—his brothers—the great and brave,
Who were true and fearless, and strong to save.
He would trace from the dawn of the world's first sun
The wondrous course which the ages run;
And as he turned from earth's outward things,
Rose up strange inner questionings:
His spirit searched itself—its eye
Looked out on all life's mystery.
His was all knowledge that draws its birth
From the works of God that are seen on earth;
And yet to him it was also given
To read high truths in the starry heaven.
His soul would pierce to the deep hid springs
Whence flows the tide of all human things,

And from the mountain-summits gaze
Through wreathèd mist and floating haze,
On the central law of the mighty maze.
He yearned, like the wise in the strange far East,
To worship Wisdom as Nature's priest.
Still soaring up from the things of sight
To the higher forms of the world of light,
Till his soul the way to its birth-place won,
Where Beauty, and Order, and Truth are one.

But he dwelt alone; there were none to share
His joys or sorrows, his hope or fear.
No answering heart, and no gentle eye
Told their tale of a human sympathy.
He never had known a father's voice,
He never had looked on a mother's smile;
In no brother's heart could his own rejoice,
No sister's fondness his thoughts beguile.
They had passed away in his life's first hour,
And were to him but as names of power.
His life flowed onward as it began,
Away from the presence and haunts of man.
The passing years of no changes told;
Though he grew in wisdom, his heart was cold.
Knowledge, and Beauty, and Truth were there,
But what could the absence of Love repair?

II.

There are different homes in this world of ours,
And many are noble, and great, and fair;
There are knightly castles, and ladies' bowers,
And courts of kings with their pomp and glare.
But one palace arose in an Eastern land,
More noble and great than all others to see;
You might deem it the work of a fairy hand,
From the trouble and toil of earth set free.

There were marble columns in stately pride,
In long deep avenues, side by side,
And forms of beauty, and emblems fair,
By the graver's cunning were sculptured there;
And the fragrant shrubs that rose between,
With their twinèd foliage, served to screen
From the golden light of a cloudless sky,
The sight which shrank from its brilliancy,
Here, through the length of the gorgeous hall,
Was heard the song of the fountain's fall;
And earliest flowers their odours shed,
Ere yet their life's fresh bloom had fled;
And birds of song from their warbling throats
Poured forth their free and rejoicing notes.

In this home of beauty there dwelt the heir
Of the lordly wealth that was treasured there.
He was young and happy; nor grief nor pain
On his bright clear brow had impressed its stain;
He never had known a desire denied,
Nor had felt the pang of a humbled pride.
There were countless vassals, who strove with awe
To obey the will which to them was law;
All eager and quick, at each word to raise
The pleasant cry of a courtier's praise.
All blessings of home were his—the bliss
Of a father's smile, of a mother's kiss;
And the strong deep love that knows nought of fear,
Of brothers true-hearted, and sisters dear.
So bright was the home of that kingly boy,
You might deem it filled with a priceless joy:
If Riches, and Power, and Pleasure could bless,
His was a perfect happiness.

But he never had known what it was to live,
Nor in what we enjoy, but in what we give.
He had never been taught that his love should spread,
And, like Heaven's own sunshine, on all be shed.
They thought it right that he should not know
The sorrows of men, in their want and woe;
They made his home like a charmèd spot,
Where trouble and suffering entered not;
And hence it was that no grateful poor,
Were gathered in troops round that palace-door;
No prayer of blessing arose to Heaven
For loving aid with a kind heart given.
His home was happy, his joy was free,
One flow of unbroken gaiety;
But, because this was so, he had no part
In the deeper joy of a human heart.

III.

And a third child dwelt in a cheerless room,
Which chilled the heart with its depth of gloom;
In the darkest street of a dreary town,
Where never the light of the sun flowed down,
And the blue of heaven was but faintly seen,
And no fields were there with their freshening green;
No song of birds from o'ershadowing trees,
And no scent of wild flowers on the breeze.
Thick clouds of smoke, and of vapours dim,
Were all the sky that appeared to him;
And all day long in his ears did meet
The vexing sounds of the bustling street.

Long years that boy on his couch had lain,
And his every limb was racked with pain;
On his white thin face was a shadowy gleam,
Like the light of the moon on a woodland stream;
And on wasted form and features pale,
The throbs of anguish had left their trail.
All life long he had known but sorrow,
Nor was his the hope of a brighter morrow;
The pain that began with the infant's breath
Must last till the touch of the Angel, Death.

He never had gazed on the heavens above,
Which tell us tales of a Father's love;
He never had learnt from the stars of night
The wisdom they bring from the worlds of light;
It was much for him, on a summer's day,
If one faint, and feeble, and struggling ray
Could cast the shadows athwart the gloom
That dwelt in that sick child's lonely room.
He never had heard the joyous sea
Peal forth its jubilant melody;
He never had gathered, in wood or glade,
The flowers that lurk in the hedge-row's shade;
Nor shared the vigour of those who breathe
The freshening air of the mountain heath.
One sickly stem of a town-grown flower
Was to him a treasure, which, hour by hour,
He would fondly watch as a token true
From that world of beauty he never knew.
But, 'mid all his sorrow, the boy was calm
As one who has gained a martyr's palm.
As the deep night silence round him flowed,
His heart, like the heart of an angel, glowed;
And the bells that told of the passing time,
Were to him as the everlasting chime.

A white cross hung on that lowly bed,
And when he looked on it, he smiled;
For he thought of the Christ who on it bled,
And that thought all anguish and pain beguiled.
He knew that his Lord, who once for him
Had known the woe, and the darkness dim,
Would help him get to his home above,
The o'ershadowing wings of a Father's love.

So the love that dwelt in his spirit pure
Could all pain and anguish of earth endure;
He only prayed that 'twere his to bear
His witness true of that Father's care.
His prayer was granted; and he could teach,
With a mightier magic than that of speech,
Of those truths of power, and that kingdom blest,
Where his yearning heart found its perfect rest.
Rough world-worn men would sit and learn
From his feeble lips till their heart would burn;

And the thoughts of long-forgotten years
Burst forth anew into cleansing tears.
The laughing children would leave their play
As he taught them how, and to Whom to pray;
And men of knowledge his presence sought,
To be by his patient suffering taught;
For then alone in their hearts they knew
That the hopes they read of were real and true.

Thou hast heard the tale of these children three,
How each was happy in his degree:
The lonely boy to whom wisdom gave
All knowledge that lies on this side the grave;
The joyous boy, who was born to be
The favourite child of luxury;
And the suffering boy, with his life-long pain,
Yet strong in his faith to count it gain—
Now tell me, which of these children three,
Were it thine to choose, thou would'st wish to be?

SPOKEN FROM A CITY PULPIT, ON AN AFTERNOON AT HOME.

"And the sword of the Spirit, which is the Word of God."—Ephes. vi. 17.

Upon another day,* it was my great privilege to speak to you on a subject which should always warm a Christian heart: to speak to you of the "Holy Scriptures, which are able to make wise unto salvation, through faith which is in Christ Jesus." We have seen how "Holy men of God spake as they were moved by the Holy Ghost:" how "All scripture is given by inspiration of God; and is profitable for doctrine, for reproof, for correction, for instruction in righteousness." In my text to-day, you may see our Bibles described in a different way. You find here how St. Paul, telling of the various parts of the Christian soldier's armour, makes mention of "The sword of the Spirit, which is the Word of God." To the like effect is the imagery in a text in the Epistle to the Hebrews; where we read that "The word of God is quick and powerful, and sharper than any two-edged sword: piercing even to the dividing asunder of soul and spirit, and of the joints and marrow; and is a discerner of the thoughts and intents of the heart."

Let me say here, that I do not intend to found my entire discourse upon the imagery suggested in the text: I wish that we may further expatiate over the subject of God's Word, and think of certain matters of special interest and importance at this present day. Yet let us first think of the truth that is particularly set forth in the description of the Word of God as "the sword of the Spirit." And thus thinking, and in all we say and hear, let us pray for the guidance, light, and love, of that Blessed and Divine Being by whose inspiration all Scripture was given at first through the holy men of God that wrote and spake it; and by whose continued agency it is still made efficacious to convert the sinner, and to cheer and build up the saint.

"The sword of the Spirit," says our text, "is the Word of God:" meaning not the sword the Holy Ghost uses himself, but the sword he gives us to use. This sword has been used by our Saviour himself. You all remember how, when Satan assailed Him, our Master foiled him and drove him away for the time, just with this weapon. Here is the story in the best of all words. "Again, the devil taketh Him up into an exceeding high mountain, and showeth him all the kingdoms of the world, and the glory of them; and saith unto Him, all these things will I give thee, if thou fall down and worship me." There, my friends, the tempter made his assault: and we know that he has been too successful in making men do what really comes to falling down and worshipping him,—as all wrong-doing does,—by temptation infinitely less than that. But the sword of the Spirit, which is the Word of God, did, as it were, in that moment flash in his eyes, and disarm and defeat him: for "Then, saith Jesus unto him, Get thee hence, Satan: for it is written, Thou shalt worship the Lord thy God, and Him only shalt thou serve. Then the devil leaveth Him." That home-thrust drove him clean away. And let us, when we are assailed by Satan (and every temptation to think, say, or do wrong may justly be regarded as an assault by Satan or one of his emissaries)—let us defend ourselves with the same weapon which was so effectual in our Saviour's hand: let us defend ourselves with this weapon against all temptation. It is a great thing to have it always at hand: a great thing to have our memory so stored with little texts of Holy Scripture, that just at the right moment one fitted for the occasion may arise, to be a lamp to our feet and a light to our path; to be a sword in our hand that shall pierce and slay the temptation, or put it to flight at least for the time. And indeed we know what a mighty weapon the sword of the Spirit has proved in many exigencies, besides those of personal temptation assailing the believer himself. It has driven away temptation to sin, temptation to doubt God, temptation to run madly and desperately down to ruin,—assailing some other soul. Now, when the devil was trying to make a poor sinful creature despair of God's mercy and Christ's love: when the devil drove such a poor sinner to the wretched mood which burst out in the miserable moan, "It is too late for me,—too late,—I am lost!"—oh what a blow was dealt on that cruel and wicked enemy, by one who had that ready command of the sword of the Spirit as to be able on the instant to say, "Then you are the very man Christ came to save: for the Son of Man is come to seek and to save that which was lost!" Many are the poor despairing souls from which that touch from the sword of the Spirit has sent the great adversary away! Yes, the sword of the Spirit is the Word of God. It is a grand thing to meet temptation with a text of Scripture: not to enter into a negociation with evil in any shape, nor to try to put a different face on what your heart tells you is wrong; nor to consider how near some pleasant wrong thing you can go without entirely abandoning right. Just hold by some plain precept of God's Word, and that will keep you straight. You may not be able to unravel the arguments by which your own sinful heart, or some bad companion, may try to persuade you that it is no great matter to deviate a little from the even path when so much profit or pleasure is to be got by it: but just hold by the Word of God: that never shades away the difference between right and wrong: hold by that, and you are safe. "The wages of sin is death." That puts an end for ever to all vain fancies that any sin is light. Then such a text as "Lie not one to another," makes short work of all proposals to make things pleasant by a little colouring or smoothing down of plain unvarnished fact.

I said, a little ago, that seeing God's Word is the sword with which the Christian can so effectually put down and drive away temptation, it is a great thing to have our memory well stored with precious little sentences of Holy Scripture. It is quite right to say that: we must use diligently all our natural powers. But do not fancy that a retentive memory, or a ready memory, or presence of mind, is the thing that will seasonably bring to remembrance the text of Scripture that is wanted. Neither are you to think that a clear perception of a text's meaning, or a readiness to give it all the consideration due to it, is the thing that will make it effectual to do what is wanted. No, my friends, what is needful to put the sword in your hands at the critical moment, and to make it do its work effectually, is the Blessed Spirit whose sword it is. It is that gracious One, who will bring to our thoughts the text that fits the time; and who will make it, not so many common words, but something quick and powerful, and sharper than any two-edged sword. You remember our Blessed Redeemer's promise, that the Blessed Spirit should be our Remembrancer. "These things have I spoken unto you, being yet present with you. But the Comforter, which is the Holy Ghost, He shall teach you all things, and bring all things to your remembrance, whatsoever I have said unto you!" I will not waste a moment of our little time in showing you that these words, first spoken by our Saviour to his Apostles, convey a promise that it is ours too. But, Christian friends, when in some exigency, some season of temptation or perplexity, or depression and doubt, the well-remembered words flash upon us, or steal gently into our heart, and everything is clear and hopeful, and we are calmed and strengthened and cheered, and feel that the short text is indeed God's message to us, —do not let us think that it is very lucky we thought of the right verse at the right time; do not let us be glad we have so good a memory, nor even stop at being thankful that on Sunday evenings when we were little children we were taught to get these inspired words to repeat to some one who is gone. No, let us look higher; and thank the Holy Spirit of God! And let us humbly ask Him always to suggest to us the message, the warning, the promise, the direction, in the moment we need it: and as we soldiers and servants of the Lord Jesus are assailed by our spiritual foes,—as the world, the flesh, and the devil seek to mislead and destroy our immortal souls,—to put into our hand, in the instant of peril, a weapon proved and mighty;—even "the sword of the Spirit, which is the word of God!"

And now, to go to another matter. How do we know that the Bible is the Word of God? Why do we receive this volume as such: as something quite different from all other books? Here are wise words from the Confession of Faith:

"We may be moved and induced by the testimony of the Church to an high and reverend esteem of the Holy Scripture: and the heavenliness of the matter, the efficacy of the doctrine, the majesty of the style, the consent of all the parts, the scope of the whole (which is to give all glory to God), the full discovery it makes of the only way of man's salvation, the many other incomparable excellencies, and the entire perfection thereof, are arguments whereby it doth abundantly evidence itself to be the word of God; yet, notwithstanding, our full persuasion and assurance of the infallible truth and divine authority thereof, is from the inward work of the Holy Spirit bearing witness by and with the word in our hearts."

My friends, if ever words, true to the experience of thousands and thousands of hearts, were written in this world, you have them there. You have the evidence that convinces the head; you have the evidence that comes home to the conscience; and, thank God, that while the evidence that speaks to mere intellect does, in the highest perfection, belong mainly to scholars and logicians, the grander and better evidence,—the evidence that brings full persuasion and assurance,—is within the reach of every human being that feels he is a poor sinner, and opens the door of his heart to Jesus and seeks peace and rest in Him. You will never shake such a one, clinging to the cross, and relying on the kind and gracious Holy Spirit, by outside objections about various readings, and slips of transcribers, and that kind of thing: these do not come within a thousand miles of the stable, irresistible evidence he rests on!

Yet it is well to remember that there are clear and weighty lines of evidence for the inspiration, the authenticity, and the genuineness of Holy Scripture: lines of evidence sufficient for the conviction of every candid mind. There are those considerations which arise from the Bible itself, and which are named in that passage from the Confession of Faith: what may be termed the Internal Evidence that the Bible is God's Word: the "majesty, purity, light, life, and efficacy which is in it." Then there are the prophecies and miracles by which it is confirmed: the consent of the Christian Church: innumerable testimonies from apostolic ages downwards that the Bible has been received as inspired: that the books which make up the Bible were written by the men to whom they are ascribed; and that in all vital matters they remain as their writers left them. A host of volumes have been written by learned and good men, in which you may find all these arguments, and many more, drawn out at length; this is not the time nor place for setting such forth: but there is one thing that may properly be said. It is a very fit thing that those of you who have time and capacity for such researches should acquire some general knowledge of the grounds, the less practical grounds, on which we hold the Bible to be the Word of God: but go into such investigations with prayer for God's direction, and in a truth-seeking spirit, not in a self-sufficient carping one: a man who wants to find objections may find them; however ample and clear the evidence may be. And further: I wish especially to say this to thoughtful young men; when you have plainly seen that the evidence that proves the Bible to be God's Word is sufficient, then let the question be settled for ever. Just put that conclusion (as it were) on a shelf in your mind; and refuse to take it down again, and to begin the matter over with every carping talker for talking's sake. You may not always have your arguments at hand for production: you may not always be ready on the instant to meet the objections of some ingenious companion: but you may well say to such a one, "Well, I don't feel able all at once to tell you all the reasons that convinced me the Bible is God's Word: I don't feel able to refute the difficulties you have started: but I know I found the reasons sufficient when I examined the question fully: and I saw through all difficulties then: and I tell you my mind is made up on that matter." Dear friends, always do what you can to lead an earnest seeker after truth through his perplexities: but if any one wants to make God's Word of Life a subject for quibbling dialectics, see you refuse to discuss so solemn a thing in so unfit a way. And always tell any friend who, in this unsettled age, may be perplexed with sceptical difficulties, that the way to make these vanish, is to pray the Holy Ghost to make him feel the vital power of our holy religion; and the power of the Lord Jesus Christ, lifted upon the cross, to draw all men to Him. Oh, when we are convinced of our sin, and our need of a Saviour: when we are brought in earnestness to ask "what must I do to be saved?" and to cry "God be merciful to me a sinner," how such a declaration as that "the blood of Christ cleanseth from all sin," will commend itself to our conscience, more welcome than water to the dying for thirst: what witness of the Spirit we shall have then that these things—that all the blessed gospel of our salvation, must be true,—or how could we live!

Yes, brethren: the Confession of Faith is proved, by abundant experience, to be right when it says that after all, excellent and irresistible as the arguments may be that prove that the Bible is the word of God, "our full persuasion and assurance of the infallible truth, and divine authority thereof, is from the inward work of the Holy Spirit bearing witness with and by the word in our hearts." And oh, a thousand-fold better, the simple faith of one who just humbly rests in the belief of God's Word, because he feels something in his breast that tells him it must be true;—better that a thousand-fold, than the proud ingenuity of one who queries, doubts, and argues, till he lands himself in wretched scepticism, or in utter unbelief. Best of all, indeed, the faith which has its seat alike in the conviction of the understanding, the testimony of the conscience, and the assent of the feelings: but if we must make a choice between them, give us the assurance of the heart rather than that of the head. You remember the touching contrast drawn by an eloquent author, between the poor slave and the polished Roman philosopher, each in his day of bitter grief: how the one, if he had read the words of hope and promise on the sacred page, would have perplexed his head first with a hundred questions of authenticity of manuscript and correctness of translation: but to the other, there it lay, just what he needed, so evidently true and divine that the possibility of a question never entered his simple mind. Now that best evidence is within the reach of all: God grant it to every one of us! A few weeks since, in speaking to you upon another subject, I reminded you of the touching lines in which a Christian poet contrasts the philosophic infidel with the Christian cottager: they recur more suitably now; and some of you know, how when that good man Dr. Chalmers was Professor of Divinity, after he had set out before his students the evidence which may convince the head that the Bible comes from God, he was wont to sum up by saying that there is a better evidence by far; and you have it described and commended in the famous lines:

"She for her humble sphere by nature fit,
Has little understanding, and no wit:
Just knows, and knows no more, her Bible true,—
A truth the brilliant Frenchman never knew—
And in that charter reads, with sparkling eyes,
Her title to a treasure in the skies.

"Oh, happy peasant! oh, unhappy bard!
His the mere tinsel, hers the rich reward.
He, praised perhaps for ages yet to come;
She, never heard of half a mile from home:
He, lost in errors his vain heart prefers;
She, safe in the simplicity of hers."

And now, leaving this matter with a prayer, that the Blessed Spirit may work in each of us, ever more completely, the demonstration that the Bible is from God, let us go on to think of a question which in these days cannot be passed without remark by any one who, in discoursing of God's book, desires to keep up with the progress of modern religious thought.

Here is the question. Is there progress from age to age, in men's understanding of the Bible? Have Christian people come, now, to see more in the Bible than Christian people used to see? And may it be expected that, as time goes on, Christian people will see more in the Bible than now we see?

My friends, all controversy tends to grow angry. When people have a very decided opinion on a subject, they find it hard to bear patiently with other people, who think differently. But no controversy is so ill-natured as religious controversy, and probably religious controversy never was angrier than in the discussion of this question. Let us lament that true religion, in many men, is alloyed with so much narrowness, bitterness, and unfairness; and let us pray for the guidance of God's Spirit to keep us free from these, and to clear our minds on this matter. It seems to me, that such as approach the question in an honest and teachable spirit, ought to find little difficulty in it.

Of course, all God's revelation to man is contained in the Bible. Nothing can be added to what is written there. But there is no doubt that people may come to understand the Bible better. Eastern travellers have told us many things about the country and the people, which explain statements and allusions on the sacred page. In an old infidel book, you may find it said that the story of the sick man who was let down through the roof of a house to be healed by Christ, is absurd on the face of it. Then the writer goes on to show how impossible it would be to carry a sick man in a bed like our beds to the top of a house like our houses, and to take off the slates, and cut away the timbers of the roof, and lower the sick man into a room in that way. You see the infidel writer fancied that a bed in Judea is like a bed here, and a house in Judea like a house here. But every schoolboy could tell him now that a bed in the East was a light stretcher, just the most convenient thing to carry a sick man on: that an Eastern house had a flat roof, easy of access, and with a door lying flat which had but to be lifted up and there was the space below where Jesus was with the crowd of lookers-on. Now here is a case in which progress has been made in understanding the Bible. No one now would make that blunder into which the infidel writer fell through his ignorance. And here is one specimen of many in which modern research, and travels, and critical skill, have made men understand the Bible better.

So far, things are plain. But this does not touch anything vital. Can progress be made in vital matters? Is there any hope of discovering in the Bible some new doctrine that concerns salvation? Is there any chance of some day finding out that people have been wrong in thinking the Bible teaches that men are pardoned through the atoning sacrifice of Jesus Christ, and sanctified by the Holy Spirit? Well, brethren, there are those who to these questions would say, Yes. But to these questions we say, No! In things vital, things needful to salvation, all Christian people in all ages have understood God's Word alike; all Christian people will understand it alike till the end of time. We are justified through faith in Christ; we are sanctified by the Holy Ghost. There has been no progress; there will be no progress; in things like these. In matters not vital, it is a fact of the believer's experience that in a certain sense there is progress in understanding the Bible. What believer does not know that there is a richness, a depth of meaning, in the inspired Word, that cannot be exhausted by a single reading: that a believer may read his Bible, praying for the illumination of the Holy Spirit, every day through forty years; and always find a fresh grace, fitness, and beauty, at each fresh perusal. As the believer grows in grace, attains a holier spirituality, he will understand his Bible better: will discover that "there remaineth yet very much land to be possessed" in its gracious meaning. I feel quite sure that all Christians who have been Christians for years, could say, that now they find something in the Psalms they did not use to find. In the Bible, you know, there are things "which the angels desire to look into:" but oh, my friends, while you thankfully acknowledge all this, see you be not misled by the artful plausibilities of these modern days into thinking that the blessed doctrines which concern salvation, the things to our belief in which we trust our souls for eternity, are mere provisional, temporary truths, that may serve us now, but that some day will be pushed aside, and give way to something farther and better, to be drawn forth from the old pages of the Bible by the keener criticism and larger insight of a future age. Do not trust those who speak to you, however eloquently, of—"the Christ that is to be"— of some new and nobler system, into which our present Christianity is to pass and vanish. There never will be another Christ: never another Gospel. To the end of time, "The blood of Christ will cleanse from all sin;" and "in Christ Jesus neither circumcision will avail anything, nor uncircumcision; but a new creature." We may say assuredly, that till this world ends, the way of salvation will be what it is now, and has always been. "Other foundation can no man lay than is laid, which is Jesus Christ." Who can forget St. Paul's awful words:—"Though we, or an angel from heaven, preach any other gospel unto you than that which we have preached unto you, let him be accursed!"

And having said this, we may add, that while the interpretation has remained and will remain unaltered as to doctrines which concern salvation, Christian men have, as time has gone on, drawn from the Bible great principles which were formerly not supposed to be contained in it. Most of us, for instance, would say that the great principle of religious toleration,—the principle that no man should be punished by man for his religious belief,—is founded upon the whole principle of the Bible: but for centuries men did not know that: men burnt and tortured those who they esteemed as heretics; and thought they were doing God service. And just the other day the Pope published, in the astonished ears of Europe, that he is of that opinion still. He thinks that the principle that man is responsible for his belief only to his God, is a mischievous error, opposed to God's Word. Protestants have learned better, and some day the Church of Rome may learn better too. Then there are parts of the world in which men believe that negro slavery is approved by the Bible; there were ages in which everybody believed so: we have come to understand the Scriptures better; and we look for the day when the truth of God shall make all men free.

And now, my brethren, how shall I draw to a close these things which have been said about the blessed Word of God, better than by reminding you of what you all know well: by Whose kind help and light we should always read our Bibles. He who of old moved holy men of God to write the pages we know, is still ready to help us to understand them savingly; and to help us to read in such a spirit, that we shall find them to bear the words of eternal life. If we read our Bibles as a mere heartless task, they will do us no good: if we read them in a critical, fault-finding spirit, we may make them do us much harm. Now I tell you this is not a piece of systematic theology, away from actual life. It is not a bit more certain that the light of your lamp will fall this evening on the page of your Bible, as you read your chapters of it, than it is that the light of God's Holy Spirit will this evening shine that same page, if you heartily pray for it. And not all the commentaries and lexicons of scholars and divines will stand us in such stead to make us feel the deep meaning and blessed comfort of God's holy Word, as the illumination of the Holy Spirit; there is nothing else in this world that will so bring it home to us. Now that is God's message to me, even me! And not all the old memories that gather round the book, which we have known since we knew anything,—and whose words will stay with us when all other words are forgot,—can so avail to warm and touch our hearts, as one breath of that kindly Sanctifier and Comforter! Dear friends, I shall be well content with the good these sermons on God's Word have done us, if we all resolve, now, even now, that when we read our Bibles, at least morning and evening every day, we shall just for a moment look up to God, and pray, "Fill me with Thy Spirit!" We cannot too often offer that prayer; we never can offer the prayer that is so sure to be answered! All grace is of Him, for whose coming it was expedient that even Christ should go; and when we do not know the grace we specially need, He knows; and if He dwell in us, He will work that in us! Let us offer that prayer daily, hourly—in every little pause in our work—Fill us with Thy Spirit!

"Dependent on Thy bounteous Breath,
We seek Thy Grace alone;
Through childhood, manhood, age, and death,
To keep us still Thine own!"

THE BITTER AND THE SWEET.

Come, darling Effie,
Come, take the cup:
Effie must drink it all—
Drink it all up.

Darling, I know it is Bitter and bad;
But 'twill make Effie dear
Rosy and glad.

Mother would take it all
For her wee elf—
But who would suffer then?
Effie herself.

If Effie drinks it,
Then, I can tell,
She will go out to play
Merry and well.

Drink, and then, darling,
You shall have this,— Sweet after bitter:
Now, first, a kiss.

Ah, darling Effie,
God also knows,
When cups of bitterness
His hand bestows,

How His poor children need Urging to take
Merciful draughts of pain,
Mixed for their sake.

He, too, gives tenderly
Joy after pain
Sweet after bitterness,
After loss gain.

IN THE LIFE OF OUR LORD.

THE CALLING TO THE APOSTOLATE OF ST. PETER, ST. ANDREW, ST. JAMES, ST. JOHN, AND ST. MATTHEW.

Luke v. 1—11; Matt. iv. 18—22, ix. 9—17; Mark i. 16—20, ii. 14—22; Luke v. 27—39.

Extraordinary success naturally excites exaggerated hopes. A sudden blaze of prosperity has blinded the strongest human eye. Nor can you point to any great enterprise, signally successful at its outset, of which you will not find it true that those engaged in it were, for a short time at least, seduced into exorbitant expectations. If ever any success might have operated in this way, it was that which attended the close of the first year of our Lord's ministry. The whole population of Galilee, a community of from two to three millions, stirred to its depths, —the excitement spreading all around, reaching eastward beyond the Jordan, westward to the coasts of Tyre and Sidon, southward to the hill country of Judea. It is no longer, as in the days that followed the baptism by the banks of the Jordan, an obscure Nazarene travelling with a few friends who had attached themselves to his person, it is the great Worker of miracles, the Healer of all diseases, the Caster-out of devils, surrounded and pressed in upon so closely by admiring and enthusiastic crowds, that to get a few quiet hours He had to steal them from sleep —to spend them in the mountain solitudes. It is no longer in the synagogue and on the Sabbath-days alone that audiences are to be found; everywhere and at all times assemblages, too large often for his addressing them, are ready to hang upon his lips. But you search in vain through all the wonderful excitement and popularity which followed our Lord in his first circuit through Galilee, for the slightest evidence that any false or exaggerated expectations were cherished. The specious appearances that then surrounded Him, never dazzled nor deceived his eye. He knew from the beginning how soon the sudden fervours of the first great commotion would subside—how soon the tide that swelled so high would ebb away. He knew that had He left them among whom He lived and laboured to themselves, had He done nothing to bind some of them to Himself by ties closer and stronger than any they naturally or spontaneously would have formed, He would at the close have been left alone. And therefore it was that at the very time when his popularity was at the highest, He took the first step towards knitting to Himself twelve chosen men in bonds which, with all the pains that He took Himself to forge and fasten, needed the welding forces of the day of Pentecost to make them strong enough to bind them everlastingly to Him.

To these twelve men an office, secondary only to the one He himself discharged, was to be assigned. They were always with Him, the spectators and reporters of all He said, and did, and suffered. They were to share and multiply his labours, to protect and relieve Him from the pressure to which He was exposed. For a short season He was to send them from his side, to teach and to work miracles as He did Himself, that a short fore-trial might be made of the work in which they were afterwards to be engaged. After his death they were to be the witnesses of the Resurrection, the expounders of that Gospel which needed the great decease to be accomplished ere in its full measure it could be proclaimed. By their hands the foundations of the Church were to be laid. Let us note, then, the first steps in their calling to this high office.

On his return from the Temptation, by the banks of the Jordan, and on the way thence to Galilee, five men—Andrew, John, Peter, Philip, and Nathaniel—had temporarily attached themselves to Jesus. Of these, only one—Philip—had been called to follow him by our Lord himself. The others were attracted by what they heard about Him, or saw in Him. At first, however, it was but a loose and uncertain bond that united them to Jesus. All the five were present, we may believe, at the marriage feast at Cana, and may have gone up with Him to Jerusalem, to the first Passover which He attended after his baptism. But they did not remain in constant attendance upon his person. After his first circuit of Galilee, when his fame was at its height, three of them had returned to their ordinary occupation as fishermen. With them a fourth became associated. As Andrew had brought his brother Peter to Jesus, we may imagine that the same service had been rendered by John to his brother James; so that all the four were already well known to Christ, had enjoyed much familiar intercourse with Him, and had appeared often openly as his followers. Perhaps it was the common bond of discipleship to Him which in the course of the year had drawn them into closer union with one another. Peter and Andrew had previously resided at Bethsaida, a town at the north-eastern extremity of the lake, but they had now removed to Capernaum, had entered into partnership with the two sons of Zebedee, and had been plying their craft together on the lake, when all the four were pointedly and specially summoned in a way they never before had been to follow the Lord.

The difficulties that many have felt in harmonising the narratives in the fourth chapter of Matthew and first chapter of Mark, with that in the fifth chapter of Luke, have led them to believe that two such summonses were given; that on the first occasion—the one referred to by Matthew and Mark—the four had answered the appeal by an immediate throwing up of their occupation by the lake side, but that they had again, and not long afterwards, resumed it, requiring a still more impressive instrumentality finally to sever the bonds. We are inclined rather to believe that all which the Evangelists relate occurred in the course of the same morning, and that it happened somewhat in this manner:

The day had dawned. From his solitary place of rest and prayer, somewhere among the neighbouring hills, Jesus had come down to the quiet beach as the first light of the morning struck across the placid bosom of the lake. The unproductive toil of the night was nearly over with the fishermen. Out a little distance upon the waters, Peter and Andrew were seen, casting in their net for the last time as Jesus approached the shore. But his progress was interrupted by the crowds hurrying out of Capernaum, so soon as it was known that He was there. Through these crowds—stopping occasionally to address a few words to them—Jesus made his way to one or other of those small creeks or inlets, still to be seen there, where a boat could ride a few feet from the shore, and the people, seated on either side and before the speaker, could listen quietly to one addressing them from the boat. Here, in this creek two boats were drawn up, the property of the four—the two pairs of brothers already spoken of. The fishermen had gone out of them, and were mending their nets ; not so far away, however, but that one of them, Peter, noticing the Lord's approach, had returned. Entering into his boat, Jesus asked Peter to thrust out a little from the land ; and when this was done, he sat down and taught the people out of the boat. The teaching over, Jesus turned to Peter, and said to him, "Launch out into the deep, and let down your nets for a draught" —a singular command to come from one who knew so little—might be supposed to care so little, about the fisherman's craft. Still it came so decidedly from one whom Peter had already learned to address as Master, that, with a few words of explanation, indicative of the smallness of his hope, he prepares to comply with it. "Master," he says, "we have toiled all the night, and have taken nothing ; nevertheless at thy word I will let over the net." He calls his brother, and launches out—lets down the net. At once such a multitude of fishes is enclosed, that the boat begins to fill—the net to break. Excited by what they had seen, James and John had by this time launched their boat, and Peter beckons them to come and help. They come, but all the help they can give is scarce sufficient. Both boats are filled, and almost sinking as they get ashore.

Peter had already seen Jesus do wonderful things—turn water into wine, eject the devil from the demoniac, raise his own wife's mother from the fever-bed ; but somehow this wonder came home to him as none of them had done—wrought in his own vessel, with his own net, in the way of his own calling, after his own fruitless toil. Never had the impression of a Divine Power at work in his immediate presence taken such a hold of him. Never had the sense of his being in close contact with One in whom such power resided come so upon his spirit. Astonishment, fear, humiliation—the impression, not of his weakness only, but of his sinfulness—of his unworthiness to stand in such presence—fill and overwhelm his open, ardent, impressible spirit. He falls at Jesus' knees, as He sat there in the boat, quietly watching all the stir and bustle of the fishermen ; and he gives vent to the feeling that for a moment is uppermost, as he exclaims, "Depart from me, for I am a sinful man, O Lord!" And ever still, when the first clear and overpowering revelation is made to any man of an Almighty Being compassing his path, besetting him before and behind, laying his hand upon him,—ever when the first true and real contact takes place of the human spirit with the living God as the Being with whom we have so closely and constantly to do, will something like the same effect be realised. So was it with him who said, "I have heard of thee with the hearing of the ear, but now mine eye seeth thee ; wherefore I abhor myself, and repent in dust and ashes." So was it with him who said, "Woe is me, for I am a man of unclean lips, and I dwell among a people of unclean lips, for mine eyes have seen the King, the Lord of Hosts."

"Depart from me." Nothing could have surprised Peter more than the Lord's taking him at his word—then and for ever after turning his back upon him. No man then living would have felt such a forsaking more. Wishing to express how unfit he felt himself for such a presence, Peter, with his wonted rashness, had said more than he really meant. He asks Christ to go, yet he clings to Him. "I am a sinful man, O Lord." Jesus knows that better than Peter does. Peter will know it better when the Lord looks at him in the judgment hall, and he goes out to weep over his denials. But Jesus knows, also, that it is because he is so sinful a man he must not be forsaken. And though he is so sinful a man, yet still he may be chosen to stand in closest relationship to his Master. "Fear not," said Jesus to him ; "from henceforth thou shalt catch men."

The words of direction, assurance, promise, addressed in the first instance to Peter alone, were soon repeated to his three associates. The shore was reached, the boats hauled up, the fish disposed of, James and John had carried the broken nets away to a little distance to mend them, when first to the one pair of brothers, and then to the other, Jesus said, "Follow me, and I will make you fishers of men." And immediately they left boats and nets, and two of them their father, and forsook all, and followed Him. It was not much we may think that they had to leave—not much, but it was their all ; and the promptness and entireness of their relinquishment of it shows what power over them the Saviour had already got—what a readiness for service and for sacrifice was already in them. And these were the four men who ever after stood most closely associated with Jesus—the four who stand at the head of every list of the twelve Apostles.

It was not indeed till some time after this that, along with the other eight, they were set apart to the peculiar office of the Apostolate. This calling of them away from their former avocations, this attaching of them permanently to his person, was a marked step toward their instalment in that position. It was the same with Matthew, the publican. The high road from Damascus southward to Judea and Egypt ran from the slopes of Mount Hermon down to the northern extremity of the Sea of Galilee, and for a short distance skirted along the north-western shore of the lake, passing through Capernaum. On the side of this road, close to the lake, stood the booth in which Matthew sat levying the toll on the passengers and their goods. He was one of a hated and degraded class. The payment of the taxes exacted by the foreigners under whose rule they were, irritated to the last degree the Jews, who regarded it as a visible sign and token of their bondage. The strong feeling thus excited spent itself on all who had anything to do with the collection of these taxes. No Jew who desired to stand well with his fellow-countrymen would be a tax-gatherer. The office was commonly held by foreigners, or by those who cared but little for a purely Jewish reputation. Matthew was a Jew, yet he had become a publican, and now he is sitting at the receipt of custom as Jesus passed by. We know nothing of his personal character or previous habits. Considering that a year at least had passed since Jesus had first appeared as a public teacher in Galilee—that so prominent a part of his ministry had been conducted in the very neighbourhood in which Matthew lived—it may be regarded as a violent supposition that there had been no previous acquaintance and intercourse between him and our Lord. It would be more in keeping with Christ's conduct in other instances to imagine that, so far as his occupation had permitted, Matthew had already appeared as a follower of the new Teacher, had shown himself to have been favourably affected towards Him. However it was, Jesus saw in him a man who, under the right teaching and training, would be well suited for the high office He intended to confer upon him; and so, despite of the invidious office he now held, Jesus stopped as he passed by—said "Follow me;" and "he left all, rose up, and followed Him," throwing up thus a lucrative engagement, and casting in his lot with the small but growing band which Jesus was forming.

So soon as it was known that a publican had not only been seen in the following of Jesus—which might have occurred and occasioned no remark—but that Jesus had actually selected a publican and invited him to become one of his immediate attendants, a great commotion among the Scribes and Pharisees arose. It was a public scandal, an offence against all propriety, that one pretending to be a religious guide of the people—one preaching the Kingdom of God—should call a publican to his side, and take him into his confidence. Bad enough that He should be seen breaking the Sabbath Himself and encouraging his disciples to do so likewise, but to pass by all the respectable inhabitants of Capernaum—so many of whom were conspicuous for the strictness of their observance of all the Jewish ordinances—and to confer such a mark of favour upon a man with whom none of them would associate—what was to be thought of such an act? But the worst had not yet come. Either instantly upon his throwing up his office, or a few days thereafter, this Matthew makes a feast—a farewell one, it would seem—to which a number of his old friends and associates were invited, and there Jesus and his disciples were to be seen sitting among the other guests. The Pharisees could not stand this. They did not venture, indeed, to go openly and reproach Christ personally with it. They were smarting too keenly under the recent rebuke they had got from Him to have courage to do so, but they go to his disciples, and they say to them, "Why eateth your master with publicans and sinners?" Jesus does not leave it to the disciples to reply. As in so many other instances, He takes the matter into his own hands, and, half in irony, half in earnest, He says to them, "They that be whole need not a physician, but they that be sick." They thought themselves the hale and healthy; they spake of these publicans and sinners as corrupt and diseased;—why, then, blame Him if He, as the great Physician, went where his services were most required? It was sinners, not the righteous, that He came to call to repentance. If they needed no repentance, why blame Him if He went to call those whose ears were open to his entreaties? But were they, indeed, so much better than those whom they despised? The difference between them was far more an outward, a ceremonial, than an inward, a moral, a spiritual one. Many of these poor publicans and sinners—excommunicated though they might be—very careless about religious rites—were men of simpler, truer, honester natures, kindlier in their disposition, and in a sense, too, more devout, than many of these pretentious pietists. "Go," said Jesus to those who imagined themselves to be righteous and despised others—"Go, and learn what that meaneth: I will have mercy and not sacrifice"—mercy rather than sacrifice if the two be put in comparison; mercy alone, and no sacrifice, if the two are put in opposition — mercy among publicans and sinners rather than sacrifice or any amount of ceremonial observances among Scribes and Pharisees.

But now another class interferes, to make common cause with the Pharisees. Some of the disciples of John the Baptist had early seen the superiority of Jesus, and at their master's own instance had enrolled themselves among his followers. But others stood aloof, having more in them of the old Judaic spirit—attracted as much by the ascetic habits of the Baptist as by anything about him—recognising in the fasts that he kept, the prayers that he offered himself and taught his disciples to offer, a return to a still purer and stricter piety than that even which the Pharisees practised. It was a strange and repulsive thing to such, at the very hour when their master was cast into prison and they were mourning and fasting more than usual on this account, to see Jesus and his disciples going about eating and drinking—nay, accepting invitations to festive entertainments in publicans' houses. St. Matthew tells us that these disciples of John went at once to Jesus with their complaint. St. Mark completes the picture by informing us that the Pharisees joined with them in the complaint. Nothing more likely than when the one saw how differently the discipleship of Jesus was developing itself from what they had expected, that they should fall back rather upon the austerity of Pharisaism, with its frequent fastings and many prescribed exercises of devotion—nothing more natural than that the Pharisees should seize upon the occasion and ally themselves with the followers of the Baptist, to aim thereby a fresh blow at Christ's authority and influence over the people. Christ's answer meets both sets of complainers. "And Jesus said unto them, Can the children of the bridechamber mourn, as long as the bridegroom is with them? but the days will come, when the bridegroom shall be taken from them, and then shall they fast." (Matt. ix. 15.) In the last testimony that the Baptist had borne to Jesus had he not said, "He that hath the bride is the bridegroom, but the friend of the bridegroom which standeth and heareth him rejoiceth greatly because of the bridegroom's voice." The position that John had thus claimed for himself, those disciples against whom the complaint was lodged were now occupying. They were the friends of the bridegroom—standing and hearing and rejoicing —was it a time for them to mourn and to fast? The days were to come when the bridegroom should be taken away from them, then should they fast —the fasting flowing spontaneously, unbiddenly from the grief. There is no general command here prescribing fasting, but simply a prophecy, referring to a peculiar and brief period in the history of the Lord's disciples; a prophecy, however, rich in the intimation it conveys that all external acts and exercises, such as that of fasting, should spring naturally out of some pure and deep emotion of the heart seeking for itself an appropriate expression.

And now two short parables are added by Our Lord: the first we may regard as peculiarly applicable to the disciples of John, the other to the Pharisees. "No man putteth a piece of new cloth unto an old garment, for that which is put in to fill it up taketh from the garment, and the rent is made worse" (Matt. ix. 16). No man would take a piece of new, raw cloth, which would not keep its form afterwards, when wet would shrink, and sew it into the rent of an old garment; for ere long, when the new piece put in contracted, it would tear itself away from the old, and the rent would be made worse. And let not the disciples of the Baptist think that this new piece of their master's asceticism, with its new fastings and new prayers, was to be sewn, as they seemed to wish to do, with the old, worn-out, rent garment of Pharisaism. To try that, would be to try to unite what could not lastingly be conjoined; instead of closing up the rent, it would be to make it wider than ever. "Neither do men put new wine into old bottles: else the bottles break, and the wine runneth out, and the bottles perish: but they put new wine into new bottles, and both are preserved." (Matt. ix. 17). No man taketh old, dry, withered skin bottles, such as then were used, and filleth them with new wine; for the new wine would ferment, expand, and the bottles be burst, and the wine spilled and lost. And let not the Pharisees think that the new wine of the kingdom, the fresh spirit of love to God and man, which Jesus came to breathe into regenerated humanity, could be safely poured into their old bottles—into those forms and ceremonies of worship, dry as dust, and brittle as the thinnest and most withered piece of leather. No, there must be new bottles for the new wine, bottles that will yield to the pressure from within, and expand as the fermenting liquid which they contain expanded. And such new bottles as were thus required Jesus was finding—not in priestly men, chained up from childhood within priestly habits—not in those fixed and rigid Levitical institutions which the long years that had been draining them of their vitality had been stiffening into an immovable inflexibility: but in these fishermen, these publicans—natural, homely, unlearned men, open to imbibe his spirit in all its richness and expansiveness; and in those simple forms and institutions of Christianity, which, cramped by no formal and immutable injunctions, were to be left free to take such new outward shapes as the indwelling spirit might mould.

These two homely parables of Our Lord, so specially adapted as they were to the circumstances in which they were uttered,—the individuals to whom they were addressed—do they not carry with them a lesson to all times and ages of Christianity? Do they not remind us of the absolute incompatibility of the legal and the evangelical obedience—the spirit of the Law and the spirit of the Gospel? There is a religion, of which the Pharisaism of Christ's days was an exaggerated specimen—the very heart and soul of which consists in penances, and prayers, and fastings, —in worship offered, in duties done, in sacrifices made, in mortifications inflicted and endured,—all to soothe an agitated conscience, to win a peace with God, to eke out a hope of heaven. To this the faith that is in Christ our Saviour stands directly and diametrically opposed—the one offering as a free gift what the other toils after as a reward; the one inviting us to begin where the other would have us end; the one putting forgiveness and acceptance with God in our hand and calling upon us, in the free spirit of his redeemed, forgiven, adopted children, to live, and serve, and in all things to submit to our Father which is in heaven—the other holding out the forgiveness and the acceptance away in the distance, and calling upon us, in the spirit of bondage, to labour all through life for their attainment; the one the old tattered garment, the other the piece of the new made cloth.

And the wine of the kingdom, ever as it pours itself afresh from its fountain-head on high into the spirit of man, is it not a new wine that needs new bottles to contain it? If it be indeed the Spirit of Christ which is working in hearts that have been opened to receive it, may we not safely leave it to its own operation there, and allow it to shape the vessel that holds it as it likes? Both, indeed, are needed,—the outward form, the inner spirit; nor will any wise or thoughtful man rashly touch, or mould into different shape the first, thinking thereby to improve the second; but neither will he hinder or hamper the second if by its own proper motion it is going on gently to remould the first.

TWO FESTIVAL ADDRESSES.

BY A PROFESSOR OF THEOLOGY.

I.—THE LAST DAY OF THE YEAR.

The end of time is sure to come. Often, when looking round us, we fail to perceive any tokens of this; and the lesson of time's swiftness is lost upon us. The wisdom of numbering our days is far more admired than practised, and thousands live on and on as if things were certain to continue for ever just as they are now. Even the watchful Christian, with whom weeks and months pass away without his experiencing anything extraordinary in his life, is tempted to slacken his effort, and say to himself, "My Lord delayeth his coming;" while the scoffer loftily repeats, "Where is the promise of His coming?" But he must surely be in a deep sleep of the soul whom the voice of this evening does not seriously remind of the certain end of time. It should make us all see that time is no more destined to continue for ever than the world with its glory. The dying day of the year is an image of the dying day of time; and though we may suppose that centuries will elapse before that awful hour arrives, this evening proclaims in our ear, with trumpet note, that the end of time for each one comes with death. At this moment we are, maybe, buoyant with health and vigour, but as surely as the last stroke of the clock this year will soon be heard, so surely will our pulse soon throb its last; and where the tree falleth there it shall lie. That end will come for thee, O son of prosperity. "Hitherto shalt thou come, but no further," will the Lord of life and death say to you; and the flowers of your youth will make room for funereal cypresses, the sound of your harp for doleful mourning, and the gaudy dress of your vanity for the white shroud of the grave. That end will come for you, O reckless runners in life's exciting race. "It is enough," the Lord of the vineyard will one day say; and at his word, the arm which is so untiring in activity will fall down, helplessly paralysed. And that end will also come for us, ministers of the Gospel! One day we shall ascend the pulpit for the last time. The great Husbandman, who committed the plough to us, will command us to withdraw our hand; and whether the evening shades are already falling round our life, or the sun has not yet reached his noon-day height, we shall not be permitted to sow one grain more, nor to pull out another thistle. I am repeating what we all know and what has often been said in a more eloquent manner than I can say it; but as long as my conscience tells me we forget it, I shall not dread the reproach of troubling you with needless admonitions. What? The solemnity of the last day of the year is increased by the circumstance that each time it sings to us the well-known death-song with fresh power;—a death-song to which, God knows, we have long shut our ears, but which we are compelled to listen to at least this evening. Oh last day of the year! Thou grave preacher! go on speaking to us of our frailty! Though you tell many a one what he wishes not to hear, yet we all feel that we are in need of such voices!

The end of time must soon come. We have a hundred times exclaimed "How quickly the year has flown!—where has it gone?" But soon we shall ask, "Where has our life flown to?" In vain we attempt to describe the flight of time by comparing it with the speed of an eagle, the flight of an arrow, the duration of a vapour, or the quickness of lightning. These motions, however quick, allow us a moment in which we may observe their course; but while you fix your attention upon time, the moment you want to observe is invariably that which is already no more. What a gigantic stride have we consequently made during the last twelve-months towards that bourne from which no one returns! In our very birth we brought with us the seed of death. It develops itself in us; it is even fed by the nourishment that sustains our body. With some the germ of corruption ripens after a moderate space of time; with others it comes to harvest suddenly; while again with some a short over-exertion of body or of mind causes it to rise like a rank poisonous weed over the feeble flower of life, killing and blasting it. The frail hut collapses as if touched by an invisible finger, and Death's cold hand writes "Finis" upon the last page of our life's volume. According to human calculation, it may be long before that final hour arrives; but you will find that, as in stories, the greater the number of pages in our book, the quicker the last leaves will be turned over. "To-day my funeral bell is tolled," the parting year cries; "to-morrow it will be yours." When the development of our strength is at its highest it is verging upon decay; and slow as was your progress in ascending life's hill, your descent will be all the quicker the higher you have mounted. The clock-work of life goes quick; each past hour takes one off the twelve. Soon the wheels will rust, the springs be broken, and the hands will cease pointing to the word—Eternity!

But tell us, O thou messenger of frailty, tell us at any rate upon how many hours of the day we may still probably reckon!

But here the last day of the old year gives no answer. Yet no; I am mistaken. The dying messenger has an answer from his Master. Alas! it sounds very gloomy:

"The end of your time," he cries, "will come unexpectedly, and like a thief in the night!"

As he utters these words, he points to the fresh graves of many who were with us twelve months since, and asks; "Which of these, on the preceding year's last day, thought that by the next he would be resting among the great congregation of the dead?" In the midst of labour or of rest, of enjoyment or of want, at the dinner-table where a Belshazzar feasts, or in the dungeon where lingers the martyr, the King of Terrors steps in uninvited, and touches his victim with his inflexible sceptre, saying: "Thou art mine!" Alas! to which one of the many who this year have sunk into the grave did the "thief who came in the night" come just at the hour he was expected? The prepared ones, it is to be feared, were few. This is that gravest of truths which the Year's Last Day proclaims to us: "Nothing is certain here below save uncertainty!" Time carries us away, blindfolded; and while our wavering eyes seem to see something at a distance like a bright horizon, our foot suddenly dashes against—a tombstone!

This evening claims for the Lord our God our most fervent gratitude. Short and uncertain as is this life, it is yet a precious gift of God; and its value rises all the higher the more it is looked upon as a time of grace. Were this world the limit of our existence, I hardly know whether I would congratulate you on the fact of another year being added to your days. But we know that we live for another world, and that our present existence stands in close connection with that future eternity. How, then, shall we find words to praise the long-suffering of Him who again has fulfilled in our case that gracious word, "Let it alone this year also!" Hail to you, my fellow-struggler! the lovely light of the day of grace is still shining upon you! Still an opportunity is granted you to retrieve your misdeeds, to strengthen that which is weak, and to put right as far as you can what you have neglected. Rejoice, oh thou who art recovered from a dangerous disease! Perhaps the fatal sword was suspended by a thin thread above thy sick bed, but the Lord of your days drew it back into its sheath, and your end has not yet come. And who is there amongst us who will not admit that the Lord has left nothing untried to prepare us for the coming end? Bless the Lord, oh my soul! who redeemeth thy life from destruction; who crowneth thee with loving-kindness and tender mercies! The angel whom John beheld with a rainbow upon his head, is an emblem of God's everlasting faithfulness. The present evening resembles that angel; it comes to us surrounded with innumerable proofs of God's mercy, which to the eye of faith are radiant with brighter hues than the rainbow. Must not every one of us answer in the negative the question, "Have you lacked anything?" And must not every one also say Amen to the beautiful utterance of Job, "Thou hast granted me life and favour, and thy visitation hath preserved my spirit"? The Lord could not possibly do anything more to his vineyard than He hath done in it. For another three hundred and sixty-five days his word has spread the loveliest light over our dwellings and sanctuaries; each day of rest his servants have besought us to be reconciled unto Him; innumerable times the Lord of the Church has been standing at our door knocking. Brethren, do you not in all this recognise the purpose of the highest love, thus to prepare us for the end of time, that eternity should be blessed? It is true that I also see some before me to whom the past year is marked with black letters. They have dreaded the coming of this evening, for they said to themselves, We shall never forget this year. This hour finds them in mourning over a beloved one, or, what sometimes may weigh infinitely heavier, it finds them with a hidden wound in their soul which no earthly salve can cure. We sympathise with you, oh deeply afflicted ones! but you too, on this dark way of yours, must hear the voice from above, "Withdraw your heart from the world ere time leaves you alone for ever!" Oh, if the Lord puts thorns under our head, He does so to make us lift it up higher than any pillow of this perishable life! If He takes us to the dying bed of our beloved ones, He does so to teach us how to die, before we have dreamt out this life's fitful dream. Truly, we are saying far less than we ought to say, if, with the patriarch, we exclaim, "I am not worthy of the least of all the mercies and of all the truth which thou hast shown unto me!" We ought through faith to add, "The paths of the Lord, even the hardest, have this year also been mercy and truth."

This evening also claims a contrite heart. Suppose the last hour of this year were the hour of your death; suppose the morning of the new year found you in the world of spirits, and your gain or loss for eternity were to be calculated according to your life's history during the past year—could you without a shudder think of the side to which the balance would incline? Brethren, the angel in the Apocalypse (x. 5, 6) who declared that there should be time no longer, held in his hand an open book. In the same manner the present evening appears before us as a messenger of God holding up before our eyes the register of our deeds. Could you turn over the leaves without being ashamed were only this single question put to you, "How often did you forget the end of time?" Oh, ye children of prosperity, perhaps one tear of grief has not glistened in your eye this year: but, alas! how many tears have you caused to flow? Ye young men, when you were walking along in the gladness of your youth, and in the sight of your eyes, did you never forget that God will call you to his judgment-seat for all these things? Ye rich in this world's goods, if God's finger appeared on the wall in the midst of your festival, what verdict, think you, would be written? Be faithful to yourselves and give account! Ye mourning ones, who have been standing by the dust of your dead, have you fixed the expectation of your own future upon safe grounds?

But the field of inquiry is far too vast to be so continued. Let me limit it within a narrower pale. Let me only put a few questions with regard to your purposes and intentions. You remember you were sitting at the Lord's Supper, and you avowed your union with God and Christ for the first time; or, renewing the covenant for your children, you stood by the baptismal font and said, "As for me and my house, we will serve the Lord." You heard the Gospel which called the lost, and you took the word of the prodigal son into your lips, "I will arise and go to my Father." Oh, lovely blossoms! But where are the fruits? And what do the silent walls of your closet testify about you? Has the Lord seen you there regularly during this year? Was there no guile in your spirit when you appeared there before Him with the confession of your guilt? Did you tell Him all you ought to have told? And when He comes to put to the test all that has happened between your soul and Him, will you be quite at ease? Could you—— But why all these questions? Alas! if by the grace of God we have in some measure become acquainted with ourselves, and if we place the past in the light of eternity, who is there amongst us who must not in many respects think with fear of the lot of the withered fig-tree? Oh! let us lay our faces in the dust. While looking back upon so much labour of grace spent upon us in vain, may this year's last day not have to report of any of us, "I have left him unrepenting, careless, hardened!"

The last day of the year claims a conscientious watchfulness on our part. John describes the angel whom he beheld as "crying with a loud voice;" but not less loud is the tone in which the present evening reminds us of that saying of the Lord: "What I say unto you I say unto all: watch!" Watch? But perhaps there are not a few amongst us to whom this messenger of God has to cry first, "Awake, thou that sleepest!" This word is for you, careless one, sleeping on the brink of perdition; for you, insensible one, stubbornly despising the long-suffering of God; for you, backslider, to whom the Lord is saying, "Thou hast abandoned thy first love." Have all these earnest warnings been in vain? No longer harden your heart where so much combines to beseech you to consider your soul's state! To-day is the day of grace; nowhere is a morrow of grace promised to you. Come, then, let this last evening of the year find us at the feet of Christ, praying as we never prayed before; praying as if this were the last evening of our life. Let us take care lest we fall again into the false rest of self-deception. How would it be with us if, under that hallucination, we awoke in eternity! Oh let Christ be our life! then to die will be gain to us.

"Time will have an end;" thus speaks the last evening of the year; but the covenant of grace stands established for ever. Brethren, when can we better realise the value of this truth than at a time like the present, which points to an open register of our debts suspended over an open grave? Where—it is the final testimony of this year—where sin abounded, grace did much more abound; and the covenant of God's peace stands, though mountains and hills be moved. Did we not recently stay in the spirit at the manger of Bethlehem, and did we not hear the angelic anthem before we heard the oath which, to-night, we learnt from the lips of the angel of retribution? Truly, God has a good will toward men! If, then, there is any one amongst us who dreads the worst from the coming judgment, it is a delight to my heart once more to say to him, what perhaps twelve months hence I shall not be able to say nor he to hear: "Let him that is athirst come, and whosoever will, let him take of the water of life freely." Yes, freely! Grasp that word as your only anchor, O thou who art lost in guilt and misery! Though your sins be as scarlet, they shall be as white as snow; though they be red like crimson they shall be as wool.

Blessed is he who, with this consolation in his soul, sees his years pass away! But, oh! poor suffering brother, whom this evening finds burdened with a heavy cross, must your soul be always bent down in sadness? This messenger of God has a kind word for you also: "The end will come," he says; but then he adds, "the morning of eternity approaches." To the eye of the Christian the evening of time blends with the dawn of eternity, and where the joy of the world ends, there the joy of the Church of Christ begins. A few years, and on earth there will be time no longer. Oh, my friends, we are accustomed to congratulate one another on New Year's Day; but if we look at this life in all its futility, and have our hopes fixed on a good foundation, we would rather congratulate each other on the Old Year's Evening, saying, "Hail, thou who hast come a step nearer to the end of thy strife!" Blessed are ye who this year fell asleep in Jesus; we cannot forget you, but we cannot wish you back either; it is so much better with you than it is with us!

And as long as our journey here below lasts, so long will faith rejoice that He in whose hands the end of time is, liveth everlastingly. We observe that the angel whom John beheld, sware by Him that liveth for ever. So the Old Year's Evening points us to Him who was before the mountains were born, who only hath immortality, dwelling in the light which no man can approach unto. Our hearts rest in Him. In the midst of those dismal sounds that rise from the tomb of time, the joyful sound rings out, "Much is gone, but the best is left!" Much joy is past, but He who gave it is the same for ever, and the source of all those past blessings is not yet drained. Our life is shortened, but the word remaineth unchanged, "Thy loving-kindness is better than life." If in the hour of death everything forsakes us, his rod and his staff will comfort us. If our flesh and our heart fail, He will be the strength of our heart and our portion for ever. To Him be the last word of the year, even should it be also the last word of our life; and to his name be the praise for ever and ever.

II.—NEW YEAR'S DAY.

We are now in a position which none of us occupy for the first time, but many perhaps do so for the last time:—at the entrance of a new year. The curtain is once more raised; the unknown road lies before us, and a voice which no mortal being can resist, cries, Forward! New Year's Day! Is there a day among all the grave and merry days of our life, the high significance of which is, on the whole, less understood? It is an agreeable day to the young; a tedious one in the estimation of the elders; a restless day in the opinion of most, who see the bustle and hear the noise of merry-making. But for how few is it a grave, decisive day! And yet futurity stands now before us like a mysterious form wrapt in an impenetrable veil, continually but silently beckoning to us. Certainly, it is calculated to make the Christian anxiously desire a word of instruction and encouragment for the ensuing journey of life. Yesterday was the last day of the old year, and a messenger of God, as it were, appeared before your eyes, pointing you to the end of time. To-day another messenger may be supposed to stand before you, having in his hand "the everlasting Gospel." Over the entrance of the year you see, as it were, in brightest characters, that Name in which the essence of that Gospel is contained, and without which it would be no "glad tidings."

New Year's Day is the name-day of Jesus. Perhaps this thought may strike you as strange. If so, then you cannot with attention have observed that in St. Luke's Gospel (ii. 21) it is clearly stated, that the name of Jesus was given to the Saviour on the eighth day after his birth. You must also be unacquainted with the pious custom, which for more than thirteen centuries has prevailed in the Christian Church, of remembering the Lord's circumcision on the first day of the first month. When, in the fifth century, the believers were but too often tempted to share the heathenish pleasures and dissipations with which the transition from one year into another was celebrated, famous fathers of the Church tried to give a higher tendency to this mirth, by making the civil festival a day for Christian remembrance. They reminded the Church that the Lord, a week after his birth, (which at a very early period was celebrated on the 25th of December,) received the sign of God's ancient covenant, and thus was put under the law, that He might deliver us from the bond-service of the law. They pointed to the name which at that time had been given to Him on his heavenly Father's authority, as the best foundation for hope and consolation amid the questions and cares which cannot but rise in our minds at the commencement of the year. They commended to the Church that circumcision of the spirit and the heart, and thus tried to lead their hearers to put off the old man, instead of participating in heathenish and sinful recreations. It was an excellent custom to begin the new year in the name of Jesus, and could not but promise peace and joy for the future.

It is a remarkable circumstance that this name was borne by an excellent teacher in Israel, by a celebrated high-priest, and by a princely hero. I refer to Jesus, the son of Sirach; Joshua, the high-priest, of whom mention is made in the prophecy of Zechariah; and the son of Nun, who conquered Canaan at the command of God. It seems as though that which was imperfect in each of them was to come out in the highest perfection in our Lord. We know Him, the Teacher sent of God, the High-Priest of the new covenant, the King of kings, who, striving unto blood, disclosed a heavenly Canaan for sinners; and you know that never a name was borne with greater right than this holy name of Jesus. The whole of his earthly life may be called an illustration and confirmation of what is expressed in his name. When we confess our Lord under the name of Jesus, we confess Him as the only all-merciful and all-sufficient Saviour. We call Him by that name, because He saves us, makes us enjoy such spiritual blessings as it hath never entered into the heart of man to conceive. Let us observe what the name of Jesus gives us, and what it asks of us at the commencement of the new year. Let us observe that the profession of that name is an invaluable new year's blessing, and an inviolable new year's duty.

We are in a world that changes every moment. As the days which lay between the memorial day of our Lord's birth and that of his circumcision have passed away, so the months and years of our life pass like dreams. How many changes are lying behind us, and those changes not always from the bad to good, but also—too often, alas!—from bad to worse! Some calculation which we thought could not fail, has failed nevertheless: now some friendship, which was to last till death, has proved shorter than the past year: some glad expectation, some castle we thought was built upon a rock, has disappeared like a cloud. Oh world, world! how dost thou boil and foam, like an ever-moving sea, which sooner or later takes everything into its bottomless depths! Yet we fear thee not. Nay, we rejoice with a joy full of glory, for we profess the name of Jesus. After a lapse of eighteen centuries, not one jot or tittle of the word spoken by the angel has fallen to the ground: "He shall save his people from their sins." Everything is not perishable. Here lies before us that living and everlasting Word, which implicitly or explicitly bears on each page that beautiful name to which the words of the old poet may well be applied—"Thy name is as ointment poured forth!" Ye mourning ones, who on the evening of the old year, nearly choked by your tears, sobbed, "Call me Mara, for the Almighty hath dealt very bitterly with me!" have not lost everything. There is one Friend, one Helper and Saviour. With the name of Jesus on their lips, our pious ones have gone in peace, and when we see our last hour approach, we also will cling to that name, though that which is dearest to us should turn from us.

What has not changed since that name was first given to the son of Mary? More than fifty generations have pronounced it, either in mockery or adoration, and have departed to that place from whence there is no return. But that name yet shines as in the light of an eternal morning, it yet sounds as melodious in the ears of Christians as it did to those who first believed in it. And as is the name so is He who bears it, the same yesterday, to-day, and for ever. He has still that same willingness to supply spiritual wants which He displayed when, for the first time, He listened to the voice of the sick entreating his help. He has still that same faithfulness for his friends which He evinced when He loved his disciples to the end. So here indeed is something which does not change. It is his person, his word, his work. These stand like granite rocks, in the midst of the stream of time. In the sky, where clouds float restlessly to and fro, one fixed star shines down into our eyes: that star is the name of Jesus.

But New Year's Day points forward to a debt which increases with every year. Alas! with how much more calmness would many of us look upon the quick speed of the years, if we were sure that our sins would decrease as our days increase. But our sins will increase, brethren; and the nearer we come to the hour in which we shall have to give account, the more our hope of being able to give account forsakes us. Sin is a poisonous plant, and the older it grows the deeper it strikes its roots into the impure heart. If we have truly learned to mourn over ourselves, the thought must pain us that again three hundred and sixty-five days lie before us, in which we shall every hour offend in so many things. Even the heart which has been made new, remains in many respects old, and in that old heart there dwelleth no good before God. No wonder that we often cast an anxious look at that ever-growing mountain of our shame. No wonder that we ask: Who shall deliver me, miserable one, from my own self? But rejoice, ye faint-hearted ones, for where sin has abounded, there grace has abounded much more. Yesterday, the past year brought in a thousand charges against us, but louder than those thousand sounded into the ear of God that voice: "It is finished, I have brought about reconciliation." Reconciliation! Ah, it is that which makes Jesus a Saviour.

But we rejoice with trembling; for in the feeling of our weakness we cast an eye upon the task which increases with every new year. The life of a Christian is not a life of laziness. It is true that in one sense our life is a resting upon that which once and for ever has been finished on the Cross; but in another sense it remains a life of incessant work and strife, and earnest running to obtain the crown. The more we feel that much is forgiven to us, the more we desire to fulfil our task; and therefore, on New Year's Day, we gird ourselves, that with fresh courage and increasing zeal we may perform what our hand finds to do. But how extensive the task is! and who are we who set about to fulfil it? The Lord has set us to a plough, from which we may not withdraw our hand, though the sweat should stream down our face, and our knees should stagger. First, there is the task of our daily work for the food that perishes, and for those who have the greatest claim upon our care. Then comes the task of benevolence, of living for others. This is that work by which the Lord knows his disciples and by which we wish that He may recognise us. Moreover, on some one of us perhaps a special task, a task of extraordinary weight, will be imposed, and of which he cannot think without trembling. Oh, every one who in any measure perceives what it means to suffer well, to fight well, would almost drop his hands in despondency and cry, "Who is able to do these things?" Who? Oh, brethren! rejoice with exceeding joy, for you profess the name of Jesus as your all-sufficient Saviour. What you cannot do, He can do for you; and as by his blood He has finished the work of your salvation, so He will by his Holy Spirit complete the work of your sanctification. Do not dread, then, the heavy burden which, as his disciples, you will have to carry through another year. Try to understand the full meaning of that word, "My grace is sufficient for thee, and my strength is made perfect in thy weakness." Do not say to yourself, "I am alone; I am getting old; I have little strength to dispose of, to do what I should like to do." Drop that I, and put Thou instead of it. The first question is, not, What you can? but what the Lord can. Not what you can do, but what He will do in you and by you. We do not this day take back one word of the profession which has so many a time proved a blessing to us. You may be weak, but you will never be forsaken; you may despair of yourself, but never of your Lord, who this year also will not rest till He has pulled up every weed in your field, and brought your harvest, ripened by Himself, into the barns of heaven.

We do not tremble at the future which this season always makes threatening to the sinner. No doubt the future, looked at as it is in itself, is not only uncertain, but dark. The prospect of all of us is wrapped in mist. The horizon to many of us is covered with dark clouds. Perhaps you have seen a worm gnawing at a lovely flower in your path, and you know that that worm will have finished its work ere this year draws to its close. Perhaps you have seen at a distance on your road a stumbling-block which you thought you would not be able to roll away or to avoid. We all of us, brethren, wish to-day that goodness and mercy may follow us; but to-morrow perhaps we shall exclaim, Who could have thought of such deliverances? And perhaps those amongst us who care least are first threatened. If to-day I could open the book of the future for only one single week, and if I could read it to you, I am certain that I should see faces which now are bright with joy turn pale as death. And as to the book of our life, who can tell how many of us are still calculating upon a long series of fresh chapters, although they are only a few lines from the end? But, brethren, we believe in the name of Jesus; we see the threatening storms abate, and a well-known voice sounds into our ear, "Fear not, I am the first and the last." What a thought is that for faith! There is One living in the universe whose office, whose calling, whose pleasure consists in nothing else than calling and leading us unto salvation! Whatever this year may bring upon me, it will all be instrumental in his hand for that end, and the most painful means will certainly be the best chosen. My enemies may rise against me, but they shall prove ministers unto my salvation. My dearest wishes may not be realised, but disappointments, even more than enjoyments prayed for with tears, will co-operate in ensuring my happiness. Strokes may come upon me which I cannot think of now without shuddering, but the Hand which shall inflict these is a Hand that will not crush but save me. Be welcome, then, thou new year of the Lord! To us thou art a year of his good pleasure. And blessed be thou, O Name praised above all names, which causest our cares to fly away even more quickly than our days. With Thee on our lips, and Thy Spirit in our hearts, we step on, not carelessly, yet without care, and say to our souls, Forward, in Jesus' name, forward!

It lies in the nature of things, brethren, that we who see so much change round about us, should also change with the years, in some respects at least.

Many an opinion of ours for which perhaps in former time we would have died, must be abandoned as untenable; and with the increase of experience we often feel compelled to reject as erroneous what hitherto we had adopted as true. Is it the same with the profession which we are now renewing at the commencement of this year? I think, brethren, I may reckon upon your unanimous consent, when I declare that a change in the great fundamental doctrines of our Confession, upon which our godly fathers calmly fronted eternity, would be no improvement. Let me therefore beseech you to be faithful in your profession of the eternal truth. For other foundation can no man lay than that is laid. Jesus is the Alpha and the Omega in all the work of salvation. Inasmuch as that truth is not only lodged in your head, but living in your heart, I think, brethren, you have felt peace up to this day. What, then, can you do better than hold fast this profession without wavering? Some seem to be of opinion that in the sphere of religious and Christian life there ought from time to time to be a change similar to that which is seen in dress, custom, and fashion. They call that which formerly was deemed to be true, obsolete; and that which formerly was looked upon as an error, they would now receive as new light. As if for each century there could be a special truth, different altogether from former ones! As if human reason could now comprehend what it never before could fathom! As if the Christian Church could, with regard to the highest vital questions, for eighteen centuries have been led in the dark by the Spirit of the Lord! To discover on a sudden, in the second half of the nineteenth century, a truth in which not one of the Apostles or Reformers would recognise the Gospel! But for the matter having such a sad bearing, brethren, we should almost feel inclined to mock these people. But with great boldness we repeat the words of Paul, "Beware lest any man spoil you through philosophy and vain deceit, after the traditions of men, and not after Christ." Not that we are enemies of progress and development, or what pertains thereto. We, on the contrary, desire to rank foremost amongst the advocates of true enlightenment. We desire to promote that progress which does not begin with digging up the foundations, but goes on building upon those foundations laid by God himself. We desire to further that development by which we learn more and more to understand and to apply in every direction what God has revealed. But let this care for the preservation of truth be combined with cordial faith. Let our profession of Christ be a believing profession. As it was at the close of last year, so it will be at the beginning of the present year. They are not all Israel which are of Israel, and many a one who utters a pure and sound confession of truth, does no more than merely say, "Lord! Lord!" If there are amongst us those whose consciences tell them this is their case, we should in this new year, which for us may be the last, render ourselves guilty of gross unfaithfulness, if we let them go in peace in a way which cannot possibly lead to true peace. We must point out the imminent danger, for they live only for themselves, and have not yet become the property of the only Redeemer. They rejoice to-day in innumerable blessings, but they have hitherto despised the greatest of all blessings—Christ himself. Perhaps their name is found at the top of this year's register of spiritual death. Oh, what must become of them, if they continue thus from year to year! Oh wonderful long-suffering of God! You are not yet taken away in the midst of your sins. The lovely Gospel still sounds in your ears, instead of the trumpet of eternal judgment. Be quick, we beseech you, for your life's sake; for your days make themselves wings, and God knows how soon the night in which nobody can work will cast its dark shades over you. God is still in Christ, offering you his friendship; and this first day of the year is again a proof that He has no pleasure in your death. Come and give your hand to the Lord, and let this day be the day of a union not to be repented, with the only Redeemer. Thus may the old things pass away and all things become new.

Let us boldly profess the Lord Jesus. There is a time to keep silence; but the time to speak has now come for all those who love the Lord Jesus in sincerity and truth. It is not likely that the spirit of apostasy which has gone out into the world, will be banished for good within the ensuing two weeks. Innumerable voices rise now-a-days to humble the Lord, and to exalt men. Let us, as his faithful disciples, feel our most holy calling to be witnesses of Jesus in this world, in word and deed. Such a bold profession does not promise us much rest here below. But the reproach which the Christian has to bear for Christ's sake becomes his honour in the estimation of the angels. Let us come out, then, boldly, though with the greatest discretion. Let us this year also try to promote the speedy coming of that day when every knee shall bow to Jesus, and every tongue shall confess that He is the Lord, to the glory of God the Father.

To the glory of God the Father! Yes, let our confession of the name of Jesus be glorifying to God. This is our highest, our only New Year's duty. Our stay here below is short, and we shall never return again. What, then, can be the end of this transient existence, which we number by years, but of which God has already calculated the hours? What else than that we, like Jesus, should answer to the sacred name which we bear? As He has proved a Saviour, so let us prove true Christians, and saved ones through Him. As He placed Himself under the law of the old covenant, so let us bend every day afresh under the law of his love, taking every morning his easy yoke and his light burden upon our shoulders. As his life was one continuous obedience, so let ours be one continuous thank-offering. On this day, more than ever before, let our resolve be to glorify God in body and soul, which are his. Whatever may be the names we have received at our birth, let them only be known to the angels in heaven as names of his friends. And may we, through grace, at the end of our journey, receive that new name which no man knoweth saving he that receiveth it.—Amen.

EVENING HYMN.

HELP me, my God and King,
Rightly Thy praise to sing,
And Thee for everything
Ever adore :

For all Thy light to-day,
Lighting my darksome way,
With its celestial ray
Going before :

For that rich heavenly food,
Feast of Thy flesh and blood,
Life, strength, and healthful mood
Quick'ning in me :

And for my safe retreat
From the world's storm and heat,
Under Thy mercy-seat
Hiding in Thee.

Lord, in Thy loving voice
Let my cold heart rejoice ;
Oh, may my ready choice
Make Thee my Guest !*

Sombre the night, and drear,
Oh, let me find Thee near,
My fainting soul to cheer
With quiet rest !

On that dear breast of Thine
May I my head recline,
And may that touch divine
Thrill through my soul !

Cleansing away all dross,
Counting all else but loss,
May I Thy sacred Cross
Take for my goal !

Strong in the strength of God,
Freed from my sinful load,
Daily to tread the road
Leading to Thee.

Shield, sword, and helmet—Thine,
Strength, courage, aid—divine,
Only this body—mine ;
So let it be.

Keen be the fight below,
Hard be the tempter's blow,
Nothing can overthrow Whom Thou dost keep.

Waiting Thy great behest,
I lay me down to rest ;
Calm Thou my troubled breast,
Grant me sweet sleep.

E. S. D.

THE PASTOR'S WIDOW.

A FEW years ago our market was daily attended—unless, indeed, the weather was desperate—by an elderly woman, remarkable neither in face, attire, nor anything else. Her dress was always simplicity itself ; she was middle-sized, had rather a commonplace face at the first glance, but what drew my attention to her was the regularity of her attendance, for which there seemed no adequate reason, since she had, generally speaking, only a very small basket on her arm, and sometimes none at all. When she had made her purchase she did not go straight home like other people, but regularly made the circuit of the whole market ; and when the weather was fine and the stalls full, often visited some of them two or three times over. Unconsciously I took to observing what she was looking for, and what it was she bought ; she had never come in my way as a bargainer, never snapped up a pigeon or fowl I happened to want. Indeed, her purchases seemed all on a small scale ; belonging not to the animal but vegetable world, and even of vegetables she chose the cheapest and soonest cooked, and with them almost always a little fruit. At times too she would ask the price of flowers,—a little rose-bush or pot of pansies, and I noticed that very often the market-women would give her a few lettuce leaves unasked, whence I concluded that she kept a little bird, and in all probability lived alone. Now, purchases to this amount need not have detained her two minutes ; there must have been some other attraction in the market-place, and when once I began fairly to observe her, I soon discovered what it was.

Evidently, she took an infinite delight in the vegetables and fruits themselves, apart from any idea of eating them. But it was orchard-fruit that most fascinated her eyes and heart. Mere bush-fruit she seemed scarcely to notice, but apples and pears were her supreme delight,—there was a new exclamation at every kind she discovered. When the new ones came in, and new and old lay in the basket together, her new year seemed to begin, and she noted and named every fresh appearance, just as a field-marshal reviews his regiment.

I began, too, to notice how well the market-women knew her tastes. They would beckon to her to show her new kinds, and ask their names. There was, in short, a quite peculiar tie between this good woman and the market-wives, and a very friendly one. The interest that she took in their stalls, her admiration of fine fruit, her judicious discrimination of the relative merits of different kinds, and useful hints as to storing them, &c., were all pleasant to the sellers, who evidently liked to see her and to exchange a few good-humoured words, as a variety in the monotony of marketing.

One winter day, when it was bitter cold and slippery, it so happened that she fell down in going out of the market, and hurt her leg and arms very badly. She was soon raised up and set on her feet. No limb was broken. With great suffering she could contrive to walk, but not alone. Although I had very little acquaintance with her, I could not do less than offer her my arm, which she took gratefully, but with all sorts of excuses and apologies, such as were customary in my day, when every silly person had not yet got to believing that the world was created expressly for him, and that his fellow-creatures were in it to wait upon his convenience. It seems to be considered old-fashioned now-a-days for one man to thank another; but what would you have? If people have left off gratitude to God, why not to each other?

I can tell you it was no easy matter to get the poor creature, who was in terrible pain, back to her own part of the town.

Her lowly room was indescribably clean and neat, and as I had rightly surmised, there was a bird in the window, who greeted us with cheerful chirps and twittering.

"You poor dear," she said, "you think you are going to get your salad, and I have none for you to-day."

Quite exhausted, she sank down on a chair.

"My Heavenly Father!" she murmured, "what am I to do now?"

It seemed that she was quite alone in the world. Only a charwoman came in once a day with wood and water. She did everything else for herself. She rented this one little room, but had nothing to do with any one of the other inhabitants of the house, no acquaintanceship with them, except a mutual bow if they chanced to meet in the doorway. Such complete isolation as this may go on pretty well for a time, but earlier or later something is sure to happen, and the question "What next?" often gets forced upon the lonely with a suddenness that takes away their very breath.

On this occasion it was I who put it, and not the half-fainting sufferer. What next, indeed? There I was, all alone; the charwoman would not come till six,—it was only ten now. Had I been at home I could have sent for help; but I was afraid of leaving her alone, and then, whom was I to call in this strange house? There was not even a bell in the room. In the midst of my perplexity, however, there was a knock at the door, and a merry childish face peeped in and said—

"Mamma sent me to see if she could be of any use to the old lady. She heard that she had come back poorly."

Here was an angel in time of need. She came in, and in the most compassionate way began to stroke the poor sufferer, who could not reply for coughing.

"Could your mamma come here herself?" said I, not noticing the shaking of the old lady's head, and the child was off before she could get out a word.

"Dear me!" she said at last, "what can you be thinking of! Such a distinguished lady!"

But the lady herself soon entered, distinguished no doubt, but a sweet-looking creature as well, who approached the invalid in the most sympathising manner, but bowed very stiffly to me. I set it down for pride, and thought to myself, "Ay, ay, they are all alike;" but later I found out it was shyness.

And now, what next? Why, first of all we decided that we must get her to bed, and then I would go and fetch my own doctor. The lady said she would have sent for hers, only he was rather too much run after, and when once he had laid out the order of his day, nothing could get him to depart from it: if they ran after him with the intelligence that his own wife was dying, she believed he was capable of saying, "She must wait, for I have still four patients down on my list." Meanwhile I fully expected the lady to send for her maid; but no, she took the matter in hand herself, to the inexpressible confusion of the worthy widow.

"Impossible—out of the question—the sheriff's lady—Madam, I beg, I entreat—I shall die of shame."

And when we came to her left foot we were nearly the death of her, for as the lady tried to draw off the stocking, she in the intensity of her distress and anxiety to prevent it, lost her balance and nearly fell off the chair. To be sure I caught her and broke the fall, but still the wrench she gave herself made her scream, and brought tears into her eyes. We had the greatest difficulty to get her into bed, but at last it was done, and she might have rested quietly but for her politeness and her scruples.

"And if I only knew what to do,—and she is not put out with me. She can do everything for me that I want."

Upon which the lady explained that the allusion was to the charwoman who came once a day, and that the widow thought that would be attendance enough. But this the doctor would not hear of. The case required far more treatment, and he proposed to have the patient carried at once to the hospital, where all the townspeople had a right to be received gratis. He was physician there, he said, and he could promise that she would be perfectly well cared for. But, to our great astonishment, the pastor's widow positively refused; she could not venture into such a large house, could not endure to be amidst numbers; it was impossible to live in a large room where there was no rest or sleep day or night; a little room was such a comfort in sickness. We all tried to overcome her objections, told her a few hours would reconcile her to the change, and vaunted the comforts of the institution,—even Lisette, the lady's maid, taking a lively part in the argument, for she feared her mistress's kindness would give her some trouble.

The good soul knew and felt that this repugnance of hers must strike us all as childish and unreasonable, and therefore her agitation became very great, when all at once the sheriff's lady interposed:

"Never mind, my dear madam, don't distress yourself; there is no necessity for anything of the kind. I can easily understand your liking better to be alone than with a dozen others: when you want to sleep, somebody else is sure to begin coughing. I should feel just the same. We shall be sure to find a good nurse."

The doctor was not one of those who are incapable of placing themselves in another person's situation, and get angry at the least difference of opinion.

"Very well, my good lady," he said, "I have not another word to say. If only we get Mrs. X. (he meant me) to look about for us, depend upon it we shall get a suitable nurse."

"Thank you for your confidence in me," said I; and the thing was settled. I went off to seek a nurse, who was, in the first instance, to call upon the doctor for further instructions, and the lady undertook to sit with the patient in the meantime.

Thus, then, a so-called accident had brought together, and into friendly relations, persons who else would never have known each other; and but for it I should have been poorer in kindly memories and richer in prejudices.

The consequences of the accident were far more serious than the good woman at first anticipated. The human frame is pretty much like a bottle of wine, which will keep clear and beautiful to the eye for years and years if you let it stand undisturbed, but a rude shake or two will so completely change its aspect, you would hardly believe it was the same wine; nor will it soon clear again. And, in the same way, let an elderly person, who has long led a quiet uniform life, meet with any untoward accident that shakes the frame and changes the course of habit, ten to one some latent mischief will develop itself, so that the original accident becomes a secondary thing, and not unfrequently results in death. The widow had hoped to be up and about in the course of the next week, but she was sadly mistaken; she had to put off her hope from week to week, and meekly, though with many a sigh, had to resign it as each week came round. The injuries would not heal properly; the limbs seemed to lose their power, and by degrees a general debility set in. The doctor did what he could, but gradually took to an ominous shake of the head. The nurse was very kind; I had been fortunate in my choice; not only was she skilful in her office, but she got fond of the invalid, who suffered so patiently, never ordered her about, but humbly asked for what she absolutely required, and as much as possible respected her sleep.

The nurse, however, could not give up her whole time to one patient; she had several valuable clients whom she could not afford to lose, and therefore arrangements had to be made to prevent the invalid being left alone. The sheriff's lady and myself, between us, contrived that the solitary intervals should be very short indeed, and I must say that it was this lady who took the greater part of the responsibility, and that not by sending Lisette or any other deputy, but in her own person. Nay, even when she knew that I was there, she would come down with her work; and help to while the time away.

What struck us most of all about our widow was her entire and singular isolation. She asked for no one, sent to summon no one, nor were any inquiries made for her. Her bird seemed her only friend, and he would go on ruthlessly chirping till he got to her; and no lettuce leaves seemed thoroughly to please him but those he pecked from her hand. I must also except the market-women, who were greatly surprised at her absence, and expressed much concern when they heard of her accident, and sometimes sent her presents; and here and there one gave me a flower, another an apple, to take to her, saying they had put them aside expressly for her, knowing them to be favourites. The example being once set, so many came to offer me similar tokens of remembrance, that I should have wanted a maid to carry them; but I begged that they would not all give at once, but from time to time send a little present to the poor lady, who would not be among them again, I feared, for a long time, if ever. But, to be sure, the ecstacy of delight to the good soul was to think of being remembered; and then the beauty of the apples!—in short, every time I took her anything she used to cry with sheer happiness. So childish a spirit I never had met with in all my life. And what a precious treasure this childlike spirit is, the world little understands; 'tis one that passes understanding, like the peace of God. The so-called happiness that most of us are chasing, strays beyond the confines of both these, and is nothing but a will-o'-the-wisp or a haunting spectre.

It will be easily understood that we wished to know whether she had any relations or friends whom she would like to apprise of her condition; but we were afraid of asking her abruptly, for fear she might fancy we wanted to get rid of our services to her. To our individual inquiries on this head she replied, that there was no one but the guardian of the Orphans' Institute who knew her at all, and she would gladly let him rest as long as ever she could. Not that he was ill-intentioned, but he was a rough over-bearing man who could not tolerate the least opposition to his will; and would, if put out, run on as though life and death were in his hands. She actually trembled in speaking of him. But what was her consternation and alarm when she found out that this said despotic guardian was my cousin? I had all the work in the world to compose her, and convince her that I was in no way offended. I was fond of my cousin, indeed, but far too well accustomed to his infirmity to mind it being commented on or laughed at.

He was a man of the old-fashioned stamp, honourable and upright at heart, and in private matters gentle and pleasant enough; but once let him get on official ground, and clouds of majesty encompassed him about; contradiction was high treason; he became harsh, haughty, magisterial; in short, I could well understand the impression he had made on the quiet widow, though I wondered how the two had chanced to come in contact.

Everything combined to make me anxious to raise the curtain of her past, and to learn how she could possibly be the lonely creature she was. But it was not I alone who felt this curiosity; the sheriff's lady shared it to the full. One day I met her outside the room, and she began:

"Do tell me whether you really know as little as I do about the history of our good widow; I would give anything to have some insight into it. She never makes the least allusion to it, which increases my wonder."

"Just so with me," replied I.

"Now look here," she went on; "you are a person of courage and resolution; do devote this afternoon to finding out. It is such thoroughly bad weather, that we are sure that no one will disturb us, and 'tis just the time for listening to a story, and she is so kind I don't think she will refuse; and whatever she tells us, she can trust us to keep to ourselves."

So I consented; and as soon as we were both comfortably seated and the knitting going on, I began:

"What would you have said, Mrs. ——, if I had brought my cousin in here to see you? I stumbled upon him almost at your door, and had half a mind to tell him he was but a sorry guardian after all, and looked very ill after his ward. What a face to be sure he would have pulled!"

But I soon repented of my mischievous speech, it threw the poor soul into such a state of alarm.

"Oh!" she cried, "if only I may be spared that! I do believe if I were to see him suddenly look in, the shock would kill me. What things he would say to me for not having announced my illness to him, and for refusing to go to the hospital; he would have me carried off there upon the spot."

After we had quieted and comforted her as well as we could, I went on to beg that she would tell us why she had such a dread of the worthy guardian, and also to give us some insight into her past life; we knew nothing about her but her name, and in our town the custom was to get full possession of a person's family history as far back as their grandparents before we could feel acquainted with them. At first she excused herself on the score of having really no history to tell.

"O dear!" she said. "How could such an insignificant creature as I am have met with anything remarkable?"

When we told her that this fact alone, of her knowing no one, and seeming to have dropped down out of the sky, was in itself truly remarkable, she said it was perfectly natural. She did not belong to our town, but to ——; and so she suddenly found herself launched upon her history: and once fairly off, she forgot her scruples.

"When I was young," she began, "I little thought of ever becoming a citizen of B——. I belonged to one of the small towns in which, as the proverb says, you may pour out a quart of cream at the higher gate and gather it again at the lower without losing a drop. My father was the gate-keeper, and had besides to look after the town clock, and to see that it kept good time. It was an important post, but a difficult one too, for the clock was old and had a trick of standing; and if my father did not find this out at once, the mayor, or the lawyer's lady, or some other of the first quality in the little town were sure to be down upon him, and send him flying off with a threat that if the time were not better looked after, a change would have to be made. Just under the gate my father had set up a little shop, both as a source of profit and amusement. There the very best matches were to be had, as well as other things,—tobacco, for instance, and coffee; and in winter, walnuts and chestnuts too. My father was a widower, and had no child but me, nor could he afford to keep a maid. He was not one of those who fuss themselves about time. He ate his dinner when it was ready, and did not expect it to be always to a minute, like the lawyer's lady, with her pointed nose. I often was rather perplexed what to do to make the two ends meet, but I was contented. It never occurred to me that we were badly off, and the Sundays were always beautiful days. There was church in the morning, and time for the most delightful meditations; and when Monday came, I began to look forward to the next Sunday. And so I lived on, quite happy, though quietly so. I had, indeed, very few playfellows, and was generally at home, where there was more than enough to do; but my father was very kind to me, and what better did I want? To be sure, I had my troubles every now and then,—if a flower I was fond of died, or my father gave me a slight reproof. One day—but really I do not know how to tell you this part; I must skip this," said the old lady, positively blushing.

But we were well aware that this would turn out the most interesting part of her story, and therefore we never ceased begging and coaxing till she began again. "One day—one day"—but she stammered over it a good deal, and it was some time before we could get her fairly started.

"One day, then—it was on a Thursday, and getting on to evening—a short gentleman made his appearance in my little shop, and inquired for tinder. I served him as I should any one else. He was a long time in choosing; I gave him my advice, and at length he went off without my thinking more about him than that he was a kind-mannered gentleman, had a lovely voice, and no doubt sang well. I wished I could hear him.

"The next Monday he again appeared suddenly before me, and quite startled me, for I had entirely forgotten him. He was full of praises of the tinder, and inquired whether we had tobacco as well, his being nearly done. I said we had; and he said as he had been so much pleased with the tinder, he might trust us as to tobacco, and I had to put him up a small parcel, which I did in fear and trembling, lest he should not approve it. At last Monday came again, and he too, saying he had never bought any tobacco so good as ours, strange to say; but it was not always the largest shops that had the best things, and in future he should get everything he could from us. I did not know what to say in reply; and but that he spoke so kindly, I should have thought he was surely laughing at us.

"In the evening I told my father that a gentleman had been to the shop, who meant always to buy his tobacco from us, and I should like to know his name. When my father had asked what he was like, and heard that he always appeared on a Monday, he pronounced that it must be the Helmsvale curate, who was in the habit of coming to town on that day, and got laughed at because he always bought a small bottle of some stomachic elixir at the apothecary's. It made me very angry, to think that people should laugh at so kind a gentleman; and next time he came I was the more attentive, because I felt sorry for him. He chatted, too, longer than usual, and when I called him Reverend Sir, seemed pleased at my knowing who he was. He told me that Monday afternoon was the only time he had for recreation; early on Tuesday he had to set to work again studying for the following Sunday.

"Now then I became fonder than ever of the Sunday, because Monday came next. All the week through I used to think, 'Oh, if Monday was but here!' and I was always in great alarm lest my father should send me out on a Monday afternoon, and the curate find no one in the shop, and so buy his tobacco elsewhere.

"On one occasion, just as he had pocketed his purchases, a sudden snow-storm came on. It got quite dark, and the snow blew in at the door, so that I could do nothing but shut it to and ask him to step into our room, for, with the door shut, we could hardly have turned round in the little shop. As it was, he was covered with snow, and I should have liked to have shaken it off, but did not, out of respect.

"From that time we got on more friendly terms, and he used to come, not only into the shop, but the room, to have a look at the rose-tree. My father thought a great deal of him, both because it was an honour to be on familiar terms with the clergy, and because he listened so patiently to my father's droll stories, and would laugh at them heartily, which was a new thing to my dear father, who hardly ever met with anyone who had not heard them before.

"Now people even began to tease me about a love affair. I looked upon it merely as one of their customary jokes, and laughed with them. All I feared was, that the curate might come to hear of it, and get his tobacco elsewhere, which would have been a loss any way, particularly to my father, who so enjoyed a talk with him."

At that we both smiled, and the sheriff's lady said,

"But you, my dear madam, would you not have been grieved, too, if the curate had left off his visits?"

"No doubt I should, afterwards," she replied, "but I was not conscious then of my own real feelings. To be sure, I used to think what a fine position a pastor's wife had: how she could have her own way in house and garden, and go about her parish like a queen amongst the other women, particularly if she had such a good, learned gentleman for her husband as the curate was. But that such good fortune could ever fall to me didn't enter my head, nor did he give me any room for thinking of it. He was not one of the young gentry, who pay compliments to every girl they meet. Nothing of the kind ever passed his lips; he was kind, but grave; always called me Miss Susan; never shook hands with me; never spoke of settling, or of future prospects, or bragged about his sermons; only sighed sometimes over his difficulty in composing them."

"Those men are the most dangerous of all, my dear lady," I broke in; "they only humble themselves that they may be praised by others."

"No, indeed no; that he never did; he was far too sincere for that; he was not like folks now-a-days. And it would have done him no good either. I could not have praised him, nor should I like to have told him what people said; that they were getting rather tired of him at Helmsvale: he had been there so long—not that there was much to find fault with, either, except that he was so short in stature.

"But one Monday came and did not bring him, and waiting and watching were all in vain; the whole week through not a creature came from Helmsvale of whom I might inquire whether the curate was sick. To be sure, he had missed one Monday before, but then he had told me of it beforehand, and taken two packets of tobacco. Ah! it was a long week, indeed, and my father and I did nothing but wonder what had happened to him. The following Monday the weather was so dreadful that we decided he never could come. However, on the mere chance, I thought I would make it twelve o'clock a little earlier than usual, so as to get our dinner well over and things all out of the way, and have time to—well, I will not say dress myself a little, my father would have given me a proper lecture for that—but at all events it could do no harm if I gave my face an extra wash, and chanced to put on the kerchief I wore on Sunday.

"As we were in the middle of our dinner, a knock came to the door, which indeed often happened, for people had a way of leaving things under our care, and my father called out, 'Come in.' And in came—his reverence the curate. Perhaps we had heard that he had been appointed to the living of Garnethill?

"No, indeed; and very kind we took it of the reverend gentleman that he should take the trouble of announcing this to us himself. But there was more to come, which quite overwhelmed both my father and me. He went on to ask me in marriage, and dwelt so beautifully on his being an orphan, and alone in the world, and that he wanted a wife to be father, mother, and all in all to him, that I can't help crying to this very day when I think it over. Then he told how that he thought he had found all he wanted in me, in such a way that my father wept out loud like a child, so that I did not know whether he was pleased or not. When he ceased speaking, neither of us could answer him a word. And thus I, a poor gate-keeper's daughter, was to become a pastor's wife, and a citizen of B——! It was too much for my head to take in: it did not seem real. I felt as if in a dream.

"My father was the first to get the use of his tongue, and he went on about the honour, and our poverty, and I, in my confusion, murmured something about not leaving my father, for how could the shop be carried on without me?

"Then came the best of all. If that was all the objection Miss Susan had to make, he said, he had anticipated it, and could, he thought, overcome it. He was about to propose that my father should live with us; it would be a great benefit to him if he could make up his mind to do so. There was glebe land with the parsonage that he should not know what to do with; he did not understand country pursuits, and my father did most thoroughly, he knew, and could therefore be of the greatest assistance to him.

"The next morning the news was all over the town, and before noon our own pastor came to tell my father that, having heard such a report, he felt it his duty to come and warn him of it, and he sincerely regretted that his daughter should have been so indiscreet as to carry on a flirtation with a curate. Then my father replied that I had done nothing of the kind, but that the curate had been appointed to a living, and that quite unexpectedly I had become engaged to him yesterday. Our minister would not believe it, and thought we had mistaken jest for earnest; but when he was really convinced, he wished me grace to profit by my good fortune. But I was still, he said, far from being qualified for such a position, and gladly would he lend me all the assistance he could, and I might come to his house whenever I liked. He added that he must say he never should have expected such a thing: but it was true enough that still waters run deep.

"You can easily imagine the noise it made in our little town; but no one seemed to grudge me my happiness, not even those at the parsonage, where there were seven daughters. Everybody was kind to me, and seemed to think that my good fortune was an honour.

"I had to go over to B——, where I had never been before. It was a grand day for me, and I enjoyed it much, only with fear and trembling. He led me everywhere by the hand, else I should never have had courage to walk about, and it was a great relief to me when we left the gates behind us.

"The following day was the most important in my life; it was that on which our banns were given out, and we went to church together. After that we were busy, indeed. My father was resolved to leave none of our poor furniture behind. What we had, he said, we need not buy, and that was money saved at all events; added to which, under his auspices, the curate bought some very nice things; and as to presents, I had so many I was quite ashamed. I never could have believed people had been so fond of us. At first we thought we had better not have all our effects carried to the parsonage at once, but my father decided that the sight of such a load would inspire the parishioners with respect, and went with it a day before, to get all ready for us. The next morning we got quietly married, and that evening arrived at the parsonage.

"'Our new pastor's wife is still quite a child,' the villagers said; 'but she is one of the children who will turn out a good kind of woman; she has no pride.' Oh, no, indeed, I was not proud: I only felt that Heaven had opened and taken me in.

"Many laughed at us, no doubt, but we were not aware of it. And then we, especially my husband, had such a genuine goodwill to all men, that the laughter soon died down, and it was allowed that he was one of the right sort, and would help every one if he could. But it was my father who was the most looked up to. He had just the proper self-respect; sat quite at his ease in our mayor's company, and had always plenty to talk of, as well as plenty to do, for our glebe, and especially our orchard, kept his hands full. We lived very much to ourselves. The village was remote: nor had we much intercourse with the other pastors round; my husband was shy, and I still more so. I can quite understand that we were of little value in society; for, if not stupid, we could not prove ourselves the reverse. But we were none the less happy for that. My husband with his flock, my father with his fields, and I with my garden—the narrower our interests, the more engrossing they seemed, and the joy of one was shared by the other two. And our joys were new, day by day; each season brought baskets full, and we were like children in our delight over our crops. My husband often declared that he had never believed any human being could be so blest, and least of all himself.

"Nor was my father less happy than my husband: and moreover he ascribed all our prosperity to his own efforts. We should see, he said, how differently things would go on but for him; we were but a foolish inexperienced pair, and had no idea of management. And we fully believed him. We both felt that we were blest far above our deserts, and indeed I was so childish that I often felt quite ashamed of it, and almost sad in the conviction that it could never last. For small as our income really was, our wants being still less, we always felt ourselves to have all and abound, and I do not believe a happier household could have been found than ours for many, many a year.

"The first blow was my father's sudden death. He had retained his energies so completely that we never thought of losing him. He made a sad gap in our life; we missed him in every way. And then we had no children, and began to feel a conscientious scruple in living so completely to ourselves, while others were oppressed by family cares. We thought God meant us to come to this conclusion, and had sent my father's death to point us to it. Then we were childishly delighted to find a little orphan, to whom we both took—a lovely boy, with light curling hair; and we rejoiced in the thought of bringing him up well—the more so, that he came of a very wild stock. We got inexpressibly fond of the child; he was our little idol; never off the lap of one or the other, and allowed to have his own way in everything. Yes, indeed, we forgot our garden and our orchard in our new treasure; he might pull our best apples, or knock off the heads of our prettiest flowers: we could not make up our minds to thwart him, though we looked on in sorrow and dismay. We thought that he only behaved so ill because he knew no better, and would get more manageable by-and-by.

"But no; on the contrary, he grew worse and worse, ruder, and more defiant. Do what we would we could not elicit a spark of love or a trace of sorrow. He was a tyrant to all other children in the village, and brought down much censure upon us for our bad bringing up of him; in short, he was a heart-break to us every way.

"God knows what would have become of us all at last if our dear Lord had not mercifully taken matters into his own hand. He removed the boy out of our keeping: sent his angel, Death, to bring him away to Himself. We understood at last how gracious God had been in freeing us from a self-imposed responsibllity. He gave us no children. He knew our hands were too weak to rule them. Why should we have tried to be wiser than He, and to undertake duties He had not imposed? For all that He would not suffer a soul to be lost through our folly. The boy was not left to grow mature in sin or to die hardened, nor we to the agonising conviction of his spiritual ruin lying at our door.

"This was our season of bitterest trial, and taught us to feel the incompleteness of this world. After it was over, our days again flowed on peacefully and lovingly, each brought some good and most sweet joy. We became very skilful in the cultivation of fruit and vegetables, and our garden supplied half our neighbours.

"And so it was, that a long series of years glided away, and we were already getting old, when my husband suddenly died. This blow I had never thought of. He had not been laid up at all, and scarcely seemed less well than usual. He was always rather given to doctoring himself, probably because he had been delicate from childhood, so that it seemed a thing of course that he should be slightly ailing, and a little more or less was not easily observed. It was a thunderbolt out of a cloudless sky when I so suddenly lost him. Then I discovered the whole extent of my love for him: that I had lived, as it were, in his life for nearly forty years: that he had been my father, my husband, my child—my all! And yet at first I could not estimate all that was buried in his grave. The village had become my world: I knew of none outside it. All my hope and consolation would have been in remaining there, with my dear trees, near my church, near his grave. The smallest room would have been enough for me, and I knew of one that suited perfectly. We had never saved any money; true, we had spent little on ourselves; but that people were aware of, and therefore they required the more, and we both were fond of giving, and so nothing could be put by. But when everything was sold, there was a small sum left; and besides, I had a claim on two widows' funds, and therefore hoped to be able to live on the proceeds. But the gentleman in office would not hear of it. He told me plump and plain that I was a stupid woman, and did not understand the case, and that when I had removed from the parsonage, and had everything to buy, I should have great difficulty in getting on; whereas, if I lived at B——, there were civil rights that I could have the benefit of. But I thought I should have died at the very idea of moving, and therefore had the courage to oppose him. 'Very well, try it,' said he; 'we shall soon see who is right.'

"Alas! he was right; but I will not go over all my sorrowful experience of how much kindness and consideration for me was buried in my husband's grave. I had to write and tell the guardian I could not make the two ends meet; to which he replied, 'of course not,' and he would look me out a lodging in B——. Ah! that was a season of weeping, and the consolations of my neighbours about the firewood gratis, and other perquisites, only made me more wretched. I began to fancy they were tired of me, and were glad I was going away, which distressed me bitterly, yet made my nerves easier. When at length the parting came, my heart nearly broke. The trees were all in full blossom, but many eyes, too, were wet, and many an old woman said to me: 'I shall not know what to do with myself when you are gone. Here we shall never meet again, but please God we shall elsewhere, and perhaps before long. I am breaking every day, and you are dreadfully pulled down of late.'

"And now I found myself in a broad stony street, and knew no one but the guardian of the widow and orphans' fund; and if I chanced to see him, I always felt as if he were the bear out of the pit coming to devour me. It was ungrateful of me, too, for he had cared for me like a father—had taken this room, and put all I wanted into it, and at the same time admonished me sharply not to become a useless gadabout, as most of the pastors' widows who came to B—— did. Alas! he meant well, but he little knew how wide of the mark he was. Timid by nature, and made more so by sorrow, I never made an acquaintance—nay, at first I never ventured out of my room, saw no trees, no flowers, heard no song of birds. I learnt then what is meant by dying of depression—of the feeling that you are forsaken by every living being, are nothing to anybody in all the world, made to live on without sympathy and without affection.

"And so for some terrible weeks I did live, and should soon have died, but that God in mercy put it into my head to bring some living thing or other into my room. I ventured as far as the market, and all at once found myself restored to a familiar world. I was acquainted with everything in the stalls, and accustomed to speak to country women. I bought a few flower-pots, and next my little bird, and later took to going daily to the market. That was my life, and when I got accustomed to walking about I soon found other places where I could enjoy trees and flowers, especially the beautiful churchyard and pleasure-gardens outside the town, where no one goes on working days. And so I gradually got reconciled to the town, but I made no acquaintance except the market-women, who were always kind to me.

"And so I lived a quietly happy life here, such as I did not believe it possible to know again: and if ever I fell into low spirits, my little bird would come and peck at me till I began to play with him. Then, I found my money go much further than in the country, for no one ever asked me for anything, so that sometimes I am ashamed of spending all upon myself, and think anxiously how I shall answer when God asks me what I have done for the poor. I have to confess to the guardian whenever he brings me my money, that I am far better off here than in Helmsvale. He never lets me off. He is a worthy man, but when I see him I never can help thinking of the bear in the pit. Once he invited me to dinner, but I am sure we were all equally glad when it was over. His wife is a smart, talkative lady, and I don't believe I got out ten words; and once back in my little room, I felt exactly as though I had been in the bear's den, and unexpectedly got out alive. I never was so stupid in my life. It is to be hoped they won't judge other pastors' widows by me; it would be wronging them greatly. But I am thankful no other invitations ever came, and I went on living in my quiet way, and very grateful for it to God, till He was pleased to visit me with this trial, and I found out that I could no longer get on alone. And now how grateful to Him ought I not to be for having sent me his good angels in my hour of need."

Such was the widow's tale, but not told in the course of one afternoon, for talking tired her, and yet it did her good. In her intensely quiet life she had garnered up much of thought and feeling, of which she was scarcely conscious. Her heart was over-full: our sympathy unlocked it, and it evidently cheered and refreshed her to tell us what she had experienced.

But she grew more and more feeble. I think hers was naturally a very fragile constitution; healthy so long as day passed after day in the same quiet uniformity, but incapable of sustaining a sudden shock. Perhaps, too, there may have been some latent constitutional disease, which the accident rapidly brought to a crisis.

She lived on a little while, but it seemed as if her life were all spiritual. She expressed herself far more fervently. Her feelings appeared more lively than in the first part of her illness. She spoke much of making a little journey to Helmsvale when she recovered. She had such an intense longing after her beloved husband's grave, and she should like too to see how the trees had grown in the parsonage orchard, and whether there were any persons left who still remembered her. When I brought her home a present from any of the market-women, she still showed all a child's delight, and would almost weep for joy. But gradually, indeed, they ceased to remember her in the market. Everything gets forgotten at last; only to prevent her finding it out, I went on bringing her little gifts, as if from the women themselves, and each of them was a solace to her spirit.

It was the will of the Lord that she should die. One morning, just as the sun began to gild her little room, she gently slipped away, without even one deep-drawn breath; the bird alone, who was sitting on her pillow, witnessed her departure, fluttered wildly about her head, perched on her shoulder, sang as loudly as he could, as though he would waken her, and when he could not waken her drooped his wings and sat dull and listless in the same place without moving. In a few hours all his feathers looked rough, and in the evening when we were going to put him to roost as usual, we found he was gone to roost for ever; he lay dead on her shoulder where in life he had sat so constantly; he had followed his kind mistress; he could not endure to be without her loving care for a single day. It is but seldom man so clings to man. We miss and mourn each other, indeed; but hearts are not often torn to bleeding, to say nothing of their breaking outright.

Well, her loss left a large gap in my life too; a gap such as I seldom experienced, and for which my cousin, the guardian, took me severely to task. He could not, he said, comprehend my grieving thus after her: we were in no way related; not even in the same social circle; our acquaintanceship had not lasted for many months, therefore my depression was not natural, but affected, abnormal, sentimental: all the board of guardians of the orphan institution considered it in that light, and had discussed it with great disapprobation.

As the Pastor's Widow had no relations, no one took any notice of her death but the said board, who exactly filled the mourning-coach that followed her coffin. Thus her departure made no stir on earth; was passed over in utter silence. But so much greater was the joy in heaven of the angels who had long known and loved her, when she came to join them, and with them to bless and praise the Lord, as only they who are pure in heart may. A HOUSE THAT BEATS THE PUBLIC-HOUSE.

A few weeks ago I had to visit the town of Colne, in Lancashire, as one of a deputation from a Missionary Society, and there I became acquainted with facts, and witnessed scenes, which I will describe to the readers of the Sunday Magazine.

In the year 1861 Mr. Robert Wildman, manager of the Craven Bank at Colne, was a teacher in the Wesleyan Sunday-school of that town. On a winter evening, as he passed one of the public-houses, he saw, issuing thence, a number of youths from sixteen to twenty years old, and as the gas shed its light on their faces flushed with drink, he recognised some of his old pupils in the Methodist Sabbath-school. "This, then," thought he, "is what becomes of our Sunday scholars." The more he inquired and thought on the matter, the more shocking became his discoveries, and the more painful the convictions to which he was driven. In the dancing-room, the low confectionery shop, and the beer-house, were to be found those who, lately Sunday scholars, should have risen through the school into the church. Could not this be corrected? The best preventive would undoubtedly have been religion. If only these youths had been converted, their religious decision would of course have repelled these temptations. But seeing that they were not devoted to Christ, could nothing be devised which would rival the attractions of the public-house, which would keep these young men under the influence of their Sunday-school friends, and lead eventually to a thorough conversion? Mr. Wildman was then conducting a week evening "Improvement Class for Young Men." His first attempt to realise his idea was by widening the circle of this class; but he found that just in proportion to the young men's need of amendment, was their prejudice against a meeting held on the premises of a place of worship. They would not come to a vestry, but they would go to some neutral room. One was hired over a donkey-stable, the rent required being sixpence per week. The young men of Mr. Wildman's class scrubbed the floor, whitewashed the walls, and made the place as nice as possible. When the door was opened on the first evening,

"there rushed into the room about a dozen of the kind of youths" our friend wished to attract. He tried to explain to them that he wished to be their friend, and sought their confidence. "He announced that, while he and his friends offered instruction in writing, reading, and accounts, as an inducement to gain their attendance, the ultimate aim was their spiritual advantage, which alone he judged to be real and abiding. He also stated that they had no intention of offensively forcing the subject of religion upon them, and that the school was entirely undenominational." The attempt was successful; the school grew till three successive removals into larger premises had failed to accommodate the still increasing attendance: and then the iron building in which the Institution has its present home, was specially erected for the purpose.

It is a long one-storied erection of corrugated iron, carrying on its gable a little bell-turret; but with the main entrance by a porch at the side. We step in, just noticing over the door a large gas star, lighted on gala nights; and we find ourselves in the men's reading-room. No one is allowed to frequent this room till he is eighteen years old. The walls are prettily papered, having very superior French prints, representing the seasons, inserted here and there into imitation-panels: and several plaster busts placed on brackets further adorn the walls. In the centre a tiny fountain is playing, in the midst of a little tank about four feet long by three feet wide, lined with white glazed tiles, and raised from the floor to about the level of an ordinary table. On two sides of this are pretty ferneries; on the other two sides, aquaria, whose curious inmates are a never-failing source of interest to the members. At right angles to the door, and so forming a screen from the draft, is a large cabinet, partially filled with stuffed birds, dried butterflies, and other contributions by the men themselves to this their own museum.

The tables are supplied with papers, and the requisites for chess and similar games; and there are spittoons on the floor, for smoking is allowed, though not the drinking of intoxicants. Our friend Wildman is evidently at home here. An old man is seated reading as we enter.

"Well, Joe, how are you?"

"Thank ye, Mister Wildman, I've got my thumb sprained. What mun I do with it?"

Evidently Wildman's advice about everything is thought worth having. Some plain directions about cold-water bandages are given; and we are just leaving the room, when our attention is claimed by a clear but rather peculiar call of "Penny bank! penny bank!" On looking round for the advertiser, we discover two noble parrots, the latest attractions of the room, one of which is constantly reiterating the advice of thriftiness, by calling attention to the "penny bank." And we now notice that on one side of the room is a large glass projection, which is thrown forward on the other side into the room adjoining, so serving both: this is a glass chamber, containing the library of 450 volumes, and the penny bank. Through a lavatory we pass into the room for youths between sixteen and eighteen; and we find it fitted in a similarly pleasant style, the differences being the absence of the fountain, and the presence, as pets, of two monkeys instead of parrots. One side of this room, moreover, is composed of moveable shutters, by the withdrawal of which it can be thrown into the large school-room on festival nights. The men's reading-room is never disturbed, in order that they may always be able to find a refuge there.

The large school-room is as handsomely fitted as are the other two. Some of the prints in the panels are very beautiful. One at the higher end, the subject of which is a group of game, is really an artistic production. Here the night school is carried on by voluntary teachers: all who are connected with the Institution under twenty-one years old being compelled to attend.

"Have you no difficulty in securing teachers?" we ask.

"Yes, indeed; we have considerable difficulty, but we manage to carry on."

The average number on the books last year was 385. The upper end of the school-room is occupied by a platform stretching entirely across it, necessary for the Saturday entertainments, the Sunday evening preaching services, and other public meetings.

For the idea of opposition to the public-house is thoroughly carried out. Penny readings were found attractive only to the more thoughtful class of working men; and Mr. Wildman was anxious to secure the attendance of those "for whom the beer-house and tap possess almost irresistible attractions." Accordingly on Saturday evenings the room is open for an "entertainment." The three brass bands of the neighbourhood are engaged to play on successive nights. The school singing-class performs in the intervals: and refreshments are served out to the people as they sit chatting or listening to the music. They are free to come and go as they please: and the entertainment closes at half-past ten o'clock.

No doubt this is going quite as far as an Institution with a religious object should do. But surely it is not too far. If the men were not at the school, they would be in vicious company. Many of them would probably reel home drunk from some public-house; while from this meeting they go home sober, and with a head clear for the Sabbath services. We all need amusement: the poor man must have cheap amusements. The only cheap amusements have hitherto been provided by the public-house. Surely he accomplishes a good work who outdoes the publican on his own ground, giving a low-priced entertainment without any of the noxious accompaniments of the ordinary working man's Saturday night. At all events, the experiment here has done well. "The room has been crowded with the identical class we hoped for. We have never been disturbed by the slightest exhibition of misbehaviour, while there has been no appearance of restriction." An oath has never been heard to drop from the lips of a single member while in the building: and large numbers of those who attend the Saturday evening's entertainment, are present at the Sunday evening's service."

This also is conducted by Mr. Wildman, with help, which he gladly welcomes, from members of various Christian churches. The doorkeeper has orders to refuse admission to all whom he recognises as belonging to any regular congregation; and since the town is but small, everybody knows everybody else, and this restriction is tolerably effective. There assemble every Sunday evening some hundreds of persons, whose lack of clothing, or whose vicious habits render it extremely improbable that they would attend any ordinary place of worship. Indeed, on Sunday evenings the Iron School becomes a ragged church.

This large room, however, is devoted to still more various purposes. Here last summer was held a working man's flower show, when the place became fragrant with the delicate pets reared in many a cottage-window or allotment. And to stimulate the scholars of the night school, there was a writing exhibition, when the men's caligraphy was exhibited stretched on the sloping sides of a square frame, the centre of which was filled with beautiful flowers. On both of these occasions prizes were distributed to the successful competitors by some of the ladies of the neighbourhood.

By a side door we pass into the inquiry room; an addition to the main building, in which our friend gives advice on religious and other topics to any who may ask it. It serves, however, many other purposes: we find there a brass band in full blast, a company of the scholars preparing themselves for helping in the Saturday evening's entertainment; and their performance is very vigorous, and decidedly promising.

Returning to the school, we go down gangway steps into the basement. The ground on which the building stands slopes considerably, and the foundation-walls needed raising to a level to receive the iron building. All the space so gained is made available for cookery and baths. In the kitchen are prepared, also by voluntary labour, the refreshments for the Saturday evening visitors. Mr. Wildman's object was to give at the school, as nearly as possible, what the people chose to buy in the market. Hence he sells them hot peas, penny pies, tripe, buns, rice-pudding, potato-pie, tea and coffee, and ginger beer. This refreshment department is conducted on strictly teetotal principles.

Next to the kitchen is the bath-room, eighteen feet by fourteen feet, containing a vapour bath and three slipper baths. A little steam boiler outside provides hot water for them and the kitchen apparatus. The charge to males is twopence, to females a penny, if members of the school; to strangers a penny extra. The bath-men and bath-women give their services, and in the six months, January to June, 1865, 701 baths were taken.

Lastly, a Bible-woman is engaged, who works constantly in connection with the school, visiting and holding mothers' meetings. She has paid 3500 visits to the homes of the working people. The number on the books of the mothers' meeting is eighty-seven, and 60*l.* 17*s.* 1*d.* have been paid during the year for articles of clothing. A temperance society is, of course, one wheel of the machine; and on Sunday adult classes are held, with an attendance of eighty males and sixty females.

And now, what is it all doing? Here is a great machine, what is it turning out? The answer is best given by some sample facts.

The agency reaches the class aimed at. One who has been an abstainer for some time told Mr. Wildman, "I drank until I could not get drunk. I have gone to bed with twenty noggins of gin in me, and undressed myself with as much ease as if I had not tasted. I have retched in the morning until the blood has started from my eyes and mouth at the same time."

On asking two persons, who were signing the pledge, "Where do you live?" the reply was, "Nowhere." One explained, "I have not slept in a bed twice this last fortnight. The other nights I have lain on a sack in an outhouse." The other had broken up his home, sold his furniture, and sent his wife back to her friends, and did not know where he would sleep that night.

"Two others came to join us—drunk and bareheaded, one of them without a coat, his waistcoat and shirt in shreds—and together possessing only twopence, which, to get rid of them, the landlady at the beer-house where they had been drinking had given them to enter the school. They are now both of them as sober and respectably dressed as any working men in the town."

As is common in many of the manufacturing towns, the young people among the operatives were accustomed largely to patronise dancing-rooms in various parts of the town. There drink was sold to them, and incalculable mischief wrought to morals and decency. Since the Iron School has been established, every one of these has been shut up.

On Christmas-eve, 1863, the musicians at one of the public-houses "piped" for some time, but no dancers presented themselves, till at length the players themselves adjourned to the meeting at the Iron School.

An attempt to open the theatre that winter failed through the same influence. "The playgoers," said some of the band, "are all gone to school." The actors, after struggling for a week in face of empty benches, left the town in despair.

Best of all, many have become Christians: and have joined, as they are encouraged to do, some one of the recognised Christian churches. I had the pleasure of preaching to several of these, who were members of the church I was visiting.

There are three reasons for this success. One is, that "the children of light are," in this case, "as wise as the children of this world." As much care and capital are expended on this enterprise as would be necessary to the success of a business undertaking. The rooms are nicer than those of the public-house; the attractions are greater than those the publican can offer. In a word, the public-house is fairly beaten on its own ground.

It is not fair to expect that a social or religious mission will succeed in dim, dirty rooms, when the gin-palace is beckoning with its flaring lights and mirrors. Religion has not such strong alliance with the unregenerate heart, that she can afford to dispense with all legitimate aids and recommendations.

Yet this is not all. The social aspect of the Iron School is that which most strikes a casual observer; but the underlying power is that of deep religious conviction, and intense religious earnestness. Everything is made to tend towards godliness. To make men godly is the grand aim: as religion personally experienced is the grand motive. And I am more and more convinced that working-men's clubs will only last, and be really useful, when they are conducted in a deeply religious spirit. The managers must have the great aim before them of making their institutions Christianising agencies. This is the secret of the success of the workmen's halls established by Mrs. Baily and Mrs. Wightman; and the lack of this is the secret of their very partial success almost everywhere else.

Then the school is Mr. Wildman's "hobby." He devotes himself to it with a zeal only equalled by that of his wife. A very blessed hobby it is; and wherever any great movement is carried on successfully, it is because some one or two men think, dream, pray about it every day and every night; which, I suppose, is making it their "hobby." O for more such "hobbies" and "hobby-riders!"

XCIII.—DOMINUS REGNAVIT.

God the Lord is King for ever,
Clothed with glory, girt with might;
He the earth has fixed, and never
Can aught change its station right.
Ere creation was, Thou reignest,
Thou art Lord the world before;
Thou from age to age remainest,
Thou art God for evermore.

Hark! the floods lift up their voices,
Ocean's waves aloud do roar;
Hark! the mighty sea rejoices,
Thunders praise upon the shore.
Thou o'er all hast domination,
Ever are Thy precepts sure;
In Thy holy habitation
Holiness shall aye endure.

CXXXVII.—SUPER FLUMINA.

Our harps upon the willows hung,
Euphrates' waters murmured by,
Remembrance silenced every tongue,
And brought a tear to every eye.

We sat and wept for Zion's woe;
And while our tears fell thick and fast,
Our harps, with mournful cadence slow,
Sighed in the breeze that o'er us passed.

How can we sing our songs divine
Far from the scenes that gave them birth?
While we in hopeless exile pine,
How can we raise the notes of mirth?

If I forget thee, O my land,
Or cease thy woes to ponder o'er,
May all its skill forsake my hand,
My tongue be silent evermore.

XXIX.—AFFERTE DOMINO.

Give to the Lord, ye nations,
All honour, worship, praise;
Pay Him your adorations,
To Him your voices raise.

The Lord commands the ocean,
His voice the waters know;
He stills their fierce commotion,
He rules their fitful flow.

The Lord creates the thunder,
His power the trees confess;
He rends the flames asunder,
He shakes the wilderness.

God is a King for ever,
His kingdom ne'er shall cease;
His own shall He deliver,
And bless them aye with peace.

A WORD TO SAILORS.

The Psalmist says, "They that go down to the sea in ships, that do business in great waters, these see the works of the Lord and his wonders in the deep." This is a word for sailors. You see our gracious Lord remembers all classes of people, and He has prepared spiritual food for each of them in accordance with their particular tastes and wants. And this, I think, should be a great consolation to sailors, who, humanly speaking, appear to have more need of God's care than those who dwell on shore and have their houses built upon rocks.

When he says that sailors see the works of the Lord, the Psalmist does not mean that other people do not see them, for, thanks be to God, his works are to be seen everywhere, and thousands and millions who never saw the sea have nevertheless rejoiced greatly in the wonders of God's hand. But what the Psalmist means, in my opinion, comes to this: "No class of men have more ample opportunity of seeing the Lord's works than sailors have; for the deep reveals wonders of God's love, wisdom, and power, such as must strike them if they have eyes to see and hearts to observe." And what a great privilege this is!

Nor can this saying surprise us. Nowhere does man feel his utter dependence upon the great Creator of heaven and earth so much as at sea. When floating on a little piece of wood or iron in the midst of the furious waves, he knows only too well that one breath of God's lips would be sufficient to sink him to the bottom. And nowhere does nature appear in its majestic and terrifying activity so much as at sea. Ashore, it seems as though everything is done and made by man. The cultivated fields and the skilfully built houses show the works of his hand, and everywhere, even in the forest, there are traces of his presence and his skill. But at sea, with the exception of here and there a ship looming in the distance, nothing is to be seen but what God has made and what God is doing through the powers of his creation. When a billow rises high as a tower, threatening to engulph the ship as a man swallows an oyster, everybody must deeply feel that a stronger than human hand has raised that terrible water-giant and sent him on his race. Or when the sailors, as the Psalmist describes it so graphically and poetically "mount up to heaven and go down again to the depths, and their soul is melted because of trouble, and they reel to and fro, and stagger like a drunken man, and are at their wits' end," they surely see before their eyes the work of Him who "commandeth and raiseth the stormy wind, which lifteth up the waves."

On such occasions many an infidel, who when ashore sneered at religion and scoffed at prayer, has been brought to his knees to acknowledge with trembling lips that there is an invisible king into whose terrible hands he may fall. And many a sinner who, from spiritual blindness and deafness, could never see God's loving-kindness in the marvels of the fields nor hear his praises told by the singing birds, has yet had the eyes and ears of his soul opened by the majestic spectacle of the boundless ocean, or by the awe-inspiring music of a sea-storm.

A sea voyage has often been represented as an image of human life. The main characteristic of our life here below is instability; and it has been justly said, that here on earth nothing is steady save unsteadiness. Now this truth is nowhere so impressively illustrated as at sea. Water is an uncertain, ever-changing thing; and a ship floating in that fluctuating element experiences the most various and contrasted changes. When there is no wind, and the sea is calm as a mill-pond, the ship lies quiet and immoveable as a rock, moves smoothly as a sledge on ice; and when pacing up and down the quarter-deck one could almost fancy he walked on the roof of some rock-built castle. But suddenly a little breeze, often scarce more than a gentle breath, touches the mirror-like surface; a little swell comes up, and your rock-built castle is turned into a cradle, which sways and rocks to and fro, up and down, with everything it contains. The wind increases, a strong gale blows, and that same great water-castle, which seemed as though set on solid foundations, is tossed up and down as though it were a mere nut-shell. Now it seems to touch the sky, now to go down to the bowels of the earth. It is a perfect plaything of the furious waves. Such changes follow one another in constant succession, and perils of every kind may at any moment be encountered. But in all these vicissitudes, whether of calm or storm, those who have their eyes opened see the works of God; they observe his great wonders in the deep.

Let us fancy ourselves on board ship in calm weather. No cloud is visible in the sky. Brightly the sun shines upon the smooth glassy plain, his golden image reflected in thousands, even millions, of wrinkles, seeming to weave a carpet of emerald and silver across the boundless floor. The fresh, invigorating sea-air stirs the blood merrily, and stimulates the nerves; and all sorts of useful, necessary, but often postponed labour, are now heartily taken in hand. Here, surely, there is an opportunity for the sailor to think of the Lord and his works. He may open his ear to what this quiet lovely calm can whisper into his soul. It may remind him of that wonderful scene on the mount of Horeb, where Elijah the prophet experienced that the Lord was not in the storm, nor in the earthquake, nor in the fire, but in that still small voice which told that God is a God of love and mercy. Then, looking up to the sky, and beholding the sun filling the universe with light and life, he may say to himself, "Such is Jesus, the Sun of Righteousness, without whom our life would be like an impenetrably dark night on a dismal barren ocean." But now our life is similar to the bright, cheerful calmness which at present is gladdening our minds; a life of peace with God and joy in God, because God, "who commanded the light to shine out of darkness, hath shined into our hearts to give the light of the knowledge of the glory of God in the face of Jesus Christ."

And while he is enjoying that charming stillness in the midst of the boundless ocean, he may think of heaven, his future home, and fancy what a lovely glorious place it must be, full of peace and calmness,—the very throne-hall of God. And he may reflect too, how happy and joyful all will be who, in the presence of that unspeakably amiable Saviour, experience the bliss of being where there is no sin, neither sorrow, nor pain, nor death, where no dismal clouds darken the sky, and no roaring storms fill the soul with anxiety and trouble. And perhaps, while he is allowing his thoughts thus to soar to the things which are above, he may be engaged in mending a sail, or in repairing the rigging, that he may be well prepared for coming storms. And certainly, there is great wisdom in that. A sailor who allows the time of calm to pass on unused is a bad seaman, and is, indeed, a fool. But what a foolish sailor on the ocean of this life must he be, who allows the day of grace to pass on without preparing himself for coming storm of death and judgment! What, for instance, should we think of the captain, who, while the weather is calm and the sea is quiet, would reason to himself in this way:—"I know there is a leakage in the bottom somewhere; my mainsail is also much torn, and the rigging is much damaged,—but it is calm weather, and everything goes smoothly and quietly on; there is no danger, and we will eat and drink, and be merry." Of course, we should call him a madman; but such madmen, I am afraid, are to be found on board many a ship. They feel strong and healthy at present, and live on in sin and license, as if there never would come a day in which their strength will break down, and their souls have to appear before a just and holy God. If there should be any such thoughtless individuals among us now, I would entreat them to consider it is now the day of grace; it is the acceptable year of the Lord; it is the season of calmness and peace, which God grants for consideration and repentance. I beseech you, examine yourselves whether you are in Christ, saved from this world and its perdition. Look well to your hull, your sails and your rigging; look into your own hearts, and if you find that things there are not right before God, do not, I beseech you, neglect the calm quiet days which are granted to you, but go to Jesus, that He may take up his abode within you, and defend you on the day when the terrible storms of eternity will burst upon this world.

But lovely and agreeable as the calm at sea may be, the true sailor does not want it to continue. He does not go down to the sea merely to enjoy himself; but, "to do business in great waters." What he wants is the fresh breeze to swell his sails and push the ship briskly through the brine, carrying him with his cargo to the place of destiny. And the more powerfully that breeze blows, with steady, unremitting tenor, making the ship cut through the watery level like a joiner's plane across a board, a long track of foam and spray behind her, the more hearty is the captain, and the livelier, brisker, and more buoyant the smile that shines from the faces of the crew, who run to and fro and climb up and down in cheerful activity.

Now a sailor may stop here for a moment, and observe what an important thing it is to have the right wind blowing into the sails. He knows well that tacking is most tedious and troublesome work, and that many a good ship has come too late for the market, or got into serious difficulties, owing to the wind blowing from the wrong corner. The better the sails, the more powerful the masts, the stronger the ropes, the more useful are they in carrying the ship towards the desired haven, provided only the breeze blow in the right direction. But those same sails, and ropes, and masts, the better they are the more likely are they to carry the ship far away from the place of its destination if the wind be adverse. Just so is it with man, in reference to his everlasting destiny. He is like a fine ship, wonderfully made by the great Builder himself, and everything on board admirable. But alas! when he ate the forbidden fruit, the wrong spirit began to blow into his soul, the spirit that comes from below, and which is earthly, carnal, devilish. His bodily and mental faculties are excellent, his judgment is sharp, his understanding is clear, and reason is a wonderful power within him, by which he can follow the stars in their courses, make the powers of nature willingly serve him, and the brute creation loyally obey him. In a word, the sails, masts, and ropes of his ship are in perfect order, but the wind that whistles through his rigging blows right away from the harbour of peace and salvation, and right forward to the abyss of destruction and misery. In other words, it is not the love of God that moves him, but the love of self in its many forms—the love of money, the love of the creature, the love of carnal enjoyments and worldly pleasures. His bodily and mental faculties are at work day and night, in the service of a wrong and most pernicious motive; and just as a ship, flying before an adverse wind, with every knot moves farther from the proper point, so man, living and labouring in this ungodly spirit, finds himself every morning farther from heaven and nearer to hell. It is observed too that, when once this wrong spirit has taken possession of a man's heart, that heart becomes the worse the more profound his learning, the keener his intellect, and the sharper his power of judgment. It was not the poor ignorant people, it was the learned Pharisees, the sagacious Scribes, and the shrewd lawyers, who crucified our blessed Saviour. People often cry, "Only let us gather knowledge, cultivate science, and become well versed in all branches of human learning, and everything will come right, mankind will be happy and the world will be regenerated!" Well, I have not the slightest objection to science and learning; on the contrary I highly value them. But if one thinks these are the remedy for the evils of mankind, I would call him just such a fool as you, my friends, would call that man, who, when the wind was blowing from the wrong quarter, put up more sails or renewed the ropes. No, the root of our misery lies not in the head but in the heart. Let the spirit of pride, of selfishness, of worldly-mindedness, be expelled, and the Spirit of God, that Spirit of love and grace, will breathe into our souls, and then the rest will come round by itself. Let us love Jesus, let us as poor lost sinners humbly take our place at the foot of his cross, and allow the glad tidings of salvation through the blood of the Lamb to thrill through our souls. Then our ship will at once turn its stern hellward and its brow heavenward. Ay, my friends, that truly is the right breeze, and the stronger it blows the better for us. All our bodily and mental faculties will then the more powerfully co-operate to display the varied virtues of Christ, and to make us intensely enjoy the happiness of salvation and to glorify God, from whom all these things are.

But it is especially in the hour of danger that the sailor sees the works of God; when the storm raises its voice of thunder and turns the ocean into a boiling abyss, and when no star is seen above, and all seems wreck and ruin below,—then indeed the sailor sees the hand of God. Like a roaring lion the hurricane dashes upon the foaming tide. He lashes the waves with his terrible breath, driving them ahead like a frightened flock. Helpless, defenceless, the little nut-shell is pitched up and down like a straw tossed about in the air. Human skill is at its end. Ropes break, shrouds and stays fly away, masts crack, and the whole vessel creaks and groans. The rudder is blown off, and the strong framework is wholly given up to the mercy of the infuriated element. Suddenly is heard the heart-piercing cry—Fire! Fire! Smoke issues from the hold; soon it takes the shape of a column. Who can describe the despair, the confusion, the consternation, the wringing of hands. "To the boats! to the boats!" They are lowered, in convulsions of despair. Every one who can move his limbs jumps overboard, dashes into the dancing craft, and the oars are seized with spasmodic grasp. Already the ship is in a blaze. Ghastly is the glare that terrible firework throws over the tempestuous scenery around. Sparks and pieces of burning wood fly in wild confusion over the sea for miles around. Off dash the boats to escape that awful hell. And on little pieces of wood many costly lives are now floating about over the bottomless deep, longingly looking up to God, who alone can save them from immediate death!

Truly it is in such times of danger that those who go down to the sea and do business in the great waters, most clearly see the works of the Lord. And first of all they see what a powerful God He is, and how truly it is said of Him that He is mighty to destroy both soul and body. Indeed it is greatly to be marvelled at, that among sailors there are so many who sit in the seat of the scornful, and care neither for God nor his Word. It might be expected that the scoffer, the speaker of abusive language, the adulterer, and the profligate, would, least of all, be found among men who more than others are in the habit of witnessing the marvellous power of that God with whom we have to do. Truly that heart must be sadly hardened which, after having once witnessed a storm at sea, has not learned to fear the God of nature, and to tremble at his word. For that God addresses nobody in a more emphatic manner than He addresses a sailor, when speaking to him in the voice of the storm, and printing his majestic footsteps on the great ocean waves, He says, "I am God, and there is none besides Me! It is I who have created heaven and earth, the sea and all that therein is. It is at My rebuke—at the blast of My nostrils—that the channels of the waters are seen, and the foundations of the world are discovered. Therefore, O man, worm of the dust, fear thou Me, for it is I who can destroy; and come thou to Me, for it is I who can save." And blessed is he who opens the ears of his soul to listen to this voice; who, having learnt from the sea that its Creator is not a God to be mocked, abstains from jesting and foolish words; and who, having learned from the storm that man with all his strength and wisdom is before the Lord like a stubble before the whirlwind, desists from proudly lifting his hand against the Almighty.

The globe upon which we live is just like a ship in the midst of the ocean. It looks so firm, so solid, so secure; but it is in reality nothing but a speck of dust floating in the immense sea of space—in the boundless ocean of the universe. It only floats along at the command of God. When He beckons with his finger it will burst to pieces and disappear like a ship which, dashed upon a rock by the storm, sinks down to the bottom of the deep. Men will perish, and so will the works of men. Nothing, indeed, will stand against that future storm of destruction, which will rage on that day when "the heavens shall pass away with a great noise and the elements shall melt with fervent heat." In the annals of eternity it will be recorded that this frail vessel, called the earth, in which we are now sailing, disappeared on such and such a day and has never since been heard of. Nay, it will be reported that a terrible hurricane burst upon it, and that it got on fire and was for ever lost. The momentary question will be heard: "And are all hands lost with it?" The answer will be: "Only those were saved who took to the life-boat." And that life-boat, my brethren, is the Gospel of Jesus Christ.

My friends, let us not be unbelieving. Let us not be like those foolish sailors who, because the weather continued calm for many weeks, averred that storms could not possibly arise any more. Now-a-days this world is full of infidels, who cry that God's Word is a fable, that there is no future judgment, nor a place of eternal punishment for the ungodly. Beware of such ungodly men. They are evil counsellors on board ship. Let us be prepared for the coming day, believing God upon his own infallible Word. See that your life-buoy be in its proper place, and in good order; so that you may put it on at once when the hour of danger comes. That life-buoy is faith in Jesus; the living faith of the heart in Him who alone is mighty to save. If you have that life-buoy, you are all right. If you know that Jesus is yours, and that you are his, the storm may roar, and the sea foam, and the ship be burnt, but you will be safe, like a child sleeping peacefully on its mother's bosom. Heaven and earth shall pass away, but he that believes in the Son hath life everlasting.

I daresay you have all heard that story of the little boy—the son of a mate—who, during a fearful storm, and while everybody was in fright, continued cheerfully playing with his toys in the cabin, and when asked how he could be so at peace, answered in a voice of surprise, "Why, isn't my father at the wheel!" And perhaps, too, you have heard of that good Christian man who, while everybody was running to and fro in despair, stood with a smile on his face, looking at the waves as they boiled and hissed around; and who, when asked what he was smiling at, answered in his simplicity, "Why, I am curious to see how the Lord will help us out here."

Oh, that we may thus rest in the Lord! Let us strengthen each other's faith in Jesus. Let us firmly believe that He really is our Saviour—our living, mighty, faithful Saviour—who loves us, who cannot forsake us, since He bought us at the price of his precious blood! Tempests however frightful will subside, and waves however terrible will be quieted again, for we know that it is Jesus who rebukes the winds and commands the sea. Many may be our tribulations in this life, but they will all pass away, for the Lord delivers his children out of them all. Only let us care to have Him with us on board, and our perdition will be impossible. When that day dawns on which the dark shadow of death will alight upon our souls and everything disappear before our sight, we shall not fear, for the Lord is our shepherd, who will guide us safely through the dark valley. Nay, it is then that we shall rejoice as we never rejoiced before, for terrible as the waters of death are, and horrifying as the deep of the grave is, yet the redeemed of the Lord will even in those waters see his greatest works, and even in that deep they will witness his marvellous wonders.

A MEDITATION ON SORROW.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "PRAYING AND WORKING."

Sorrow envelops us like an atmosphere, clings to us like our thoughts. We cannot flee from it. It has grown up with our lives; if the child and the man have each their tears, the worn old heart is often wrung. Behind our sweet and tender joys it lurks like an assassin in the dark; it may start out at the next turn of a gentle life. Like a plague it hides in the sunshine, and drifts with the soft summer winds.

See how full the Bible is of mourners: Adam weeping over Abel, Jacob over Joseph, the oak of tears where they buried Rebekah's nurse, the lonely house at Bethany, Rizpah on the bare rock of Gibeah, and David, his heart ready to break over Jonathan and Absalom; women that wash the Saviour's feet with tears, and daughters of Jerusalem that lament through the sad streets up to Calvary; widows following the biers of their sons, and death-chambers of young girls where the silence is broken by a mother's sobs; and Peter in his bitterness; and Jesus Himself bowed over his friend's grave. For the life in the Bible is human life, no way transcendental or exceptional, and by the roots of that life there grow those bitter herbs of sorrow.

There is no promise of exemption from sorrow on earth, even in the Bible. We shall carry no grief with us into Heaven. Sorrows cease at death, like a shower that suddenly stops; we pass beyond them as men pass up through rain into the sunshine on the loftier slopes. Hold on till death only, and there will never be another. But here we must endure, be patient, have faith. In Christ or out of Christ sorrow is inevitable; we might as well expect four seasons a year without a cloud. And somehow we must meet it; with strength, courage, hope, if we will believe God's word; otherwise with murmuring, astonishment, angry questionings, a broken heart, puzzle, darkness, and foreboding.

The Bible finds this sorrow with us, explains it, reveals its place in God's order, opens to us the soul of goodness in things evil, brings us comfort; nay, it lifts up the sorrow into a holy instrument of God's will, and pours out blessings on the sorrowful. What son is he whom his father chasteneth not? In the world ye shall have tribulation; these things have I spoken that in me ye might have peace. Weeping may endure for a night, but joy cometh in the morning. They that sow in tears shall reap in joy. Comfort ye, comfort ye, my people. I, even I, am He that comforteth you: the Father of Mercies, and the God of all comfort, who comforteth us in all our tribulation. Blessed are they that mourn, for they shall be comforted. He healeth the broken in heart and bindeth up their wounds. Rejoice, inasmuch as ye are partakers of Christ's sufferings.

The church at Rome was once in tribulation; Paul, with his large, loving heart, would comfort them by the Spirit of God. He did not say, The sky will clear; nor, Busy yourself and forget it; nor, Time will soften it; nor, It must come to our turn; nor any of those speeches by which we only mean that "loss is common to the race."

But he said: If we suffer, we suffer with Christ. There is something in that; for the servant is not greater than his lord. And he said: As certainly as we suffer with Christ, so certainly shall we be glorified with Him. We know that Christ suffers; we believe that Christ is glorified. We know that we suffer; let us believe that we shall be with Christ where He is, and see his glory and share it. By sin we are heirs of sorrow; by grace we are fellow-heirs with Christ of glory. He said, moreover: Such sufferings as we have are not worth comparison with the glories which shall be hereafter. He did not speak lightly. He had suffered more than most, more perhaps than any to whom he wrote. But that hereafter was enough for him.

Yet, for the present, he went on to say: We know that all things work together for good to them that love God. Now, I conceive that this is what he means; that afflictions are part of a system. All things work together. Sorrow does not strike blindly like an angry man. It comes as part of a plan of which no one can fathom the depth or the wisdom. Its entrance and departure are as accurately timed as the rising and setting of the sun. Its most sudden freaks and whims, its deadliest and seemingly most causeless successions, are systematic. There is a system in the minutest order of the world; in the dropping of a stray shower, the falling of an aerolite, the patch of sunlight on a solitary field, the sudden breeze that lifts the yellow leaves, a night's frost, a peal of thunder. Each seems isolated, accidental, or extraordinary, because we cannot conceive the vastness of the unity of Nature. And sorrows work into the larger plan of our lives by an order as careful and minute. A man's life and the circumstances out of which it is built are as much under the dominion of law as the soil or the seasons. These sorrows, with their strokes, rapid or slow, expected or sudden, seemingly needful or superfluous, are part of a subtle and intricate mechanism. They may sometimes seem eccentric; so do the orbits of certain comets that flit across our sky; yet those orbits, and the size of these bodies, their power of attraction, and their velocity, must have been arranged to a hair's-breadth. And the sudden and unaccountable trials that have threatened to derange our life and throw us off our balance, must needs be calculated with as much precision. We may pass among them safely and fearlessly; they will not hurt the growth of our spiritual nature. God has spoken to them that they shall do his servants no harm. There are the strangest elements in nature—opposite, antagonistic, singly hurtful; but they work up into that harmony, beauty, and procession that has beguiled men into believing that nature itself is a supreme intelligence. There are elements as diverse, strange, repel-lant, and confused, in humanity; but they work up into the unity of the progress, development, and destiny of the world: and wrong cannot overflow the limits of God's setting, nor crime pass beyond the barrier of God's will. And so trials work up in the complex scheme of our spiritual education. They work with the rest of things, and from which they cannot be detached. It is not their solitary influence that is here fixed on; it is an influence that they share with all other circumstances that affect our lives. The discipline of life is presented as like medicines, compounded of substances that, singly, would be hurtful. In the sorrow considered apart there might be no healing. Even chastening is for the present always grievous. But the trial that blends with a thousand thoughts, and is arranged in its own place, may have virtue and potency to soothe, and comfort, and heal. That is the first ground of comfort, that our trials are part of a great system by which God is carrying on our lives.

And that system is under One under Whom are all things. Our plans have been often frustrated because we could not assure them in every part. There are events beyond our control. A merchant has sent a ship to the Indies, and has calculated with a nice sagacity the markets, the freight, the season, even the probable delays by weather. He waits at home expecting his gains; and everything has answered. But a storm wrecks the ship on its voyage and sends its cargo to the bottom of the sea. No nicety of calculation, no shrewd experience could dispose the winds. There may be faults in our agents. We must use them though they may not understand our views; may not be trustworthy, may not be prudent, nor brave, nor reliant. Men are often forced to use clumsy tools. The largest and wisest schemes have been frustrated by the incompetence and blundering of those who were to carry them out. The fault here is not in our will or power, but in another's. Yet there may be fault in ourselves. We may have been deficient in forethought. We have guarded against many contingencies, but omitted one. That one is often the simplest and most probable: it is often fatal. Scanning the entire horizon of possibilities, how often the keenest judgment has overlooked something. There are flaws in our control, flaws in our instruments, flaws in our forethought. But the control of God is perfect over everything. His plans can all be wrought. He is wonderful in counsel, excellent in working. He can arrest the tempest, direct the fire, rouse the earthquake, send forth the plague, stay the heavens from rain. There is not a force in nature that He may not use; nor a human will that He may not govern; nor an event that He may not control. Everything becomes plastic to Him; He can calculate every influence, and combine them at the right time, and stay them at the proper moment.

A person might plan a little trial for another, and it might end wholesomely and safely. But it might end in mischief. A hundred things might happen unexpectedly. The influences might have been miscalculated. When we operate on character we need the most delicate touch: and we are working with instruments we cannot fully govern, and upon what we do not fully understand. It is here we notice the infinite superiority of God: the absolute necessity for One to work who has everything in his hand. Think of what keen and deadly instruments He uses—every form of suffering, down to death; and mental and spiritual agonies. What supreme power and wisdom to keep all these in check, to hold the various reins of circumstance, to mete to every soul its own measure and no more! Realise the supremacy of God over his agents, and over all things; that frost and fire, and flood and drought, and sickness and pain, and sorrow and death, and peace and war, and the coming and going—the words and acts of every man, are subject to his will, to be used by Him in his servants, and sent on solemn and delicate mission to any heart He pleases. And when you think of the vast and intricate scheme of human life, and marvel how the trials of it are always to be kept within wise and loving bounds, and to have no more than their place in the one comprehensive aim of good, it will help your faith if you think also of that invisible but Omnipotent Worker who can make all things work together.

In each of these thoughts there is comfort; in the thought of an order beyond which nothing can pass, into which each sorrow is adjusted; and in the thought of a supreme hand that can mould all things to its purpose, and thus guarantee the stability of that divine order. They are like resting-places on the stairway up a grey cathedral spire, platforms on each of which you stop and breathe, and rest and enjoy the widening landscape, and the promise of the view that is to crown the whole, and grow familiar with a feature here and there. So, resting as we pass, in these lower thoughts—we reach the last: that the end of all things is our good. The particular sorrow may hurt, but the drift of the whole is good. And sometimes the very sorrow has wrought us good. We know that already by experience. It was good for our temper to suffer. It calmed, restrained, chastened it—made us less impatient, or fretful, or violent. Trial has been purifying us, from the throng of vulgar, animal desires, from restless cravings, from the stain of passion. It has done good by preventing us laying hold of the present world, loosening our attachments to it, setting us a little apart from its painted shows, out of its babble and haste. It has strengthened our sympathy with others. We have entered into the fellowship of sorrow. We have learnt to feel the common burden. We can comfort, for we know what it is to be comforted. But the most of what we know is by faith. We have not seen nor felt it yet. We have but caught a glimpse of the system here and there. If you ever spent a misty day upon the Righi you will have seen, through shifting rifts in the lower clouds, the edge of a lake, or the fringe of a wood, or the gay fragment of a town—vague transitory hints of a great world beneath. And such vague hints are the sum of what we know in part—visions into God's working that have been closed as suddenly as opened. We must hold on and wait, living in this as in everything else by faith.

The good will in some way be wrought out: nor need we insist that we must know how. The loss in some way will turn to gain; will be balanced and checked by other things. It is not in our power to analyze the influence of every sorrow; to trace it out in its effects upon our character; it is not God's province that we should have the power; it is no element of the comfort held out here. We are apt to trust too much to special causes, to narrow in the width of God's plan to our own conceptions. We are apt to dwell upon particular trials, to draw from them special lessons and warnings, to look for special results, to let the sorrow for the time bulk unduly and warp or prejudice our judgment. We are taught here not to detach it from surrounding circumstances, from the general drift and order of life; that we cannot estimate it by itself. We are assured of what that drift and order means. Even when the heart is saddest, the pain and darkness at their worst, when no clue is to be had, there is this clear hope, that sorrow cannot turn to evil to them that love God.

To them that do not love Him the Bible reveals no comfort. They must take what they can find; bear up as others have borne; run to the same dry and broken cistern; listen to the same hollow sound of words. The principle is broadly stated; but there is no mistake about the condition within which it operates. If a man is driven to his own resources and must bear sorrow as if there was no God to help him, he is bound in honour to face the reason, and to acknowledge, it is because he does not love God.

NOTES FOR READERS OUT OF THE WAY.

Nothing for many a day has thrown such a cloud over the British Islands as the news of the negro insurrection in Jamaica, and the terrible measures connected with its suppression. Like the city of Shushan, when the posts went out, hastened by the king's commandment, to carry the decree of death against the Jews, to the uttermost limits of the empire, the people of Great Britain are "perplexed." They do not like to form a hasty judgment, and while the published evidence fails as yet to convince them that the severities that have occurred were indispensable, they dare not pass a sentence of condemnation that would involve the Governor, the Legislature, and all the other public officers of the island in the guilt of needless severity. The whole of the transactions will doubtless be investigated with careful impartiality; but let the result be what it may, it must be extremely painful. If, in spite of emancipation—in spite of Christian teaching and training—in spite of civilisation and organised government, it shall be found that a deliberate plot was laid to murder all the whites on the island at Christmas, and seize their property, the view this must give us of the negro race would be so terrible as to make their civilisation and conversion all but insoluble problems. On the other hand, if it should appear that without sufficient cause two thousand negroes have been shot or hanged, many thousands flogged, villages razed to the ground, and settlements depopulated, a grievous crime will have been committed, and a terrible stigma attached to the British name. Taking the view most favourable to the authorities possible, and accepting the position that no milder measures could have been adopted, we have to contemplate a miserable future for the island—a bitter jealousy between the two races, that must make ordinary intercourse very painful, and create a disastrous prejudice on the part of the negroes against Evangelistic labours. The crisis is one that may well make us thankful for an Almighty Controller of events, who ruleth in the raging of the seas, and maketh the wrath of man to praise Him.

Often though the question of Sabbath-observance has been debated of late years on the most prominent arenas, it has never perhaps been presented in so peculiar a phase, or been so loudly and keenly contested, as during the last six or eight weeks. The ground on which Dr. Norman Macleod would place the day of rest has been maintained by some able theologians, but has never been till now a subject of popular discussion. Holding that the ten commandments belong to a system of positive commands and ordinances which was essentially Jewish, and that under the higher dispensation of Christianity obedience to the will of God is secured, and secured more effectually, by the new spirit of delight in the law of God which is inspired by the Holy Ghost, Dr. Macleod has said that the Decalogue is abolished, and that the observance of Sunday does not properly spring from the fourth commandment, but from that free evangelical spirit that delights in the spiritual exercises suitable to the day, from the necessities of man's physical nature, and from the voice of the Church, that everywhere proclaims the high expediency and infinite blessedness of such an institution. To those unaccustomed to such views, the propounding of them has had quite a revolutionary sound, and the sense of danger has been all the greater, that Dr. Macleod, to say the least, did not take any pains to allay the sensibilities of a people who have been trained for generations in an opposite view of the obligation of the Sabbath, and have been accustomed to regard the fourth commandment as the great bulwark of the institution. The speech of the Rev. A. H. Charteris in reply to Dr. Macleod presented the other side of the question. Mr. Charteris said he could not get over four considerations in favour of the perpetuity of the Sabbath:—1. God blessed the seventh day at the beginning and sanctified it. 2. The fourth commandment begins with "Remember," showing that the Sabbath was no new thing. 3. It is in the Decalogue. 4. Our Lord says, "The Sabbath was made for man." In opposition to the argument that a system of positive commands stands necessarily opposed to a spirit of liberty, it was urged that on the contrary this very spirit of liberty finds its true exercise and highest delight in willing obedience to the commands. They were not to be viewed as painful restraints, but as the dictates of fatherly wisdom and goodness; and this view was pre-eminently applicable to the law of the Sabbath, the beneficent and kindly character of which was apparent on its very surface.

The Sabbath question has recently been before the public in another connection. A deputation from a Sunday League, or "Trades Association," waited on Lord Granville to urge the opening of the Kensington Museum on Sundays, one argument being that the Raphael Cartoons had lately been removed thither from Hampton Court, and that the lovers of art now suffered from being unable to see them as formerly on Sundays. Lord Granville having said that he would take time to consider the subject, another deputation waited on him in a few days, consisting of working men connected with Lambeth, who took quite another view of the matter. The opening of museums and similar places, they considered, would be no real boon to the working man, but quite the reverse. They conceived that, as a great many attendants at such places would be compelled to pursue their ordinary labour on Sundays, the security of the day of rest to all classes of workmen would be taken away. Manufacturers might say to their men, "If the servants of the Museum attend at their employment on Sundays, why should you not be at yours as well?" Mr. Thomas Hughes, M.P. for Lambeth, accompanied the deputation, and made a frank and manly confession. His own views, he said, had been in favour of the Sunday opening of museums, believing that it would be a boon to the working classes; but he had had such overwhelming evidence that this was not the feeling of workmen themselves, that he now supported the opposite proposition. The workmen had a strong feeling of sympathy for their fellow-workmen, and as one of them remarked, they would rather sacrifice their own wishes than that any of their number should be compelled to labour on the Sunday. So strong was this feeling that, when the manager of a large gas-fitting establishment proposed to the men to declare their views for the opening of museums either on Sundays or on week-evenings, it was found that, without exception, the vote was for week-evenings. A somewhat stormy public meeting subsequently held in St. Martin's Hall gave an opportunity both to the friends and the opponents of the Sunday League to reiterate their views.

But it is not always found that so enlightened views prevail even among the men themselves. The "City Mission Magazine" for last month contains some interesting statements regarding a mission which is carried on to the gas-men of the metropolis. The number of men employed at the various gas-works is very considerable, and the establishments are scattered over a very wide surface. As most of the men are employed on Sundays, and a considerable proportion are Roman Catholics, the need of missionary labours among them is very urgent, but the unwillingness of many to avail themselves of these is correspondingly great. On the one hand, the men make the fact that they have to work on Sundays an excuse for their irreligious life; on the other hand, when they get a Sunday, they do not always make a good use of it. At the Ratcliff works the men struck on one occasion for a Sunday in the month. They were offered their choice of the monthly Sunday, or an extra day's pay if they worked right on. To a man they chose the extra day's pay. But the very want of a regular day of rest naturally unfits such men for appreciating an occasional one. They are unaccustomed to it; when they have it, they do not know what to do with themselves, and they resort to any kind of foolish indulgence that presents itself. The odd ideas on religion prevalent among some of them may be gathered from the remark of an Irishman to the missionary, which, grotesque though it was, was made quite in earnest: —"I have lost sweat enough to-day to atone for the sins of twenty years." Yet these very people sometimes show commendable anxiety to hear the Gospel. A missionary was accustomed to hold a meeting in a retort-room, beneath which was a place for collecting the coke when it was drawn from the retorts. He observed that the Irishmen left the retort-room when he began his meetings, and, as he thought, absented themselves on purpose. It turned out, however, that they went below. "They know," said the foreman, "that it would not do for them to be present where you are—the priest would not allow that; so they go underneath, and they can hear as well there as they could on the stage." Sometimes a very wonderful change is effected even on the most wicked and careless. At a meeting held in a school-room in Park Street, a man rose up and asked permission to speak. He had worked at that factory for many years. He was known well to them all. His youth had been spent in great wickedness, and his earnings thrown away in the public-house. He had been a prize-fighter, and was very fond of the business. One night he and his wife had been induced to go to Astley's, where a religious service was going on. He had paid little attention to the sermon, but one word was uttered which made him wretched. That word was Eternity. It pleased God before he left the meeting to reveal to him the grace of the Saviour, and enable him to trust in Him. Since then, as they knew, his life had been very different. He then, in a very earnest manner, showed them the value of the Saviour, and appealed to the men to turn to the Lord in a way that drew tears from many eyes.

Last month we drew attention to a remarkable series of letters on the religious condition and prospects of Italy that have lately appeared in the Guardian newspaper. We particularly noticed the writer's account of the evangelistic efforts of the Waldenses, and the remarkable position and influence of Dr. De Sanctis. The writer of the letters, in continuing the series, has given some interesting details of various endeavours after self-reform, within the bosom of the Italian Church. Father Passaglia, the great opponent of the temporal power of the Pope, he does not regard as likely to do much; in fact, the movement against the temporal power which he originated, and in which he got 9000 priests to join, was accompanied by such exorbitant demands for spiritual authority that it injured the cause it was designed to promote. Besides, Passaglia, though a great scholar and a great theologian, is not a man to exert a popular influence, or lead a party to action. Canon Tiboni, of Brescia, formerly head of the theological seminary of that diocese, is one of the foremost of ecclesiastical reformers. He is what may be called an Italian Gallican. He would acknowledge the primacy of the Bishop of Rome (like Dr. Pusey); but he repudiates the special claims of the Pope. One of his most remarkable works is the "Secularisation of the Bible"—in favour, we gather, of its circulation among the people. Count Tasca, of Milan, a noble of high family, is a great admirer of the English Liturgy, portions of which he has circulated very widely. In anticipation of the cholera, and to prepare the people spiritually for that scourge, he lately printed, in Italian, 3000 copies of the English Litany. In his prefatory note he says, "The Litanies contained in the Golden Book of Common Prayer of the United Catholic Church of England and Ireland contain in themselves so great a love of God, so lively a confidence in the mediation of Christ our Saviour, so much faith in Divine Providence, and so ardent a charity for our neighbours, that it is no wonder our people received with so much favour the Italian translations twice distributed by me in former years." Perhaps the most celebrated reform missionary is Don Ambrogio, a priest of Piedmont, who goes about preaching in the open air in town and country, and disposing of New Testaments. "We ought to hope," he says, "that the principles of a national Italian Church which I uphold will be received, and will restore us to the true Church of Jesus Christ our Saviour." It must be remembered that in every respect, except his opposition to the jurisdiction of Rome, Don Ambrogio is a firm Catholic. Several of the clergy who have been suspended by ecclesiastical authority are permitted by the Government to preach in the churches. At Naples it is said that no less than six churches, attended by large congregations, are served by suspended priests. In the Ticino, and also at Tutra, the English prayer-book in Italian is used, and communion in both kinds administered monthly. At Genoa and at Messina there are also congregations under reforming priests.

Two journals are devoted to the exposition of the views of the reforming party. One is published at Florence, the other at Naples. The latter is the organ of the Societa Emancipatrice e di Mutuo Soccorso del Sacerdozio Italiano. A document recently issued by this society declares that the Italian nation feels an imperious necessity for religious reformation. These aspirations are to be dated from the times and teaching of such men as Savonarola, Arnold of Brescia, and Sarpi, whose spirit is still alive in every true Catholic heart. The object of the society is to bring back the Church "to true Catholic faith and doctrine." Among other things, it has supported the abolition of celibacy; approved of the complete abolition of the monastic orders; and again and again reminded the Pontiff that he is only Bishop of Rome, and Primate of Christendom. It calls for the Liturgy in the national tongue, with the free circulation of the Scriptures. The society has existed for four years, and has twenty-four branch societies; enrols 971 priests, 852 laymen, and 340 honorary members; embracing 102 parish priests, forty higher dignitaries, three ex-ministers of Italy, thirty-six deputies, and eleven senators. Baron Ricasoli, ex-premier and the immediate successor of Count Cavour, is an earnest promoter of the objects of the society. These reforming movements within the Church of Rome are not looked on with much favour by the Protestants, who think that the divine command is "Come out of her, my people," and that it needs a root-and-branch reformation to clear away the corruptions that have gathered round Rome.

Meanwhile, the Waldensian party are actively at work. Mr. Travers, formerly a missionary in Dublin, and now a student at the Waldensian College, in Florence, has been engaged in evangelistic labours among the soldiers at Naples. He tells us that his plan was to visit the guard-rooms and barracks during the day, and invite the soldiers to come and converse with him at night. They would come, and each invariably brought a companion. To those who could not stay, he gave tracts. Those who remained he seated in a circle, generally about six or eight, often more, and joined with them in the perusal of one or two chapters of Holy Scripture, each reading a verse, which Mr. Travers expounded. "In general they listen silently and in wonder, like children. Many were interested in the Word. One, a professed infidel, now a believer in Christianity, became my most regular attendant."

It is not very long since Italy and Spain were almost constantly coupled together as the barest regions of the spiritual wilderness, the very valley of the shadow of death. We have seen that faint streaks of light are appearing in Italy, and there are also a few similar indications in Spain. But the following extract from the correspondent of the Times in Madrid shows that the great mass of the Spanish people still lie "in deepest shades of darkness and of death:"—

"What the religious tenets of the great mass of the Spanish people have been hitherto I need hardly say; what they are at the present day may be easily summed up, for practical purposes, into cold unbelief and indifferentism on the part of the thinking classes, and into abject superstition on the part of the vast masses, who would probably give up everything sooner than their stolid conviction of the incompatibility of the marriage tie with the exercise of the Christian ministry. . .Truly the course of religious toleration has theoretically gained ground in Spain. The Queen has been, publicly at least, compelled to give up her ghostly advisers; the monks are things of the past (not so the nuns); Church property has been everywhere 'secularized'—i.e., confiscated for the State's benefit; and by the recognition of the Italian kingdom, Spain has, as it were, renounced the Pope-King. Under the never very safe ægis of a Liberal Government, attempts are made to win over a small flock to the views of a rational reform, and some priests are even at the head of the movement. But all such endeavours must needs founder in Spain, as they do in France and Italy, against the utter unwillingness of the educated and half-educated people to give even the most passing thought to the subject. 'Let the religion of the country be as it is, or let there be none,' seems to be the cry, and the physician who could well deal with mere spiritual disease, is utterly helpless and hopeless when confronted by blank spiritual death. Nothing would make me happier than to report progress were I at any time to fall in with its unmistakeable symptoms."

A correspondent of Evangelical Christendom gives an account of the recent missionary work in TURKEY. He considers the present state of missions as more favourable than it has been for many years. In Constantinople all the Protestant congregations are now much larger than they have been for a long time. The houses of the Christian Turks are constantly watched by Government spies, but there have been no persecutions like those of last year. In Bulgaria great numbers of the better-educated classes are already Protestants at heart, and would not hesitate to declare themselves such if they could hope to carry the masses with them. In Asiatic Turkey the work is rapidly advancing. A Protestant pastor has just been ordained over the congregation at Cæsarea in the heart of Asia Minor, and more than 700 persons were present on the occasion. In Aintab, Oorfa, Marash, and other places, the well-known success of the Protestant movement has been fully sustained; while in other places new Protestant communities have sprung up within a year. The people are fairly taking hold of the principle that they must support their own religious institutions, and not be for ever dependent on foreign aid. "In short," continues the writer, "there is everything to encourage the Church to new faith, and zeal in the great work of evangelizing the world."

It would appear that in the Roman Catholic Church in MEXICO a movement is going on, in favour of the English Liturgy, similar to that which has been noticed in connection with Italy. Last year the Protestant Episcopal Church of the United States sent the Rev. Dr. Nicholson, one of their number, on a tour of observation through Mexico. The Missionary organ of that Church says:—"Dr. Nicholson not only surveyed the ground, but has really inaugurated our Church service there; and being obliged to return here for conference with the Foreign Committee, has left his mission in charge of one of the priests who have joined it—the Rev. Father Aguilar—whose accomplishments and devotion are well spoken of by those in Mexico who favour a reformation in the Church. Father Aguilar represents a multitude of devout priests and good people in the States of Mexico, who have cast out the Pope and Popery; and calling themselves true Catholics, but not Romanists, claim kindred with us, and adopt our Book of Common Prayer as their basis of union, exponent of faith, and guide to worship. . . The growth of the society has been wonderful, and its forces having been centralised by our missionary during his late visit, and its subordinates being now brought into union under a federal constitution, an executive committee, and a chief pastor, it bids fair to realise the aspirations of its friends, and accomplish the primal object of its institution, namely, 'to introduce into every part of Mexico a faith and worship in every particular like our own.'"

In NEW SOUTH WALES, a union has been effected among some of the Presbyterian bodies. The union is similar to that which occurred a few years ago in Victoria, and embraces the adherents of churches corresponding in Scotland to the Established, the Free, and the United Presbyterian.

The Church Missionary Society in its December paper records, with affectionate regret, the loss which the Society has sustained by the death of three honorary life governors who had rendered essential service to the Society:—The Rev. Henry Venn Elliott, M.A., Incumbent of St. Mary's Chapel, Brighton; the Rev. John Norman Pearson, M.A., first Principal of the Islington Institution (1825); and the Rev. H. Stowell, M.A., Incumbent of Christ Church, Salford, and Hon. Canon of Chester.

The recent meeting of the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions at Chicago had the following compact statement of their missions presented to them:—The total number of missions is 20; of stations, 104; of out stations, 248. Number of teachers, missionaries and helpers employed, 1103; number of churches, 180; church members, 23,338; schools, 369; pupils, 10,722. The interest of the meeting arose in a great measure from the presence of missionaries who had served a very long period. Dr. Goodell, of Constantinople, who had been above forty years a missionary, said—"I went in 1822 to be a missionary at Jerusalem; I have never been there. Now I set my face towards the new Jerusalem, taking Chicago by the way." Another missionary, from the South Seas, told the meeting that his son, who was born in the Sandwich Islands, had become a missionary to one of the most benighted tribes, and in the New Testament translated into their language had given his legacy to them and to their descendants.

Those who sigh for the romantic era of missions, and find the ordinary records of missionary progress prosaic or monotonous, should peruse, in the December number of the Missionary Magazine and Chronicle, the Journal of the Rev. A. W. Murray's visit to what are called the Lagoon Islands, in the South Sea. The missionaries of the London Society in the Navigators' Group were induced last May to send Mr. Murray, one of their number, to visit several clusters of small islands about 600 miles distant. Mr. Murray was accompanied by three native teachers, one of whom, Elekana, had been shipwrecked in 1861 on one of the islands, Nukulaelae; and, in return for the humanity and kindness of the natives, had given them some instruction in Christianity, and promised to come back. The people welcomed the missionary party with delight, but an event that had happened since Elekana's visit still left its gloomy shadow on their hearts. Two slave-ships from Peru had visited the island, and had first tried to lure the natives on board by proposing to carry them to some other island to make cocoa-nut oil, for which they were to be paid liberally, and then allowed to return. Finding that this offer did not take, the captains of the two ships came ashore, accompanied by the mate of one of them, and gave out that the mate was a missionary, and that they wanted the people to go on board, to go where they would be taught the true religion, and afterwards be brought back to their own island. A negro of the name of Tom Rose, who had lent himself as the tool of the slavers, acted as interpreter, and, as he had been at one time a sort of religious teacher among the natives, their suspicions were not aroused. The people flocked on board the ships, through anxiety to be taught about God. Once on board, they were entirely in the power of their captors, and carried off to Peru. The population of the island was reduced from 300 to about 100. The portion carried off happily had with them some portions of the New Testament, which they had obtained in a singular way. When Elekana was wrecked on the island, he had a copy of a Rarotongan New Testament and hymn-book. The people were so eager for the Scriptures that they insisted on having the leaves of the New Testament portioned among them. He gave them two or three leaves apiece, and some of these they carried with them into the land of bondage, where it is devoutly hoped they will be the means of guiding them to the true liberty of the children of God. For the instruction of the remnant of the inhabitants of this island, Mr. Murray left a teacher, to their great delight. A second island, or rather group of islands —for the coral reef that girdles them encloses some fifteen, with a lagoon in the centre—was found to have been nearly depopulated in the same barbarous manner; but through their chief the remnant exhibited the same desire for instruction, hailing their visitors with the words, "We are all in darkness, and waiting for some one to teach us." Other three islands were visited, with populations of about 300, for the slavers had not been successful with them; but with only one of these three had Mr. Murray a teacher to leave. The remarkable thing about the whole of these people was, that they had all in heart abjured heathenism, and were waiting and longing for Christian teaching. But in what manner and by what means this remarkable spirit had been raised, can hardly be surmised. In the case of one of the islands, a Captain Stewart had visited the people, some ten years ago, and is believed to have taught them something, for the people after his visit burned their gods. But some subtle influence seems to have been at work with the whole of them, preparing them for the truth. It is a great advantage that these people are originally sprung from Samoa, for their language is pretty nearly the same, and the missionary agency from Samoa will avail for their evangelisation. Though the population be but small, the good to be accomplished by missionary effort may be much greater than would at first be supposed; for one of the islands, Nui, is connected with the Kingsmill group, which contains a population estimated at 60,000, and may become a channel of missionary influence to that large body of people.

Among recent books a prominent place is due to "The Zambesi and its Tributaries," the new volume of Dr. Livingstone's travels. The first object of the expedition described in this volume was to explore the Zambesi, its mouths and tributaries, with a view to their being used as highways for commerce and Christianity to pass into the vast interior of Africa. Besides its interest in connection with geographical science, natural history, and commerce, the volume is full of interesting views of the character and manners of the African races. It gives us much fresh insight into that darkest curse that ever fell on the human family—the slave-trade. It indicates some useful considerations bearing on the best course for missionary enterprise. And it has some touching details regarding the death of Bishop Mackenzie, and also of Mrs. Livingstone. But as we may have an opportunity of returning to this volume, we shall not dwell longer on it at present.

"Thoughts at Seventy-nine" is the title of a little volume which the venerable and estimable author of "Thoughts on Devotion" has lately issued. Besides a few minor pieces, the volume is made up in the main of four essays, the most striking of which are those on "New Testament Precepts" and on "Conscience and its Perversions." The essay on New Testament precepts handles in a judicious and satisfactory manner a number of questions that are apt to cause difficulty to conscientious Christians. The extent and nature of the duty of self-denial, in connection with the accumulation and expenditure of wealth, is very plainly set forth, the ascetic view of self-denial being shown not to be the Christian, and the Christian view being harmonized with that enjoyment of God's gifts which He designs for those on whom He bestows them. There is much useful and salutary truth in the essay on "Conscience and its Perversions."

In Missionary Biography "Ten Years in South-Central Polynesia, being Reminiscences of a Personal Visit to the Friendly Islands and their Dependencies, by the Rev. Thos. West," assures us that the notion of the coral reefs being built up from the foundation by the coral insects is a mistake, and that they only perform their function on the surfaces of those volcanic ridges that have already attained such an elevation as suits their habits. While giving some information on physical subjects, this book chiefly describes the rise and progress, and triumphs of Christianity in the Tonga group, under the Wesleyan missionaries. It appears that connected with the mission there are now 18 ministers, assisted by more than 800 local preachers, 214 day-school and 676 Sunday-school teachers. The usual attendance at worship is 26,166. The Romish missionaries here as elsewhere have established themselves in the wake of the Protestants, and Polynesia has its Romish bishop. King George, himself a preacher, is a nursing father to the Protestant Church, and is represented as exercising an enlightened sway, and as the author of a constitution which works most favourably for the people.

ANNALS OF A QUIET NEIGHBOURHOOD.

BY THE VICAR.

XI.

I NEVER asked questions about the private affairs of any of my parishioners, except of themselves individually upon occasion of their asking me for advice, and some consequent necessity for knowing more than they told me. Hence, I believe, they became the more willing that I should know. But I heard a good many things from others, notwithstanding, for I could not be constantly closing the lips of the communicative as I had done those of Jane Rogers. And amongst other things, I learned that Miss Oldcastle went most Sundays to the neighbouring town of Addicehead to church. Now I had often heard of the ability of the rector, and although I had never met him, was prepared to find him a cultivated if not an original man. Still, if I must be honest, which I hope I must, I confess that I heard the news with a pang, in analysing which I discovered the chief component to be jealousy. It was no use asking myself why I should be jealous : there the ugly thing was. So I went and told God I was ashamed, and begged Him to deliver me from the evil, because his was the kingdom and the power and the glory. And He took my part against myself, for He waits to be gracious. Perhaps the reader may, however, suspect a deeper cause for this feeling (to which I would rather not give the true name again) than a merely professional one.

But there was one stray sheep of my flock that appeared in church for the first time on the morning of Christmas Day—Catherine Weir. She did not sit beside her father, but in the most shadowy corner of the church—near the organ loft, however. She could have seen her father if she had looked up, but she kept her eyes down the whole time, and never even lifted them to me. The spot on one cheek was much brighter than that on the other, and made her look very ill.

I prayed to our God to grant me the honour of speaking a true word to them all; which honour I thought I was right in asking, because the Lord reproached the Pharisees for not seeking the honour that cometh from God. Perhaps I may have put a wrong interpretation on the passage. It is, however, a joy to think that He will not give you a stone, even if you should take it for a loaf and ask for it as such. Nor is He, like the scribes, lying in wait to catch poor erring men in their words or their prayers, however mistaken they may be.

I took my text from the Sermon on the Mount. And as the SUNDAY MAGAZINE is intended chiefly for Sunday reading, I will write my sermon just as if I were preaching it to my unseen readers as I spoke it to my present parishioners. Hear me, then, in truth, and for truth.

The Gospel according to St. Matthew, the sixth chapter, and part of the twenty-fourth and twenty-fifth verses :—

"'Ye cannot serve God and Mammon. Therefore I say unto you, Take no thought for your life.'

"When the Child whose birth we celebrate with glad hearts this day, grew up to be a man, He said this. Did He mean it?—He never said what He did not mean. Did He mean it wholly?—He meant it far beyond what the words could convey. He meant it altogether and entirely. When people do not understand what the Lord says, when it seems to them that his advice is impracticable, instead of searching deeper for a meaning which will be evidently true and wise, they comfort themselves by thinking He could not have meant it altogether, and so leave it. Or they think that if He did mean it, He could not expect them to carry it out. And in the fact that they could not do it perfectly if they were to try, they take refuge from the duty of trying to do it at all; or, oftener, they do not think about it at all as anything that in the least concerns them. The Son of our Father in heaven may have become a child, may have led the one life which belongs to every man to lead, may have suffered because we are sinners, may have died for our sakes, doing the will of his Father in heaven, and yet we have nothing to do with the words He spoke out of the midst of his true, perfect knowledge, feeling, and action! Is it not strange that it should be so? Let it not be so with us this day. Let us seek to find out what our Lord means, that we may do it; trying and failing and trying again—verily to be victorious at last—what matter when, so long as we are trying, and so coming nearer to our end!

"Mammon, you know, means riches. Now, riches are meant to be the slave—not even the servant of man, and not to be the master. If a man serve his own servant, or, in a word, anyone who has no just claim to be his master, he is a slave. But here he serves his own slave. On the other hand, to serve God, the source of our being, our own glorious Father, is freedom; in fact, is the only way to get rid of all bondage. So you see plainly enough that a man cannot serve God and Mammon. For how can a slave of his own slave be the servant of the God of freedom, of Him who can have no one to serve Him but a free man? His service is freedom. Do not, I pray you, make any confusion between service and slavery. To serve is the highest, noblest calling in creation. For even the Son of Man came not to be ministered unto, but to minister.

"But how can a man serve riches? Why, when he says to riches, "Ye are my good." When he feels he cannot be happy without them. When he puts forth the energies of his nature to get them. When he schemes and dreams and lies awake about them. When he will not give to his neighbour for fear of becoming poor himself. When he wants to have more, and to know he has more, than he can need. When he wants to leave money behind him, not for the sake of his children or relatives, but for the name of the wealth. When he leaves his money, not to those who need it, even of his relations, but to those who are rich like himself, making them yet more of slaves to the overgrown monster they worship for his size. When he honours those who have money because they have money, irrespective of their character; or when he honours in a rich man what he would not honour in a poor man. Then is he the slave of Mammon. Still more is he Mammon's slave when his devotion to his god makes him oppressive to those over whom his wealth gives him power; or when he becomes unjust in order to add to his stores.—How will it be with such a man when on a sudden he finds that the world has vanished, and he is alone with God? There lies the body in which he used to live, whose poor necessities first made money of value to him, but with which itself and its fictitious value are both left behind. He cannot now even try to bribe God with a cheque. The angels will not bow down to him because his property, as set forth in his will, takes five or six figures to express its amount. It makes no difference to them that he has lost it, though; for they never respected him. And the poor souls of Hades, who envied him the wealth they had lost before, rise up as one man to welcome him, not for love of him—no worshipper of Mammon loves another—but rejoicing in the mischief that has befallen him, and saying, "Art thou also become one of us?" And Lazarus in Abraham's bosom, however sorry he may be for him, however grateful he may feel to him for the broken victuals and the penny, cannot with one drop of the water of Paradise cool that man's parched tongue.

"Alas, poor Dives! poor server of Mammon, whose vile god can pretend to deliver him no longer! Or rather, for the blockish god never pretended anything—it was the man's own doing—Alas for the Mammon-worshipper! he can no longer deceive himself in his riches. And so even in hell he is something nobler than he was on earth: for he worships his riches no longer. He cannot. He curses them.

"Terrible things to say on Christmas Day! But if Christmas Day teaches us anything, it teaches us to worship God and not Mammon; to worship spirit and not matter; to worship love and not power.

"Do I now hear any of my friends saying in their hearts: Let the rich take that! It does not apply to us. We are poor enough? Ah, my friends, I have known a light-hearted, liberal rich man lose his riches, and be liberal and light-hearted still. I knew a rich lady once, in giving a large gift of money to a poor man, say apologetically, "I hope it is no disgrace in me to be rich, as it is none in you to be poor." It is not the being rich that is wrong, but the serving of riches, instead of making them serve your neighbour and yourself—your neighbour for this life, yourself for the everlasting habitations. God knows it is hard for the rich man to enter into the kingdom of heaven; but the rich man does sometimes enter in; for God hath made it possible. And the greater the victory, when it is the rich man that overcometh the world. It is easier for the poor man to enter into the kingdom, yet many of the poor have failed to enter in, and the greater is the disgrace of their defeat. For the poor have more done for them, as far as outward things go, in the way of salvation than the rich, and have a beatitude all to themselves besides. For in the making of this world as a school of salvation, the poor, as the necessary majority, have been more regarded than the rich. Do not think, my poor friend, that God will let you off. He lets nobody off. You, too, must pay the uttermost farthing. He loves you too well to let you serve Mammon a whit more than your rich neighbour. "Serve Mammon!" do you say? "How can I serve Mammon? I have no Mammon to serve."—Would you like to have riches a moment sooner than God gives them? Would you serve Mammon if you had him?—"Who can tell?" do you answer? "Leave those questions till I am tried." But is there no bitterness in the tone of that response? Does it not mean, "It will be a long time before I have a chance of trying that?"—But I am not driven to such questions for the chance of convicting some of you of Mammon-worship. Let us look to the text. Read it again.

"'Ye cannot serve God and Mammon. Therefore I say unto you, Take no thought for your life.'

"Why are you to take no thought? Because you cannot serve God and Mammon. Is taking thought, then, a serving of Mammon? Clearly.—Where are you now, poor man? Brooding over the frost? Will it harden the ground so that the God of the sparrows cannot find food for his sons? Where are you now, poor woman? Sleepless over the empty cupboard and to-morrow's dinner? "It is because we have no bread," do you answer? Have you forgotten the five loaves among the five thousand, and the fragments that were left? Or do you know nothing of your Father in Heaven, who clothes the lilies and feeds the birds? O ye of little faith! O ye poor-spirited Mammon-worshippers! who worship him not even because he has given you anything, but in the hope that he may some future day benignantly regard you. But I may be too hard upon you. I know well that our Father sees a great difference between the man who is anxious about his children's dinner, or even about his own, and the man who is only anxious to add another ten thousand to his much goods laid up for many years. But you ought to find it easy to trust in God for such a matter as your daily bread, whereas no man can by any possibility trust in God for ten thousand pounds. The former need is a God-ordained necessity; the latter desire a man-devised appetite at best—possibly swinish greed. Tell me, do you long to be rich? Then you worship Mammon. Tell me, do you think you would feel safer if you had money in the bank? Then you are Mammon-worshippers; for you would trust the barn of the rich man rather than the God who makes the corn to grow. Do you say—"What shall we eat? and what shall we drink? and wherewithal shall we be clothed?" Are ye thus of doubtful mind?—Then you are Mammon-worshippers.

"But how is the work of the world to be done if we take no thought?—We are nowhere told not to take thought. We must take thought. The question is—what are we to take or not to take thought about? By some who do not know God, little work would be done if they were not driven by anxiety of some kind. But you, friends—are you content to go with the nations of the earth, or do you seek a better way?

"What then are we to take thought about? Why, about our work. What are we not to take thought about? Why, about our life. The one is our business: the other is God's. But you turn it the other way. You take no thought of earnestness about the doing of your duty; but you take thought of care lest God should not fulfil his part in the goings on of the world. A man's business, once he is in a right relation to God, is just to do his duty: God takes upon Himself the feeding and the clothing. Will the work of the world be neglected if a man thinks of his work, his duty, God's will to be done, instead of what he is to eat, what he is to drink, and wherewithal he is to be clothed? And remember all the needs of the world come back to these three. You will allow, I think, that the work of the world will be only so much the better done; that the very means of procuring the raiment or the food will be the more thoroughly used. What, then, is the only region on which the doubt can settle? Why, God. He alone remains to be doubted. Shall it be so with you? Shall the Son of Man, the baby now born, and for ever with us, find no faith in you? Ah, my poor friend, who canst not trust in God—I was going to say you deserve—but what do I know of you to condemn and judge you?—I was going to say, you deserve to be treated like the child who frets and complains because his mother holds him on her knee and feeds him mouthful by mouthful with her own loving hand. I meant—you deserve to have your own way for a while; to be set down, and told to help yourself, and see what it will come to; to have your mother open the cupboard door for you, and leave you alone to your pleasures. Alas! poor child! When the sweets begin to pall, and the twilight to come duskily into the chamber, and you look about all at once and see no mother, how will your cupboard comfort you then? Ask it for a smile, for a stroke of the gentle hand, for a word of love. All the full-fed Mammon can give you is what your mother would have given you without the consequent loathing, with the light of her countenance upon it all, and the arm of her love around you.—And this is what God does sometimes, I think, with the Mammon-worshippers amongst the poor. He says to them, Take your Mammon, and see what he is worth. Ah, friends, the children of God can never be happy serving other than Him. The prodigal might fill his belly with riotous living or with the husks that the swine ate. It was all one, so long as he was not with his father. His soul was wretched. So would you be if you had wealth, for I fear you would only be worse Mammon-worshippers than now, and might well have to thank God for the misery of any swine-trough that could bring you to your senses.

"But we do see people die of starvation sometimes?—Yes. But if you did your work in God's name and left the rest to Him, that would not trouble you. You would say, If it be God's will that I should starve, I can starve as well as another. And your mind would be at ease. "Thou wilt keep him in perfect peace whose mind is stayed upon Thee, because he trusteth in Thee." Of that I am sure. It may be good for you to go hungry and bare-foot; but it must be utter death to have no faith in God. It is not, however, in God's way of things that the man who does his work shall not live by it. We do not know why here and there a man may be left to die of hunger, but I do believe that they who wait upon the Lord shall not lack any good. What it may be good to deprive a man of till he knows and acknowledges whence it comes, it may be still better to give him when he has learned that every good and every perfect gift is from above, and cometh down from the Father of lights.

"I should like to know a man who just minded his duty and troubled himself about nothing; who did his own work and did not interfere with God's. How nobly he would work—working not for reward, but because it was the will of God! How happily he would receive his food and clothing, receiving them as the gifts of God! What peace would be his! What a sober gaiety! How hearty and infectious his laughter! What a friend he would be! How sweet his sympathy! And his mind would be so clear he would understand everything. His eye being single, his whole body would be full of light. No fear of his ever doing a mean thing. He would die in a ditch rather. It is this fear of want that makes men do mean things. They are afraid to part with their precious lord—Mammon. He gives no safety against such a fear. One of the richest men in England is haunted with the dread of the workhouse. This man whom I should like to know, would be sure that God would have him liberal, and he would be what God would have him. Riches are not in the least necessary to that. Witness our Lord's admiration of the poor widow with her great farthing.

"But I think I hear my troubled friend who does not love money, and yet cannot trust in God out and out, though she fain would,—I think I hear her say, 'I believe I could trust Him for myself, or at least I should be ready to dare the worst for his sake; but my children—it is the thought of my children that is too much for me.' Ah, woman! she whom the Saviour praised so pleasedly, was one who trusted Him for her daughter. What an honour she had! "Be it unto thee even as thou wilt." Do you think you love your children better than He who made them? Is not your love what it is because He put it in your heart first? Have not you often been cross with them? Sometimes unjust to them? Whence came the returning love that rose from unknown depths in your being, and swept away the anger and the injustice? You did not create that love. Probably you were not good enough to send for it by prayer. But it came. God sent it. He makes you love your children; be sorry when you have been cross with them; ashamed when you have been unjust to them; and yet you won't trust Him to give them food and clothes! Depend upon it, if He ever refuses to give them food and clothes, and you knew all about it, the why and the wherefore, you would not dare to give them food or clothes either. He loves them a thousand times better than you do—be sure of that—and feels for their sufferings, too, when He cannot give them just what He would like to give them—cannot for their good, I mean.

"But as your mistrust will go further, I can go further to meet it. You will say, 'Ah! yes'—in your feeling, I mean, not in words,—you will say, 'Ah! yes—food and clothing of a sort! Enough to keep life in and too much cold out! But I want my children to have plenty of good food, and nice clothes.'

"Faithless mother! Consider the birds of the air. They have so much that at least they can sing! Consider the lilies—they were red lilies, those. Would you not trust Him who delights in glorious colours—more at least than you, or He would never have created them and made us to delight in them? I do not say that your children shall be clothed in scarlet and fine linen; but if not, it is not because God despises scarlet and fine linen or does not love your children. He loves them, I say, too much to give them everything all at once. But He would make them such that they may have everything without being the worse, and with being the better for it. And if you cannot trust Him yet, it begins to be a shame, I think.

"It has been well said that no man ever sank under the burden of the day. It is when to-morrow's burden is added to the burden of to-day, that the weight is more than a man can bear. Never load yourselves so, my friends. If you find yourselves so loaded, at least remember this: it is your own doing, not God's. He begs you to leave the future to Him, and mind the present. What more or what else could He do to take the burden off you? Nothing else would do it. Money in the bank wouldn't do it. He cannot do to-morrow's business for you beforehand to save you from fear about it. That would derange everything. What else is there but to tell you to trust in Him, irrespective of the fact that nothing else but such trust can put our heart at peace, from the very nature of our relation to Him as well as the fact that we need these things. We think that we come nearer to God than the lower animals do by our foresight. But the very glimpses we get of the future, both in this life and that which is to come—what are they designed to do, but to make us more earnest and diligent in present duty? Is not this what we are taught in these words: "Whatsoever thy hand findeth to do, do it with thy might; for there is no work, nor knowledge, nor wisdom in the grave, whither thou goest"? We are like to Him with whom there is no past or future, with whom a day is as a thousand years, and a thousand years as one day, when we live with large bright spiritual eyes, doing our work in the great present, leaving both past and future to Him to whom they are ever present, and fearing nothing, because He is in our future, as much as He is in our past, as much as, and far more than, we can feel Him to be in our present. Partakers thus of the divine nature, resting in that perfect all-in-all in whom our nature is eternal too, we walk without fear, full of hope and courage and strength to do his will, waiting for the endless good which He is always giving as fast as He can get us able to take it in. Would not this be to be more of gods than Satan promised to Eve? To live carelessly-divine, duty-doing, fearless, loving, self-forgetting lives—is not that more than to know both good and evil—lives in which the good, like Aaron's rod, has swallowed up the evil, and turned it into good? For pain and hunger are evils; but if faith in God swallows them up, do they not so turn into good? I say they do. And I am glad to believe that I am not alone in my parish in this conviction. I have never been too hungry, but I have had trouble which I would gladly have exchanged for hunger and cold and weariness. Some of you have known hunger and cold and weariness. Do you not join with me to say: It is well, and better than well—whatever helps us to know the love of Him who is our God?

"But there has been just one man who has acted thus. And it is his Spirit in our hearts that makes us desire to know or to be another such—who would do the will of God for God, and let God do God's will for Him. For His will is all. And this man is the baby whose birth we celebrate this day. Remember that being in the form of God, He humbled himself, and took upon Him the form of a servant, and even the condition of a babe. Was this a condition to choose—that of a baby—by one who thought it part of a man's high calling to take care of the morrow? Did He not thus cast the whole matter at once upon the hands and heart of his Father? Sufficient unto the baby's day is the need thereof; he toils not, neither does he spin, and yet he is fed and clothed, and loved, and rejoiced in. Do you remind me that sometimes even his mother forgets him—a mother, most likely, to whose self-indulgence or weakness the child owes his birth as hers? Ah! but he is not therefore forgotten, however like it may look to our half-seeing eyes, by his Father in heaven. One of the highest benefits we can reap from understanding the way of God with ourselves, is, that we become able thus to trust Him for others with whom we do not understand his ways.

"But let us look at what will be more easily shown—how, namely, He did the will of his Father, and took no thought for the morrow after He became a man. Remember how He forsook his trade when the time came for Him to preach. Preaching was not a profession then. There were no monasteries, or vicarages, or stipends, then. Yet witness for the Father the garment woven throughout; the ministering of women; the purse in common! Hard-working men and rich ladies were ready to help Him, and did help Him with all that He needed.—Did He then never want? Yes; once at least—for a little while only.

"He was a-hungered in the wilderness. 'Make bread,' said Satan. 'No,' said our Lord.—He could starve; but He could not eat bread that his Father did not give Him, even though He could make it Himself. He had come hither to be tried. But when the victory was secure, lo! the angels brought Him food from his Father.—Which was better? To feed himself, or be fed by his Father? Judge yourselves, anxious people. He sought the kingdom of God and his righteousness, and the bread was added unto Him.

"And this gives me occasion to remark that the same truth holds with regard to any portion of the future as well as the morrow. It is a principle, not a command, or an encouragement, or a promise merely.

In respect of it there is no difference between next day and next year, next hour and next century. You will see at once the absurdity of taking no thought for the morrow, and taking thought for next year. But do you see likewise that it is equally reasonable to trust God for the next moment, and equally unreasonable not to trust Him? The Lord was hungry and needed food now, though He could still go without for a while. He left it to his Father. And so He told his disciples to do when they were called to answer before judges and rulers. 'Take no thought. It shall be given you what ye shall say.' You have a disagreeable duty to do at twelve o'clock. Do not blacken nine and ten and eleven, and all between, with the colour of twelve. Do the work of each, and reap your reward in peace. So when the dreaded moment in the future becomes the present, you shall meet it walking in the light, and that light will overcome its darkness. How often do men who have made up their minds what to say and do under certain expected circumstances, forget the words and reverse the actions! The best preparation is the present well seen to, the last duty done. For this will keep the eye so clear and the body so full of light that the right action will be perceived at once, the right words will rush from the heart to the lips, and the man, full of the spirit of God because he cares for nothing but the will of God, will trample on the evil thing in love, and be sent, it may be, in a chariot of fire to the presence of his Father, or stand unmoved amid the cruel mockings of the men he loves.

"Do you feel inclined to say in your hearts: 'It was easy for Him to take no thought, for He had the matter in his own hands'? But observe there is nothing very noble in a man's taking no thought except it be from faith. If there were no God to take thought for us, we should have no right to blame any one for taking thought. You may fancy the Lord had his own power to fall back upon. But that would have been to Him just the one dreadful thing. That his Father should forget Him!—no power in Himself could make up for that. He feared nothing for Himself; and never once employed his divine power to save Him from his human fate. Let God do that for Him if He saw fit. He did not come into the world to take care of Himself. That would not be in any way divine. To fall back on Himself, God failing Him—how could that make it easy for Him to avoid care? The very idea would be torture. That would be to declare heaven void, and the world without a God. He would not even pray to his Father for what He knew He should have if He did ask it. He would just wait his will.

"But see how the fact of his own power adds tenfold significance to the fact that He trusted in God. We see that this power would not serve his need—his need not being to be fed and clothed, but to be one with the Father, to be fed by his hand, clothed by his care. This was what the Lord wanted—and we need, alas! too often without wanting it. He never once, I repeat, used his power for Himself. That was not his business. He did not care about it. His life was of no value to him but as his father cared for it. God would mind all that was necessary for Him, and He would mind the work his father had given Him to do. And, my friends, this is just the one secret of a blessed life, the one thing every man comes into this world to learn. With what authority it comes to us from the lips of Him who knew all about it, and ever did as He said!

"Now you see that He took no thought for the morrow. And in the name of the holy child Jesus, I call upon you, this Christmas Day, to cast care to the winds, and trust in God; to receive the message of peace and good-will to men; to receive the Holy Child himself, as He came to make peace by his life and his death, to show you the Father and bring you to Him; to yield yourselves to the Spirit of God, that you may be taught what He wants you to know; to remember that the one gift promised without reserve to those who ask it—the one gift worth having—the gift which makes all other gifts a thousandfold in value, is the gift of the Holy Spirit, who will take of the things of Jesus and show them to you—make you understand them, that is, and cause you to feel them—so that you shall see them to be true, and love Him with all your heart and soul, and your neighbour as yourselves."

And here, having finished my sermon, I will give my reader some lines with which he may not be acquainted, from a writer of the Elizabethan time. I had meant to introduce them into my sermon, but I was so carried away with my subject that I forgot them. For I always preached extempore, which phrase I beg my reader will not misinterpret as meaning on the spur of the moment, or without the due preparation of much thought.

"Oh man! thou image of thy Maker's good,
What canst thou fear, when breathed into thy blood
His Spirit is that built thee? What dull sense
Makes thee suspect, in need, that Providence
Who made the morning, and who placed the light
Guide to thy labours; who called up the night,
And bid her fall upon thee like sweet showers,
In hollow murmurs, to lock up thy powers;
Who gave thee knowledge; who so trusted thee
To let thee grow so near Himself, the Tree?
Must He then be distrusted? Shall His frame
Discourse with Him why thus and thus I am?
He made the Angels thine, thy fellows all;
Nay even thy servants, when devotions call.
Oh! canst thou be so stupid then, so dim,
To seek a saving* influence, and lose Him?
Can * stars protect thee? Or can poverty,
Which is the light to heaven, put out His eye?
He is my star; in Him all truth I find,
All influence, all fate. And when my mind
Is furnished with His fulness, my poor story
Shall outlive all their age, and all their glory.
The hand of danger cannot fall amiss,
When I know what, and in whose power, it is.
Nor want, the curse of man, shall make me groan:
A holy hermit is a mind alone.

* * * * *

Affliction, when I know it, is but this,
A deep alloy whereby man tougher is
To bear the hammer; and the deeper still,
We still arise more image of His will;
Sickness, an humorous cloud 'twixt us and light;
And death, at longest, but another night."

I had more than ordinary attention during my discourse, at one point in which I saw the downbent head of Catherine Weir sink yet lower upon her hands. After a moment, however, she sat more erect than before, though she never lifted her eyes to meet mine. I need not assure my reader that she was not present to my mind when I spoke the words that so far had moved her. Indeed, had I thought of her, I could not have spoken them.

As I came out of the church, my people crowded about me with outstretched hands and good wishes. One woman, the aged wife of a more aged labourer, who could not get near me, called from the outskirts of the little crowd :

"May the Lord come and see ye every day, sir. And may ye never know the hunger and cold as me and Tomkins has come through."

"Amen to the first of your blessing, Mrs. Tomkins, and hearty thanks to you. But I daren't say Amen to the other part of it after what I've been preaching, you know."

"But there'll be no harm if I say it for ye, sir?"

"No, for God will give me what is good, even if your kind heart should pray against it."

"Ah, sir, ye don't know what it is to be hungry and cold."

"Neither shall you any more if I can help it."

"God bless ye, sir. But we're pretty tidy just in the meantime."

I walked home, as usual on Sunday mornings, by the road. It was a lovely day. The sun shone so warm that you could not help thinking of what he would be able to do before long—draw primroses and buttercups out of the earth by force of sweet persuasive influences. But in the shadows lay fine webs and laces of ice, so delicately lovely that one could not but be glad of the cold that made the water able to please itself by taking such graceful forms. And I wondered over again for the hundredth time what could be the principle which in the wildest, most lawless, fantastically chaotic, apparently capricious work of nature, always kept it beautiful. The beauty of holiness must be at the heart of it somehow, I thought. Because our God is so free from stain, so loving, so unselfish, so good, so altogether what He wants us to be, so holy, therefore all his works declare Him in beauty; his fingers can touch nothing but to mould it into loveliness; and even the play of his elements is in grace and tenderness of form.

And then I thought how the sun, at the farthest point from us, had begun to come back towards us; looked upon us with a hopeful smile; was like the Lord when He visited his people as a little one of themselves, to grow upon the earth till it should blossom as the rose in the light of his presence. "Ah! Lord," I said, in my heart, "draw near unto thy people. It is spring-time with thy world, but yet we have cold winds and bitter hail, and pinched voices forbidding them that follow Thee and follow not with us. Draw nearer, Sun of Righteousness, and make the trees bourgeon, and the flowers blossom, and the voices grow mellow and glad, so that all shall join in praising Thee, and find thereby that harmony is better than unison. Let it be summer, O Lord, if it ever may be summer in this court of the gentiles. But thou hast told us that Thy kingdom cometh within us, and so Thy joy must come within us too. Draw nigh then, Lord, to those to whom Thou wilt draw nigh; and others beholding their welfare will seek to share therein too, and seeing their good works will glorify their Father in Heaven."

So I walked home, hoping in my Saviour, and wondering to think how pleasant I had found it to be his poor servant to this people. Already the doubts which had filled my mind on that first evening of gloom, doubts as to whether I had any right to the priest's office, had utterly vanished, slain by the effort to perform the priest's duty. I never thought about the matter now.—And how can doubt ever be fully met but by action? Try your theory; try your hypothesis; or if it is not worth trying, give it up, pull it down.—And I hoped that if ever a cloud should come over me again, however dark and dismal it might be, I might be able notwithstanding to rejoice that the sun was shining on others though not on me, and to say with all my heart to my Father in Heaven, "Thy will be done."

When I reached my own study, I sat down by a blazing fire, and poured myself out a glass of wine; for I had to go out again to see some of my poor friends, and wanted some luncheon first.—It is a great thing to have the greetings of the universe presented in fire and food. Let me, if I may, be ever welcomed to my room in winter by a glowing hearth, in summer by a vase of flowers; if I may not, let me then think how nice they would be, and bury myself in my work. I do not think that the road to contentment lies in despising what we have not got. Let us acknowledge all good, all delight that the world holds, and be content without it. But this we can never be except by possessing the one thing, without which I do not merely say no man ought to be content, but no man can be content—the Spirit of the Father.

If any young people read my little chronicle, will they not be inclined to say, "The vicar has already given us in this part hardly anything but a long sermon; and it is too bad of him to go on preaching in his study after we saw him safe out of the pulpit"? Ah, well! Just one word, and I drop the preaching for a while. My word is this: I may speak long-windedly, and even inconsiderately as regards my young readers; what I say may fail utterly to convey what I mean; I may be actually stupid sometimes, and not have a suspicion of it; but what I mean is true; and if you do not know it to be true yet, some of you at least suspect it to be true, and some of you hope it is true; and when you all see it as I mean it and as you can take it, you will rejoice with a gladness you know nothing about now. There, I have done for a little while. I won't pledge myself for more, I assure you. For to speak about such things is the greatest delight of my age, as it was of my early manhood, next to that of loving God and my neighbour. For as these are the two commandments of life, so they are in themselves the pleasures of life. But there I am at it again. I beg your pardon now, for I have already inadvertently broken my promise.

I had allowed myself a half-hour before the fire with my glass of wine and piece of bread, and I soon fell into a dreamy state called reverie, which I fear not a few mistake for thinking, because it is the nearest approach they ever make to it. And in this reverie I kept staring about my book-shelves.—I am an old man now, and you do not know my name; and if you should ever find it out, I shall very soon hide it under some daisies, I hope, and so escape; and therefore I am going to be egotistic in the most unpardonable manner. I am going to tell you one of my faults, for it continues, I fear, to be one of my faults still, as it certainly was at the period of which I am now writing. I am very fond of books. Do not mistake me. I do not mean that I love reading. I hope I do. That is no fault—a virtue rather than a fault. But, as the old meaning of the word fond was foolish, I use that word: I am foolishly fond of the bodies of books as distinguished from their souls, or thought-element. I do not say I love their bodies as divided from their souls; I do not say I should let a book stand upon my shelves for which I felt no respect, except indeed it happened to be useful to me in some inferior way. But I delight in seeing books about me, books even of which there seems to be no prospect that I shall have time to read a single chapter before I lay this old head down for the last time. Nay, more: I confess that if they are nicely bound, so as to glow and shine in such a fire-light as that by which I was then sitting, I like them ever so much the better. Nay, more yet—and this comes very near to showing myself worse than I thought I was when I began to tell you my fault: there are books upon my shelves which certainly at least would not occupy the place of honour they do occupy, had not some previous owner dressed them far beyond their worth, making modern apples of Sodom of them. Yet there I let them stay, because they are pleasant to the eye, although certainly not things to be desired to make one wise. I could say a great deal more about the matter, pro and con, but it would be worse than a sermon, I fear. For I suspect that by the time books, which ought to be loved for the truth that is in them, of one sort or another, come to be loved as articles of furniture, the mind has gone through a process more than analogous to that which the miser's mind goes through—namely, that of passing from the respect of money because of what it can do, to the love of money because it is money. I have not yet reached the furniture stage, and I do not think I ever shall. I would rather burn them all. Meantime, I think one safeguard is to encourage one's friends to borrow one's books—not to offer individual books, which is much the same as offering advice. That will probably take some of the shine off them, and put a few thumb-marks in them, which both are very wholesome towards the arresting of the furniture declension. For my part, thumb-marks I find very obnoxious—far more so than the spoiling of the binding.—I know that some of my readers, who have had sad experience of the sort, will be saying in themselves, "He might have mentioned a surer antidote resulting from this measure, than either rubbed Russia or dirty glove-marks even—that of utter disappearance and irreparable loss." But no; that has seldom happened to me—because I trust my pocket-book, and never my memory, with the names of those to whom the individual books are committed.—There, then, is a little bit of practical advice in both directions for young book-lovers.

Again I am reminded that I am getting old. What digressions!

Gazing about on my treasures, the thought suddenly struck me that I had never done as I had promised Judy; had never found out what her aunt's name meant in Anglo-Saxon. I would do so now. I got down my dictionary, and soon discovered that Ethelwyn meant Home-joy, or Inheritance.

"A lovely meaning," I said to myself.

And then I went off into another reverie, with the composition of which I shall not trouble my reader; and with the mention of which I had perhaps no right to occupy the fragment of his time spent in reading it, seeing I did not intend to tell him how it was made up. I will tell him something else instead.

Several families had asked me to take my Christmas dinner with them; but, not liking to be thus limited, I had answered each that I would not, if they would excuse me, but would look in some time or other in the course of the evening.

When my half-hour was out, I got up and filled my pockets with little presents for my poor people, and set out to find them in their own homes.

I was variously received, but unvaryingly with kindness; and my little presents were accepted, at least in most instances, with a gratitude which made me ashamed of them and of myself too for a few moments. Mrs. Tomkins looked as if she had never seen so much tea together before, though there was only a couple of pounds of it; and her husband received a pair of warm trousers none the less cordially that they were not quite new, the fact being that I found I did not myself need such warm clothing this winter as I had needed the last. I did not dare to offer Catherine Weir anything, but I gave her little boy a box of water-colours—in remembrance of the first time I saw him, though I said nothing about that. His mother did not thank me. She told little Gerard to do so, however, and that was something. And indeed the boy's sweetness would have been enough for both.

Gerard—an unusual name in England; specially not to be looked for in the class to which she belonged.

When I reached Old Rogers's cottage, whither I carried a few yards of ribbon, bought by myself, I assure my lady friends, with the special object that the colour should be bright enough for her taste, and pure enough of its kind for mine, as an offering to the good dame, and a small hymn-book, in which were some hymns of my own making, for the good man—

But do forgive me, friends, for actually describing my paltry presents. I can dare to assure you it comes from a talking old man's love of detail, and from no admiration of such small givings as those. You see I trust you, and I want to stand well with you. I never could be indifferent to what people thought of me; though I have had to fight hard to act as freely as if I were indifferent, especially when upon occasion I found myself approved of. It is more difficult to walk straight then, than when men are all against you.—As I have already broken a sentence, which will not be past setting for a while yet, I may as well go on to say here, lest any one should remark that a clergyman ought not to show off to his people, and teach them bad habits at the same time by making them look out for presents—that my income not only seemed to me disproportioned to the amount of labour necessary in the parish, but certainly was larger than I required to spend upon myself; and the miserly passion for books I contrived to keep a good deal in check; for I had no fancy for gliding devil-wards for the sake of a few books after all. So there was no great virtue—was there?—in easing my heart by giving a few of the good things people give their children to my poor friends, whose kind reception of them gave me as much pleasure at least as my giving of them gave them.—Now to effect a junction of the broken sentence.

When I reached the cottage, I found not merely Jane there with her father and mother, which was natural on Christmas Day, seeing there seemed to be no company at the Hall, but my little Judy as well, sitting in the old woman's arm-chair (not that she used it much, but it was called hers), and looking as much at home as—as she did in the pond.

"Why, Judy!" I exclaimed, "you here?"

"Yes. Why not, Mr. Walton?" she returned, holding out her hand without rising, for the chair was such a large one, and she was set so far back in it that the easier way was not to rise, which, seeing she was not greatly overburdened with reverence, was not, I presume, a cause of much annoyance to the little damsel.

"I know no reason why I shouldn't see a Sandwich Islander here. Yet I might express surprise if I did find one, might I not?"

Judy pretended to pout, and muttered something about comparing her to a cannibal. But Jane took up the explanation.

"Mistress had to go off to London with her mother to-day, sir, quite unexpected, on some banking business, I fancy, from what I——I beg your pardon, sir. They're gone anyhow, whatever the reason may be; and so I came to see my father and mother, and Miss Judy would come with me."

"She's very welcome," said Mrs. Rogers.

"How could I stay up there with nobody but Jacob, and that old wolf Sarah? I wouldn't be left alone with her for the world. She'd have me in the Bishop's Pool before you came back, Janey dear."

"That wouldn't matter much to you, would it, Judy?" I said.

"She's a white wolf, that old Sarah! I know," was all her answer.

"But what will the old lady say when she finds you brought the young lady here?" said Mrs. Rogers.

"I didn't bring her, mother. She would come."

"Besides, she'll never know it," said Judy.

I did not see that it was my part to read Judy a lecture here, though perhaps I might have done so if I had had more influence over her than I had. I wanted to gain some influence over her, and knew that the way to render my desire impossible of fulfilment would be, to find fault with what in her was a very small affair, whatever it might be in one who had been properly brought up. Besides, a clergyman is not a moral policeman. So I took no notice of the impropriety.

"Had they actually to go away on the morning of Christmas Day?" I said.

"They went anyhow, whether they had to do it or not, sir," answered Jane.

"Aunt Ethelwyn didn't want to go till to-morrow," said Judy. "She said something about coming to church this morning. But Grannie said they must go at once. It was very cross of old Grannie. Think what a Christmas Day to me without Auntie, and with Sarah! But I don't mean to go home till it's quite dark. I mean to stop here with dear Old Rogers—that I do."

The latch was gently lifted, and in came young Brownrigg. So I thought it was time to leave my best Christmas wishes and take myself away. Old Rogers came with me to the mill-stream as usual.

"It mazes me, sir," he said, "a gentleman o' your age and bringing up to know all that you tould us this mornin'. It 'ud be no wonder now for a man like me, come to be the shock o' corn fully ripe—leastways yallow and white enough outside if there beant much more than milk inside it yet,—it 'ud be no mystery for a man like me who'd been brought up hard, and tossed about well nigh all the world over—why, there's scarce a wave on the Atlantic but knows Old Rogers!"

He made the parenthesis with a laugh, and began anew.

"It 'ud be a shame of a man like me not to know all as you said this morning, sir—leastways I don't mean able to say it right off as you do, sir; but not to know it, after the Almighty had been at such pains to beat it into my hard head, just to trust in Him and fear no thing and no body—captain, bosun, devil, sunk rock, or breakers ahead; but just to mind Him and stand by halliard, brace, or wheel, or hang on by the leeward earing for that matter. For, you see, what does it signify whether I go to the bottom or not, so long as I didn't skulk? or rather," and here the old man took off his hat and looked up, "so long as the Great Captain has his way, and things is done to his mind? But, how ever a man like you, goin' to the college, and readin' books, and warm o' nights, and never, by your own confession this blessed mornin', sir, knowin' what it was to be downright hungry, how ever you come to know all those things, is just past my comprehension, except by a double portion o' the Spirit, sir. And that's the way I account for it, sir."

Although I knew enough about a ship to understand the old man, I am not sure that I have properly represented his sea-phrase. But that is of small consequence, so long as I give his meaning. And a meaning can occasionally be even better conveyed by less accurate words.

"I will try to tell you how I come to know about these things as I do," I returned. "How my knowledge may stand the test of further and severer trials remains to be seen. But if I should fail any time, old friend, and neither trust in God nor do my duty, what I have said to you remains true all the same."

"That it do, sir, whoever may come short."

"And more than that: failure does not necessarily prove anyone to be a hypocrite of no faith. He may be still a man of little faith."

"Surely, surely, sir. I remember once that my faith broke down—just for one moment, sir. And then the Lord gave me my way lest I should blaspheme Him in my wicked heart."

"How was that, Rogers?"

"A scream came from the quarter-deck, and then the cry: 'Child overboard!' There was but one child, the captain's, aboard. I was sitting just aft the foremast, herring-boning a split in a spare jib. I sprang to the bulwark, and there, sure enough, was the child, going fast astarn, but pretty high in the water. How it happened I can't think to this day, sir, but I suppose my needle, in the hurry, had got into my jacket, so as to skewer it to my jersey, for we were far south of the line at the time, sir, and it was cold. However that may be, as soon as I was overboard, which you may be sure didn't want the time I take tellin' of it, I found that I ought to ha' pulled my jacket off afore I gave the bulwark the last kick. So I rose on the water, and began to pull it over my head—for it was wide, and that was the easiest way, I thought, in the water. But when I had got it right over my head, there it stuck. And there was I, blind as a Dutchman in a fog, and in as strait a jacket as ever poor wretch in Bedlam, for I could only just wag my flippers. Mr. Walton, I believe I swore—the Lord forgive me!—but it was trying. And what was far worse, for one moment I disbelieved in Him; and I do say that's worse than swearing—in a hurry I mean. And that moment something went, the jacket was off, and there was I feelin' as if every stroke I took was as wide as the mainyard. I had no time to repent, only to thank God. And wasn't it more than I deserved, sir? Ah! He can rebuke a man for unbelief by giving him the desire of his heart. And that's a better rebuke than tying him up to the gratings."

"And did you save the child?"

"Oh yes, sir."

"And wasn't the captain pleased?"

"I believe he was, sir. He gave me a glass o' grog, sir. But you was a sayin' of something, sir, when I interrupted of you."

"I am very glad you did interrupt me."

"I'm not though, sir. I've lost summat I'll never hear more."

"No, you shan't lose it. I was going to tell you how I think I came to understand a little about the things I was talking of to-day."

"That's it, sir; that's it. Well, sir, if you please?"

"You've heard of Sir Philip Sidney, haven't you, Old Rogers?"

"He was a great joker, wasn't he, sir?"

"No, no; you're thinking of Sydney Smith, Rogers."

"It may be, sir. I am an ignorant man."

"You are no more ignorant than you ought to be. But it is time you should know him, for he was just one of your sort. I will come down some evening and tell you about him."

I may as well mention here that this led to week-evening lectures in the barn, which, with the help of Weir the carpenter, was changed into a comfortable room with fixed seats all round it, and plenty of cane-chairs besides—for I always disliked forms in the middle of a room. The object of these lectures was to make the people acquainted with the true heroes of their own country —men great in themselves. And the kind of choice I made may be seen by those who know about both, from the fact that, while my first two lectures were on Philip Sidney, I did not give one whole lecture even to Walter Raleigh, grand fellow as he was. I wanted chiefly to set forth the men that could rule themselves, first of all, after a noble fashion. But I have not finished these lectures yet, for I never wished to confine them to the English heroes; I am going on still, old man as I am—not however without retracing passed ground sometimes, for a new generation has come up since I came here, and there is a new one behind coming up now which I may be honoured to present in its turn to some of this grand company—this cloud of witnesses to the truth in our own and other lands, some of whom subdued kingdoms, and others were tortured to death, for the same cause and with the same result.

"Meantime I only want to tell you one little thing he says in a letter to a younger brother whom he wanted to turn out as fine a fellow as possible. It is about horses, or rather, riding,—for Sir Philip was the best horseman in Europe in his day, as, indeed, all things taken together, he seems to have really been the most accomplished man generally of his time in the world. Writing to this brother he says—"

I could not repeat the words exactly to Old Rogers, but I think it better to copy them exactly, in writing this account of our talk:

"At horsemanship, when you exercise it, read Crison Claudio, and a book that is called La Gloria del' Cavallo, withal that you may join the thorough contemplation of it with the exercise; and so shall you profit more in a month than others in a year."

"I think I see what you mean, sir. I had got to learn it all without book, as it were, though you know I had my old Bible, that my mother gave me, and without that I should not have learned it at all."

"I only mean it comparatively, you know. You have had more of the practice, and I more of the theory. But if we had not both had both, we should neither of us have known anything about the matter. I never was content without trying at least to understand things; and if they are practical things, and you try to practise them at the same time as far as you do understand them, there is no end to the way in which the one lights up the other. I suppose that is how, without your experience, I have more to say about such things than you could expect. You know besides that a small matter in which a principle is involved will reveal the principle, if attended to, just as well as a great one containing the same principle. The only difference, and that a most important one, is that though I've got my clay and my straw together, and they stick pretty well as yet, my brick, after all, is not half so well baked as yours, old friend, and it may crumble away yet, though I hope not."

"I pray God to make both our bricks into stones of the new Jerusalem, sir. I think I understand you quite well. To know about a thing is of no use, except you do it. Besides, as I found out when I went to sea, you never can know a thing till you do do it, though I thought I had a tidy fancy about some things beforehand. It's better not to be quite sure that all your seams are calked, and so to keep a look-out on the bilge-pump ; isn't it, sir ?"

During the most of this conversation, we were standing by the mill-water, half frozen over. The ice from both sides came towards the middle, leaving an empty space between, along which the dark water showed itself, hurrying away as if in fear of its life from the white death of the frost. The wheel stood motionless, and the drip from the thatch of the mill over it in the sun, had frozen in the shadow into icicles, which hung in long spikes from the spokes and the floats, making the wheel—soft green and mossy when it revolved in the gentle sun-mingled summer water—look like its own grey skeleton now. The sun was getting low, and I should want all my time to see my other friends before dinner, for I would not willingly offend Mrs. Pearson on Christmas Day by being late, especially as I guessed she was using extraordinary skill to prepare me a more than comfortable meal.

"I must go, Old Rogers," I said ; "but I will leave you something to think about till we meet again. Find out why our Lord was so much displeased with the disciples, whom He knew to be ignorant men, for not knowing what He meant when He warned them against the leaven of the Pharisees. I want to know what you think about it. You'll find the story told both in the sixteenth chapter of St. Matthew and the eighth of St. Mark."

"Well, sir, I'll try ; that is, if you will tell me what you think about it afterwards, so as to put me right, if I'm wrong."

"Of course I will, if I can find out an explanation to satisfy me. But it is not at all clear to me now. In fact I do not see the connecting links of our Lord's logic in the rebuke he gives them."

"How am I to find out then, sir—knowing nothing of logic at all ?" said the old man, his rough worn face summered over with his child-like smile.

"There are many things which a little learning, while it cannot really hide them, may make you less ready to see all at once," I answered, shaking hands with Old Rogers, and then springing across the brook with my carpet-bag in my hand.

By the time I had got through the rest of my calls, the fogs were rising from the streams and the meadows to close in upon my first Christmas Day in my own parish. How much happier I was than when I came such a few months before ! The only pang I felt that day was as I passed the monsters on the gate leading to Oldcastle Hall. Should I be honoured to help only the poor of the flock ? Was I to do nothing for the rich, for whom it is, and has been, and doubtless will be so hard to enter into the kingdom of heaven ? And it seemed to me at the moment that the world must be made for the poor : they had so much more done for them to enable them to inherit it than the rich had.—To these people at the Hall, I did not seem acceptable. I might in time do something with Judy, but the old lady was still so dreadfully repulsive to me that it troubled my conscience to feel how I disliked her. Mr. Stoddart seemed nothing more than a dilettante in religion as well as in the arts and sciences—music always excepted. While for Miss Oldcastle, I simply did not understand her yet. And she was so beautiful ! I thought her more beautiful every time I saw her. But I never appeared to make the least progress towards any real acquaintance with her thoughts and feelings.—It seemed to me, I say, for a moment, coming from the houses of the warm-hearted poor, as if the rich had not quite fair play, as it were—as if they were sent into the world chiefly for the sake of the cultivation of the virtues of the poor, and without much chance for the cultivation of their own. I knew better than this you know, my reader ; but the thought came, as thoughts will come sometimes. It vanished the moment I sought to lay hands upon it, as if it knew quite well it had no business there. But certainly I did believe that it was more like the truth to say the world was made for the poor than to say that it was made for the rich. And therefore I longed the more to do something for these whom I considered the rich of my flock ; for it was dreadful to think of their being poor inside instead of outside.

Perhaps my reader will say, and say with justice, that I ought to have been as anxious about poor Farmer Brownrigg as about the beautiful lady. But the farmer had given me good reason to hope some progress in him after the way he had given in about Jane Rogers. Positively I had caught his eye during the sermon that very day. And, besides—but I will not be a hypocrite ; and seeing I did not certainly take the same interest in Mr. Brownrigg, I will at least be honest and confess it. As far as regards the discharge of my duties, I trust I should have behaved impartially had the necessity for any choice arisen. But my feelings were not quite under my own control. And we are nowhere told to love everybody alike, only to love every one who comes within our reach as ourselves.

I wonder whether my old friend Dr. Duncan was right. He had served on shore in Egypt under General Abercrombie, and had of course, after the fighting was over on each of the several occasions—the French being always repulsed—exercised his office amongst the wounded left on the field of battle.—"I do not know," he said, "whether I did right or not ; but I always took the man I came to first—French or English."—I only know that my heart did not wait for the opinion of my head on the matter. I loved the old man the more that he did as he did. But as a question of casuistry, I am doubtful about its answer.

This digression is, I fear, unpardonable.

I made Mrs. Pearson sit down with me to dinner, for Christmas Day was not one to dine alone upon. And I have ever since had my servants to dine with me on Christmas Day.

Then I went out again, and made another round of visits, coming in for a glass of wine at one table, an orange at another, and a hot chestnut at a third. Those whom I could not see that day, I saw on the following days between it and the new year. And so ended my Christmas holiday with my people.

But there is one little incident which I ought to relate before I close this chapter, and which I am ashamed of having so nearly forgotten.

When we had finished our dinner, and I was sitting alone drinking a glass of claret before going out again, Mrs. Pearson came in and told me that little Gerard Weir wanted to see me. I asked her to show him in; and the little fellow entered, looking very shy, and clinging first to the door and then to the wall.

"Come, my dear boy," I said, "and sit down by me."

He came directly and stood before me.

"Would you like a little wine and water?" I said; for unhappily there was no dessert, Mrs. Pearson knowing that I never eat such things.

"No, thank you, sir; I never tasted wine."

I did not press him to take it.

"Please, sir," he went on after a pause, putting his hand in his pocket, "mother gave me some goodies, and I kept them till I saw you come back, and here they are, sir."

Does any reader doubt what I did or said upon this?

I said, "Thank you, my darling," and I ate them up every one of them, that he might see me eat them before he left the house. And the dear child went off radiant.

If anybody cannot understand why I did so, I beg him to consider the matter. If then he cannot come to a conclusion concerning it, I doubt if any explanation of mine would greatly subserve his enlightenment. Meantime, I am forcibly restraining myself from yielding to the temptation to set forth my reasons, which would result in a half-hour's sermon on the Jewish dispensation, including the burnt offering, and the wave and heave offerings, with an application to the ignorant nurses and mothers of English babies, who do the best they can to make original sin pass into actual transgressions by training children down in the way they should not go.

AN EVENING WITH DR. LIVINGSTONE.

Who does not enjoy an evening with a traveller—a genial, kindly, Christian man, who has been among the strangest people, seen sights that no one else has ever seen, and, full of interest himself in distant and neglected races, strives to communicate that interest to the party that have come together to hear about them? To meet for an hour or two with such a man as Dr. Livingstone, and hear him give a plain familiar account of some of his African journeys, and of the means best fitted, with God's blessing, to benefit the African race, would probably be one of the first wishes and greatest pleasures of a majority of the readers of the Sunday Magazine. Every one, we suppose, knows that Dr. Livingstone himself has again left England, and is engaged once more in his noble endeavour to establish the means of missionary labour and of commercial enterprise among some of the populous tribes of Eastern and Central Africa. We cannot, therefore, have him personally to chat with us of an evening; but we can have what is second best: we may take the large volume which he has just published, and cull from it what we may suppose he would have told us, if it had been our good fortune to spend a Sunday evening in his company. Unhappily, there is little or nothing to tell of the results of missionary labour. Dr. Livingstone is a pioneer, a forerunner of missionaries, rather than himself an acting missionary. He goes to see what can be done, and to arrange for others coming to do it, rather than to do it himself. His idea of his own mission seems to be that he is to conciliate the natives, to disarm their prejudices, to give them a favourable opinion of the British people, to work upon them by kindness and disinterestedness, and thus dispose them to trade with the merchant, and listen to the missionary. But if there be little to say of the results of Christian missions, except that they have hitherto done nothing in those parts, there is, unhappily, far too much to tell of a devil's mission that has been frightfully active and successful—the slave-trade, partly as pursued by the natives, but chiefly by the atrocious Portuguese settlers and adventurers. In fact, the slave-trade has in every way been the ruin of Africa; and, besides making the poor negroes ten times more miserable and degraded than they would otherwise have been, it has proved a most effectual barrier to all missionary and to all commercial undertakings. It is owing to the slave-trade that Dr. Livingstone has failed to establish any centres of missionary and commercial operations on the banks of the Zambesi or its tributaries; and there is little reason to hope for anything better, until measures be taken to repress the infamous traffic on the East, similar to those that have proved so successful on the West Coast of Africa.

For, according to Dr. Livingstone,—and he is so shrewd and careful a man that we can hardly fancy him wrong in this,—the English squadron on the West Coast of Africa has been an extraordinary blessing to that part of the world. Many persons have an opposite impression, and think that England has spent her treasure and the lives of her seamen in vain, in watching those infamous slavers, with which we associate such accursed scenes. Dr. Livingstone is of a very different opinion. There, at the distance of hundreds of miles from the ocean, he found the very decided influence of our national policy: the slave-trade so far suppressed that even the Portuguese spoke of it as a thing of the past; lawful commerce immensely increased; more than twenty Christian missions established; and comparative peace enjoyed by millions of inhabitants. And as regards those missions in Western Africa, of which Captain Burton spoke so disparagingly, Dr. Livingstone entertains a most favourable opinion. At Sierra Leone and elsewhere, Christian natives can be numbered by thousands, who, whatever defects they may have, at least possess the qualification of being trustworthy trade-agents among their countrymen. Making allowance for the fact that many of the native Christians have been the lowest of the low—liberated African slaves,—and also for the strong language of traders annoyed at being prevented from using the people as brutes, Dr. Livingstone thinks that the conduct of England of late years on the West Coast deserves the world's admiration, and that her generosity will appear grand in the eyes of posterity. Neither is it true, as Captain Burton has maintained, that Mahometanism is the only religion that is making proselytes in Africa. The native Christians of Africa contribute no less a sum than £15,000 yearly for the spread of the Gospel. The Mahometans are even beneath the native Africans in their ordinary moral tone. Dr. Livingstone gives an anecdote in illustration of this. He has seen a party of natives plunge into the water to rescue a woman from a crocodile. On the other hand, when a party of his own sailors, who were Mahometans, were coming to the ship after sleeping ashore, one of them walked into the water with the intention of swimming off to the boat; and while yet hardly up to his knees was seized by a crocodile and dragged under; the poor fellow gave a shriek, and held up his hand for aid; but none of his countrymen stirred to his assistance, and he was never seen again. On asking his brother-in-law why he did not help him, he replied, "Well, no one told him to go into the water. It was his own fault that he was killed." This was the part of the priest and the Levite in the parable of the Good Samaritan re-enacted with additional hard-heartedness; for neither the priest nor the Levite was brother-in-law of the man who fell among thieves.

The aspect of intertropical Africa—Eastern, Western and Central—must, by this time of day, be as familiar as his own country to Dr. Livingstone; but the feelings of a stranger setting foot in it for the first time "resemble in some respects those which the First Man may have had on his entrance into the Garden of Eden. He has set foot in a new world; another state of existence is before him; everything he sees, every sound that falls upon his ear has all the freshness and charm of novelty. The trees and the plants are new; the flowers and the fruits, the beasts, the birds, and the insects, are curious and strange; the very sky itself is new, glowing with colours, or sparkling with constellations, never seen in northern climes." Everything in Africa, it was long ago remarked, is contrary: "Wool grows on the heads of men and hair on the backs of sheep." The men often wear their hair long, the women wear it short. Where there are cattle, the women till the ground, plant the land, and build huts. The men stay at home to sew, spin, weave, and talk, and milk the cows. The nursery hobgoblin with us is black, but in Africa he is white. Foolish mothers bid their children be quiet, or they will call the white man to bite them. To the unsophisticated natives of Africa there is something frightfully repulsive in the appearance of white men. On entering villages previously unvisited by Europeans, if a child should be met coming quietly and unsuspectingly along, the moment he raised his eyes and saw the whites, he would take to his heels in an agony of terror, such as we might feel if we met a live Egyptian mummy at the door of the British Museum. Alarmed by the child's wild cries, the mother rushes out of her hut, but darts back again at the sight of the same frightful apparition. Dogs turn tail and scour off in dismay; and hens, abandoning their chickens, fly screaming to the tops of the houses. Unfamiliar sights everywhere present themselves. Here and there may be seen rows of elephants two miles long; in the rivers, crocodiles and hippopotomuses, by no means pleasant to bathe with; and even on board ship, one may be aroused, as Dr. Livingstone was in his steamer, by five feet of cold green snake gliding over one's face. But however peculiar the country, and however different the people, Dr. Livingstone has no patience with what has often been said of the negro race. The notions commonly entertained of their language he regards as absurd; their answers to questions on ordinary topics are about as intelligent as are usually got from the common people at home; and if they are addicted to low motives and mean actions, so likewise unhappily are many of those among ourselves who are not under the influence of Christian principles and civilised habits. Dr. Livingstone is full of hope for the negro race; his life of single-hearted devotion to them is a proof of his confidence in what they may become, if Christianity, and her daughter Civilisation, should find a home among them. Even the unwholesomeness of the climate would in that case be greatly overcome. It is the very richness of the country, in connection with the neglect of its inhabitants, that makes it so unhealthy. The luxuriance of the vegetation is such that when it decays an extraordinary amount of putridity is generated; the very rivers are poisoned by it, and fever hovers on every side. Were the plains cultivated, drained, and reaped, not only would the most splendid harvests be obtained, but the cause of fever would be to a large extent removed. The beautiful fulfilment of the sixty-seventh Psalm, which would result from missionary enterprise in such a country, will strike every reader:—"God be merciful to us and bless us, and cause His face to shine on us. That Thy way may be known on earth, Thy saving health among the nations. . . . . Let the people praise thee, O God, let all the people praise thee. Then shall the earth yield her increase, and God, even our own God, shall bless us." No wonder though Dr. Livingstone sighs when he sees regions of such capabilities turned, literally and figuratively, into the valley of the shadow of death. No wonder though it cuts him to the heart to come on masses of skeletons where he might have looked for living men. His soul is fired with the purpose to dispossess Fever, Famine, War, and the Slave Trade from those fertile regions, and to see the Angel of Peace and Love spreading his wings over them. When he thinks of his father's native Hebrides,

> Of Ulva dark and Colonsay,
> And all the group of islets gay
> That guard famed Staffa round, inhabited by a comparatively happy and peaceful people, why, he asks, should not those regions of Africa—not by any means the sandy deserts that used to be thought, but as rich and fair as any country on the globe—be peopled by industrious and peaceful tribes, worshipping the God of love, trusting in the work of Christ, and adorning the doctrine of God their Saviour?

The primitive faith of the African people, he conceives to be, that there is one Almighty Maker of heaven and earth; that He has given the various plants of earth to men to be employed as mediators between Him and the spirit-world, where all who have ever been born and died continue to live; that sin consists in offences against their fellow-men, either here or among the departed; and that death is often a punishment of guilt, such as witchcraft. The Great Spirit lives above the stars; but they never pray to him, and know nothing of their relation to him or of his interest in them. As might be expected, they are great believers in spells and nostrums. In one district, the medical profession is subdivided to an extent unknown even in London or Paris. There is the elephant-doctor, who prepares a medicine indispensable to hunters when attacking that animal; the crocodile-doctor, who sells a charm that protects its owner from crocodiles; the dice-doctor, a combination of the detective officer and the physician, part of whose duty is to discover thieves by means of dice; the gun-doctor, the rain-doctor, and numberless others. The various schools deal in little charms, which are hung round the purchaser's neck to avert evil; some of them contain the medicine, others increase its power. On one occasion, near the Victoria Falls, Dr. Livingstone put himself under the guidance of one Tuba Makoro, "smasher of canoes,"—an ominous name; but he alone was believed to know the medicine that insured against shipwreck in the rapids above the Falls. In spite of this, one of the canoes struck a rock and was nearly destroyed. But Dr. Livingstone was assured it was not the medicine that was at fault: the accident was owing entirely to Tuba having started without his breakfast.

In the country of the Makololo a man was met with who pretended to be able to change himself into a lion. Dr. Livingstone bid his native attendants ask him to perform this feat at once, and they would give him for his performance a piece of cotton cloth—the article most valued by the natives. "Oh, no," was their reply; "he may come when we are asleep and kill us." This man-lion would sometimes go forth to the forest to kill game, and then, graciously returning to the human form, would tell his neighbours where to find the buffalo or antelope which he pretended to have killed, but had probably found dead. It is believed also that the souls of departed chiefs enter into lions and render them sacred. Dr. Livingstone tells how a lion came near to his encampment one night, which his native followers believed to be tenanted by the spirit of a chief, and how one of them bullied him, and another coaxed him, while the Doctor himself, a terrible unbeliever, supplied him with a piece of meat prepared with strychnine. In another region the monkey is a sacred animal, and is never killed, because the people believe devoutly that the souls of their ancestors occupy these degraded forms, and anticipate that they themselves must, sooner or later, be transformed in the same manner.

Many of their superstitious notions are very grotesque. When a man has his hair cut, he is careful to burn it or bury it secretly, lest, falling into the hands of one who has an evil eye or is a witch, it should be used as a charm to afflict him with headache. In certain parts there is a wide-spread belief that if one plants the mango-stone he will die. Even among the native Portuguese of Tette there is a superstition, that if a man plants coffee he will never be happy afterwards. There are also superstitions among the people that have a more tragical aspect. The ordeal of the muave is often resorted to. If a person is accused of crime he has to drink the muave, a deadly poison. If the stomach rejects the poison, he is declared innocent; if it is retained, his guilt is proved. Even chiefs are not exempted, and in some cases seem rather to enjoy the thing. A chief, making some assertion that could hardly be received, said, "If you doubt my word, give me the muave to drink." The people of a chief who had successfully gone through the ordeal the day before Dr. Livingstone reached his village, manifested their joy by drinking, dancing, and drumming two days and nights. It is surmised that the native doctor who prepares the poison may be able to save those whom he considers innocent.

The practice of polygamy, the sign of so low a civilisation and the source of so many evils, prevails everywhere. Singularly enough, it is approved of even by the women. On hearing that a man in England could marry but one wife, several Makololo ladies exclaimed that they would not like to live in such a country. They could not imagine how English ladies could relish such a custom; for—as they thought, every man of respectability should have a number of wives as a proof of his wealth. Along the whole of the Zambesi, no man is respected by his neighbours who has not several wives. The reason for this is doubtless because, having the produce of each wife's garden, he is wealthy in proportion to their number. One of the greatest battles of Christianity will have to be fought on this ground. Till this notion is dislodged, the position of woman must be degraded; and what that implies we need not say.

The usual vices of a wild and irregular life—the outbursts of sensuality and passion, and the deeds of cruelty which are found in all barbarous nations—exist among the Africans, but not to the same extent as in some other communities. By far the worst vices that prevail amongst them, Dr. Livingstone ascribes, as we shall see presently, to the slave-trade, the most fearful parent of vice and devilry the world has ever seen. Some interesting features of character are often shown by the natives. They are very susceptible to the influence of kindly treatment, and do not readily forget it. When Charles Livingstone, the brother of Dr. Livingstone, was at Kebrabasa, during the rainy season, he gave some food and a small piece of cloth to a hungry, shivering native traveller. Eighteen months after, while the party were on their journey into the interior, a man came into the camp, bringing a liberal present of rice, meal, beer, and a fowl, reminding them of what had been done for him (which Charles Livingstone had forgot), and saying he did not like to see them travelling hungry and thirsty. Ready though they are to quarrel, they often try to make peace among themselves. An illustration of Dr. Watts's song, "Let dogs delight to bark and bite," occurred one day when two men were wrangling and cursing each other. A Makololo man rose, and, to prevent mischief, quietly took their spears from the corner in which they stood, and sitting down beside Dr. Livingstone remarked, "It is the nature of bulls to gore each other." The Makololo race are regarded by Dr. Livingstone as by far the most intelligent and enterprising of the tribes he has met. They are, in his judgment, fine subjects for a Christian mission. When talked to about their lawless forays and expeditions for killing their neighbours and stealing their cattle, they seemed impressed with the crime of killing, but not of seizing cattle. They confessed that they needed the Book of God. If that was guilt which custom led them to do, it lay between the white man and Jesus, who had not given them the Book. They were impressed by the thought that there was a Book of God, and that they did not possess it. They were interested in hearing that God's Son appeared among men and died for them, but they did not feel that He had any interest in them. On the last occasion of holding Divine service at Seshake, the English invited them to speak about the future state. The speaker had made some remarks on the resurrection. They said they did not wish to offend the speaker, but they could not believe that all the dead would rise again. "Can those who have been killed in the field and devoured by vultures, or those who have been eaten by the hyænas or lions, or those who have been tossed into the river and eaten by more than one crocodile—can they all be raised again to life?" They were told that men could take a leaden bullet, change it into a salt (acetate of lead) which could be dissolved as completely in water as our bodies in the stomachs of animals, and then reconvert it into lead; or that the bullet could be transformed into the red and white paint of our wagons, and again could be reconverted into the original lead; and that if men, exactly like themselves, could do so much, how much more could He do who had made the eye to see, and the ear to hear? "We added, however," continues Dr. Livingstone, "that we believed in a resurrection, not because we understood how it would be brought about, but because our Heavenly Father assured us of it in his book."

The history of endeavours to plant Christianity in the countries adjoining the Zambesi and its tributaries has hitherto been a history of failures. Ruins of Roman Catholic mission-stations remain, but no trace that their teaching took hold on the people. An anecdote told by Dr. Livingstone of the Roman Catholic priest at Tette will probably account for this. "During the drought of 1858, a neighbouring chief got up a performance, with divers ceremonies and incantations, to bring rain, but it would not come. The Goanese padre of Tette, to satisfy his compatriots, appointed a procession and prayers in honour of St. Antonio for the same purpose. The first attempt did not answer; but on the second occasion, arranged to come off after the new moon appeared, a grand procession in the saint's honour ended in so much rain that the roof of the Residencia gave way. St. Antonio's image was decorated the following week with a golden coronal worth 22*l.*, for sending the long-delayed and much-needed rain. We never looked with disdain on the rites or ceremonies of any Church; but, on witnessing the acts of worship on this occasion, so great was the irreverence manifested, in the kneeling worshippers laughing and joking between the responses, not even ceasing their grins when muttering 'Ora pro nobis,' that we could not help believing that if, like the natives, they have faith in rain-making, they have faith in nothing else."

It is sad to think that nothing has yet come of all the efforts that have been made, in consequence of Dr. Livingstone's former journey and book, to establish Christian missions in the neighbourhood of the Zambesi. When, a few years ago, a party of missionaries, headed by the Rev. H. Helmore, tried to plant the Gospel at Linyanti, in the neighbourhood of the Victoria Falls, several of the missionaries and their native attendants succumbed to fever almost immediately on their arrival, and the survivers were obliged to retire. Bishop Mackenzie and the other members of the Universities' Mission, it is well known, got into trouble in consequence of their zeal in behalf of captive-slaves, the Bishop died of fever, and the Universities' Mission ultimately left the continent of Africa. The Rev. James Stewart, of the Free Church of Scotland, who came out expressly to select a sphere for a mission in connection with that body, was obliged to return without accomplishing his purpose. And even the expedition of Dr. Livingstone described in the volume before us, though conducted with all the authority which the patronage of the Government of Great Britain could give it, has not been successful, except in so far as it has shown how great need there is both for missions and commerce, but how difficult in present circumstances it is to obtain either the one or the other. How comes it that the establishment of Christian missions is so extremely difficult in that region? There may be a variety of answers to the question: but in the opinion of Dr. Livingstone the great obstacle is to be found in that odious curse—the slave-trade.

The most important feature of Dr. Livingstone's present volume is the lurid light it throws on that fearful system. Nothing has made a deeper impression on him than the frightfully demoralising effects of the traffic. In his view it is the prime agency of the devil in this world for turning human beings into monsters of wickedness. The half-caste Portuguese who are concerned in it are as revolting specimens of humanity as can be found anywhere. The atrocities of Mariano are all but incredible. One of his favourite modes of creating an impression in the country and making his name dreaded, was to spear his captives with his own hands. On one occasion he is reported to have killed in this way forty poor wretches placed in a row before him. It might have been thought that slave-owners, through self-interest, would treat their slaves with humanity; but the slave trade seems always to engender an unreasoning ferocity that is often reckless even of its own ultimate interests. Dr. Livingstone tells of an old slave-trader, worn out with disease and nearly blind, who was not in other respects without humanity, that when his wife died, to dull the edge of his grief, he made a foray amongst the tribes near the mouth of the Shire, and took many captives. This man had made several fortunes; but he managed to squander them all in riotous living, and himself acknowledged that "the money a man made in the slave-trade was all bad, and soon went to the devil." The loss of life caused in these slave-capturing forays is fearful. Colonel Rigby, late British consul at Zanzibar, told Dr. Livingstone that from the Nyassa country, 19,000 slaves passed annually through the custom-house of that island, exclusive of those sent to Portuguese slave ports. But, "besides those actually captured, thousands are killed or die of their wounds and famine, driven from their villages by the slave-raid proper. Thousands perish in internecine war waged for slaves with their own clansmen and neighbours, slain by the lust of gain, which is stimulated by the slave-purchasers of Cuba and elsewhere. The many skeletons we have seen amongst rocks and woods, by the little pools, and along the paths of the wilderness, attest the awful sacrifice of human life, which must be attributed, directly or indirectly, to this trade of hell. It is our deliberate opinion that not one-fifth of the victims of the slave-trade ever become slaves. Taking the Shire valley as an average, we should say not even one-tenth arrive at their destination. . . . . A small armed steamer on Lake Nyassa could easily, by exercising a control and furnishing goods in return for ivory or other products, break the neck of this infamous traffic in that quarter; for nearly all must cross the lake, or the Upper Shire."

There is nothing in all this book more touching than the engraving opposite page 356, which represents a gang of captives on their way to Tette. They form a long line of men, women, and children, manacled and chained to each other, the men, in addition to their chains, being fastened together in pairs by means of beams of wood with forked extremities, the forks being fitted to their necks, and riveted upon them. The women are compelled to carry baskets on their heads, in some cases in addition to their infants, which are bound round their bodies with a cloth. Slave-drivers, armed with guns, staves, and other implements, accompany the gang, and urge them on. The gang, which numbered eighty-four, was met and liberated by Dr. Livingstone, who learned that the day before two of the women had been shot for attempting to unfasten the thongs. One woman had her infant's brains knocked out because she could not carry her load and it; and a man was despatched with an axe because he had broken down with fatigue.

The awful desolation of a once-populous country after a slave-seizing raid, and the terrible scenes that indicate the sacrifice of life, cannot be read or heard of without a shudder. Dr. Livingstone describes what he saw in the valley of the Shire after such an occurrence. "Instead of smiling villages and crowds of people coming with things for sale, scarcely a soul was to be seen; and when by chance one lighted on a native, his frame bore the impress of hunger, and his countenance the look of a cringing broken-spiritedness. A drought had visited the land after the slave-hunting panic broke over it. . . . Large masses of the people had fled down to the Shire, only anxious to get the river between them and their enemies. Most of the food had been left behind; and famine and starvation had cut off so many that the remainder were too few to bury their dead. The corpses we saw floating down the river were only a remnant of those that had perished, whom their friends, from weakness, could not bury, nor over-gorged crocodiles devour. . . . Wherever we took a walk, human skeletons were seen in every direction, and it was painfully interesting to observe the different postures in which the poor wretches had breathed their last. A whole heap had been thrown down a slope behind a village, where the fugitives often crossed the river from the east. . . . Others lay in their huts, with closed doors, which when opened disclosed the mouldering corpse with the poor rags round the loins—the skull fallen off the pillow—the little skeleton of the child, that had perished first, rolled up in a mat between two large skeletons. The sight of this desert, but eighteen months ago a well-peopled valley, now literally strewn with human bones, forced the conviction upon us that the destruction of human life in the middle passage, however great, constitutes but a small portion of the waste, and made us feel that unless the slave-trade—that monster iniquity which has so long brooded over Africa—is put down, lawful commerce cannot be established."

No wonder though Dr. Livingstone is saddened and almost broken-hearted. The sanguine hopes of his earlier days for Africa are blighted by this atrocious slave-trade. If anything is to be done for this great territory, effective measures must be taken to sweep away the cause of its misery and desolation. The suppression of the slave-trade is one of those objects for which all classes of British statesmen are proud to use the power of their country. May they be guided to wise and effectual measures for this end in the East of Africa, and from all our churches may prayer rise with a hundredfold greater earnestness on behalf of those dark places of the earth that are full of the habitations of cruelty.

The Africans have learned to understand England's hatred to slavery. In this respect, our country bears an honourable name, and her prestige is favourable to her missionaries. Her national truthfulness is another distinction in her favour, contrasting for example with the laxity of the Portuguese, whose word cannot be relied on. But other characteristics of a less favourable kind have come to be attached to the English name. In one place, a man's being intoxicated is described by the phrase "he speaks English." The national failing was unconsciously confessed by a sailor of Dr. Livingstone's, who, on its being remarked that certain trees were very like the steeples of England, said "the picture would be complete if there was only a grog-shop near the church."

Dr. Livingstone cannot doubt that, under God's blessing, Christian missions would be as prosperous on the East coast of Africa as they have been on the West. On the West, sixteen societies are at work: six British, seven American, two German, and one West Indian. These maintain 104 European or American missionaries, have 110 stations, 13,000 scholars, 236 schools, and 19,000 registered communicants—representing probably a Christian population of 60,000. "It is particularly pleasing," he adds, "to see the zeal of our American brethren; they show the natural influences and effects of our holy religion. With the genuine and true-hearted it is never a question of distance but of need. The Americans make capital missionaries; and it is only a bare act of justice to say that their labours on the West Coast are above all praise. And not on that shore alone does their benevolence shine. In China, India, South Seas, Syria, South Africa, and their own far West, they have proved themselves worthy children of the old country,—the asylum for the oppressed of every nation, the source of light for all lands."

We might prolong our "evening with Dr. Livingstone" to the small hours of morning, but the best of friends must part. We conclude by noting two or three interesting illustrations of Scripture, culled from his volume. The shadow of a great rock in a weary land (Isa. xxxii. 2), and the sleep God gives to his beloved (Psalm cxxvii. 2) are both illustrated in the following account of an ascent of all but perpendicular rocks. "The strain upon the muscles in jumping from crag to boulder, and wriggling round projections, took an enormous deal out of the party, and they were often glad to cower in the shadow formed by one rock overhanging and resting upon another; the shelter induced the peculiarly strong and overpowering inclination to sleep that too much sun sometimes causes. This sleep is curative of what may be incipient sun-stroke; in its first gentle touches it caused the dream to flit over the boiling brain that they had been sworn in as members of the Alpine Club; and then it became so heavy as to make them feel as if a portion of their existence had been cut out from their lives."

A native's idea of "holiness" is worth recording. "When copious showers have descended during the night, and all the earth and leaves and cattle are washed clean, and the sun rising shows a drop of dew on every blade of grass, and the air breathes fresh,—that is holiness." The resemblance to the imagery of the Bible is very striking—especially to David's picture of the Holy One:—"He shall be as the light of the morning, when the sun riseth, even a morning without clouds; as the tender grass springing out of the earth by clear shining after rain." (2 Sam. xxiii. 4.)

Among the birds of the country, the "honey-guide" seems almost designed as a type of the Christian missionary. "The 'honey-guide' is an extraordinary bird; how is it that every member of its family has learned that all men, whether white or black, are fond of honey? The instant the little fellow gets a glimpse of a man, he hastens to greet him with the hearty invitation to come, as M. Cia translated it, to a bee's hive, and take some honey. He flies on in the proper direction, perches on a tree, and looks back to see if you are following; then on to another and another, until he guides you to the spot. If you do not accept his first invitation, he follows you with pressing importunities, quite as anxious to lure the stranger to the bees' hive as other birds are to draw him away from their own nests. Except when on the march, our men were sure to accept the invitation, and manifested the same by a peculiar responsive whistle, meaning, as they said, 'All right, go ahead; we are coming.' The birds never deceived them, but always guided them to a hive of bees, though some had but little honey in store." We will not go into any curious inquiries as to the motive and purpose of the honey-guide. We would rather see in its singular proceeding a lesson for ourselves. To us has been given the knowledge of a treasure "more to be desired than gold, yea than much fine gold, sweeter also than honey from the honey-comb." And to us there is committed the function of the honey-guide—by our Christian missions to lead the starving African to the Bread of Life; and if he do not accept our first invitation, to persevere with pressing importunities, until at last he finds the hidden manna, and his soul is filled as with marrow and fatness.

W. G. Blaikie.

ON AN IMPERFECTLY UNDERSTOOD SCRIPTURE CHARACTER.

The fact that the Christian Church, as early as the fourth century, began to carry her veneration for the mother of our Lord into idolatory is sad enough, yet that veneration itself has much that is good and noble to commend it to Christian feeling. As Jesus links humanity with God, Mary links humanity with Jesus. It is through her that the Eternal Life was connected with our nature, which was dead in trespasses and sins. No wonder, then, that every one who, since that most mysterious birth, has received the Eternal Life, looks with a feeling of deep and sacred reverence upon her whom God selected from among all the women of the world as the "blessed" one through whom that everlasting Branch of righteousness has been, as it were, engrafted upon our dead stem. We must not be surprised, therefore, that Elisabeth, in a voice of deep respect and hallowed wonder, should have exclaimed, "Whence is this to me, that the mother of my Lord should come to me?"

Moreover, we are apt to ascribe to female piety a purity, a depth, and tenderness which we think the more rudely-framed masculine mind is not capable of. This feeling almost makes us sometimes look upon godly women as beings of a higher nature, forming, as it were, a class between men and angels. A woman—thus we are apt to think, or at least feel—a woman whom an angel approached with the august salutation, "Hail, thou that art highly favoured!" — whom the Holy Ghost overshadowed—who at one time was so closely united with the Son of God that her very life was his,—that woman must have been the most pious, the godliest, the purest of human beings, standing alone among women, and approaching the heavenly, the divine, as nearly as it is possible for a human spirit to approach it. We feel as if left far behind, and stand in awe at the height of her sanctity. Under the influence of such thoughts, even Protestants often regard Mary as the ideal of female perfection and spiritual life, and, while deprecating any attempt whatever to attribute divine honour to her, they yet feel offended at the assertion that she was but an ordinary pious woman, and reject the idea as being irreverent, if not profane.

Much might be said in defence of the feeling of sacred reverence for that highly favoured of women. Indeed, it is almost a natural fruit of deep love to the Saviour. The higher He rises in our affection and veneration, the higher value and honour we feel inclined to ascribe to everything connected with Him. It is true, that tendency may soon lead to exaggeration,—it may give rise to superstitious feelings and idolatrous performances,—but still its origin is not in superstition, but in true Christian faith. Certainly, nothing of the kind will be found in the heart of the infidel. It is not likely that Strauss or Renan, who look upon Jesus as only an ordinary human being, would go to Jerusalem to pray at the "holy sepulchre," or to Loretto to worship the "Holy Virgin." But Christians, who love their Saviour, cannot help thinking of Palestine; for instance, with emotions such as never rise in their mind when thinking of any other country. They cannot well sit down on Olivet to indulge in humorous or light jesting talk, even though they know well that Olivet is but dust, like any other mountain. They cannot help looking upon these things as though they were invested with a certain holiness, simply through their connection with Him whom they adore as their Saviour and God. Before the tribunal of the cold understanding this may scarcely be justifiable, but in devoted Christian feeling it certainly finds some apology.

And as it is with inanimate objects, so it is, and in a higher degree, with reference to those persons who formed the sacred circle of our Lord's most intimate friends. If we did not believe that Jesus is the Son of God, and if we did not love Him as our Redeemer, of course we would not remember Peter or John with any higher feeling of respect than that with which we remember Pythagoras or Socrates; nor would Mary in our reverence stand upon a higher level than Cornelia the mother of the Gracchi, or Monica the mother of Augustine. But we believe in the Son of God and we love Him, and among the evidences of our faith and love is that feeling of sacred veneration with which we think of his apostles, and also of his blessed virgin mother. We do not entertain this feeling in the same measure for any other company of venerable fathers and mothers of the Church, however pious and godly they may have been. We would probably call it bad taste if some one were to use the name of Clemens Romanus, or Athanasius, of Luther or Calvin, for a joke or a pun, but we should not call it profane. We can easily imagine those good men themselves enjoying such a joke or jest. But we could not possibly permit anything of the kind to be associated with the names of the apostles, of Mary, or of any other of those women who ministered to our Lord. It is true, indeed, that when picturing them to ourselves, in the circumstances of their daily life, we find that nothing human seems to be alien to them, so that they must have had their recreations in the same way as we have. But as we can never think of them wholly apart from their relation to our Lord, we are precluded from looking upon them in a barely secular light. Cold-hearted philosophers may sneer at this as a pitiful weakness, but it is an amiable weakness, and one which has all the sympathies of those who desire to remove everything disrespectful or profane from the name of the Lord and those who were nearest to Him.

It must be admitted, however, that this exclusively sacred respect for the first friends of the Lord scarcely does full justice to history, since it hinders us from looking at them as they really were. Yet the offence against history is only of a negative kind. We only abstain from giving full attention to what they undoubtedly were and must have been apart from their connection with our Saviour. Quite different is the case, however, when the offence against history becomes positive—when those saints are placed in a light altogether at variance with what they really were or can have been. Of this positive offence the Roman Catholic Church is guilty, in ascribing an immaculate conception, a sinless nature, an ascension, and an exaltation to the throne of heavenly glory, to the person of Mary. The hallowed respect with which Protestantism has revered and still reveres the mother of Christ may not be completely justifiable before the tribunal of history; but it is a harmless delinquency compared with the way in which Romanism, by her saint-worship, subverts the whole system of God's revelation, straightway leading to the fatal abominations of idolatry.

Such a fearful excess cannot fail to produce a strong reaction on the part of the friends of truth. For the honour of Christ they now feel obliged to allow history to give its testimony in all its completeness. It is asserted that not only do the Gospels say nothing about that sublime holiness to which the Romanists try to exalt Mary, but they even do not place her in the first rank of the Lord's friends. She only moves round the glorious Sun of Righteousness as a star of the second magnitude. Our feeling of devout reverence for our Lord's mother shrinks from endorsing such an assertion. Nor is it my purpose in this paper to prove that Mary was not so holy a woman as she is generally regarded, but was a sinner like all of us—a task to which Christian love would by preference address itself. But when a party rises in the Christian Church with the bold assertion that she was as pure, sinless, and holy as her adorable Son himself, then—however unpleasant it may be—it is the duty of those who know the truth to prove, with the Gospel in their hand, that she was a sinner and, like all of us, came short of the glory of God.

Now the chief argument which has always been brought forward to prove that Mary was a sinful being is an a priori one, based upon the doctrine of Scripture, that all human beings, being of fallen parents, are born sinners. It has thus been argued that as Mary was a human being she must have been a sinner. This reasoning may be quite correct so far as the rules of dialectics are concerned, but experience has shown that such conclusions cannot in all cases be depended upon. On the same ground upon which Mary's sinfulness is thus maintained, it might be argued that Enoch and Elijah must have died. The Roman Catholic Church does not at all deny the doctrine that the whole human race has, in Adam, fallen into sin and death, but it avers that as Enoch and Elijah were made exceptions to the rule of general mortality, so Mary has been made an exception to the general sinfulness of our nature. Of course we do not believe this, and we summon the Pope to prove it. But the Pope cleverly turns the tables, and summons us to prove that such an exception was impossible. That of course we cannot do. We cannot prove that it was impossible with the Almighty to make such arrangements with regard to Mary's conception as to exempt her from the universal contamination of sin. And so, on purely dialectic grounds, Mary's sinlessness must be left an open question.

The argument borrowed from Mary's doxology, in which she calls God her Saviour (Luke i. 47), does not carry the matter much farther. Of course, we Protestants interpret this expression in the sense of saviour from sin, death, and condemnation. Nor can it be denied that this is the usual meaning of that word in the New Testament. But the Romanists aver that Mary called God her Saviour only with reference to her deliverance out of "the low estate" in which she had hitherto been living; and to prove the correctness of this, they appeal to the next verse, where, it is true, Mary does not speak of her sins, but of her humble and despised condition in life. Nor can it be denied, either, that sometimes in the New Testament the word Saviour when applied to God means simply a saviour from temporal misery: as may be proved, for instance, from 1 Tim. iv. 10. So here again the battle must be reported as drawn.

What we need in order to be able to silence the Romanists once and for ever, is an historical proof that Mary actually sinned. But this proof has hitherto been sought for in the Gospels in vain. It is true, the words which Jesus at the age of twelve addressed to her in the Temple: "Wist ye not that I must be about my Father's business?" do not give us a very high opinion of the development of her spiritual knowledge, but we cannot well quote this as a proof that she had committed sin. Sinlessness does not necessarily include perfection of knowledge, and it must be admitted that Mary's being less enlightened than her Son is no proof that she was less holy. The same may be said of the conversation that took place between the Lord and his mother at the wedding at Cana. The words of the Lord: "Woman, what have I to do with thee? Mine hour is not yet come," do not necessarily infer actual sin on the part of Mary. All depends upon the tone in which these words were uttered. They may even have been uttered with a kind of approving smile. That this may have been the case may be inferred from the fact that Mary, after these words, as it were encouraged by them, said to the servants: "Whatsoever He saith unto you, do it." And the fact that the Lord really did what his mother wanted Him to do, proves sufficiently that He saw nothing improper in her suggestion.

But there is one passage in the Gospel, which places Mary in such an unfavourable light that I cannot see how, before the tribunal of Christian faith, she can escape the verdict of guilty. There we really see her in the act of committing sin. The passage is Mark iii. 20, 21, in connexion with ver. 31. The evangelist tells us, that one day Jesus and his Apostles "went into a house" (ver. 19), which soon was so crowded that "they could not so much as eat bread." This was not the first time such a crowd had filled the house where Jesus was. Mark tells in the preceding chapter (ver. 4), that people, in order to come nigh to Jesus, broke up the roof of the house. In fact, it must have been a matter of daily occurrence. The Lord could not show Himself on the street without being at once surrounded by a crowd which every moment increased. Taking shelter in a house, He would literally be barricaded; people would block up the passages, and turn the place, as it were, into a beehive.

Now this effect of the preaching and miracles of Jesus would no doubt have greatly delighted his relatives, if they, like the Apostles, had believed in Him. But we know from John that, at least at that time, this was not the case. "Neither," says John, "did his brethren believe in Him." (John vii. 5.) So we cannot wonder to learn from Mark that they were angry, nay alarmed, when observing the immense stir which their brother caused in the place. It must also be borne in mind that the people who thus crowded round the Saviour were poor. Many among them were objects of public contempt—publicans, harlots, and sinners. The rich and influential classes kept aloof, knowing well that the Nazarene was no favourite of the great men in Jerusalem. Indeed, Mark tells us that just at this time, when the Nazarene, as probably the people would have said, "was setting everything on fire," scribes had come down from Jerusalem, who, upon seeing what was taking place, gave vent to their anger by saying that He had Beelzebub. No wonder, then, that under these circumstances the relatives of Jesus became alarmed. They perceived that their own reputation, and perhaps even their safety, was at stake. It would never do to allow matters to continue going on in this way. What else could be the end of it than public disgrace? "Our brother," said they, according to Mark's report, "is beside himself." They agreed that something must be done to put a stop to this state of things. So they unitedly walked up to the house where they had heard Jesus was, to take Him home, and of course to keep Him in arrest for some time. "They went out," says Mark, "to lay hold of Him."

Now, while the friends of Jesus set out to accomplish their sad purpose, Jesus was in the house engaged in a distressing dispute with the scribes, who had stigmatised Him as being possessed by Beelzebub. Mark gives us a short account of this unpleasant conversation from the 23rd to the 30th verse, and by this parenthesis the thread of the narrative is broken for a few moments. But the Evangelist takes it up again in the 31st verse, and thus proceeds: "There came then his brethren and his mother, and, standing without, sent unto Him, calling Him." Of course they could not get near Him, for the room was full. But the people, carrying the message from mouth to mouth, delivered it to Jesus. "Behold," they said (v. 32), "thy mother and thy brethren without seek for thee." The description of the scene is so graphic, that we see it distinctly before us, as if we had been present ourselves.

Now we would expect that our blessed Lord, on learning that his beloved mother was there, and had come all the way to see Him, would either have joyfully risen to meet her, or have requested the people to allow her to pass in, to take her place next to Him. But Jesus did nothing of the kind. On the contrary, He answered the message in such a way as must have made them conclude that He did not wish to see his mother and brethren at all. "Who is my mother, or my brethren?" He asks, as if in a voice of indignation. Then looking round on them who sat about Him, He said: "Behold my mother and my brethren! For whosoever shall do the will of God, the same is my brother, and my sister, and mother."

I have said that the Lord uttered that question—"Who is my mother, or my brethren?" in a voice of indignation. And no doubt He did so; for it is evident from his words that He knew what their intention was. But for that, his behaviour with reference to his mother is perfectly inexplicable. This is not the way in which a tender-hearted son would receive his beloved mother. It seems a gross trespass against the first rule of maternal love and filial reverence. Something very extraordinary—something exceedingly reproachful must have taken place on the part of a mother, when a son like Jesus could give her such a reception. But we know what that extraordinary—that exceedingly reproachful thing was. Mary came in company with her relatives—not, like her namesake, to sit down at the feet of her Divine Son, to choose that good part, but to lay hold of Him, to stop his Messiah-work, to lock Him up for a time, to deprive the people of his word and blessing, and to do exactly what his deadliest enemies desired.

She came to lay hold upon Him. It is the same word (krateo) which Mark uses in the 17th verse of the sixth chapter, where he relates that Herod laid hold upon John the Baptist to put him into prison. How she, the mother of the Lord, could possibly have allowed herself to be brought to such a deed, is one of the most difficult problems that ever perplexed us. Could she, we would ask, forget all that she had witnessed of her Son, from the moment when the Angel Gabriel entered her humble room with his heavenly salutation, to the day when grey-headed Simeon exultantly praised God, with the holy Babe in his arms? In those days, we read, she "kept all these things, and pondered them in her heart." Were those things all gone from her memory now? If any one on earth could know that her Son was not the son of a human father but of God himself, she surely knew it. Could she for one moment lose hold of that great truth, and allow herself to arrive at such an absurd, nay, blasphemous supposition, as to think it possible that this Son of God might be "beside Himself," and in need of being watched by her?

The idea, indeed, seems to be too absurd. But what absurdities are there which men may not commit, if they allow themselves to be guided by feeling and prejudice, instead of by the Word of God and the enlightened understanding? It is a fact that in those days there was not one believer in Israel who did not expect the Messiah to ascend the throne of David at Jerusalem, and to set up a glorious kingdom on earth. Consequently, among those who believed in Jesus' Messiahship, there was not one who thought of such a thing as a cross. That the Messiah must suffer, and thus enter into his glory, was a truth foreign to them. They all expected Jesus to come forward some day in all the glory of his majesty. But the very reverse took place. He became an object of contempt; only poor and despised people flocked to Him. They waited from day to day, from week to week, but nothing suggestive of a throne and sceptre was manifested. On the contrary, his way was more and more towards the deepest depth of humiliation. This greatly perplexed his friends. But Jesus at length told his disciples plainly, and in so many words, that He was to be delivered into the hands of the Jews, to die, and to be buried. Even this was of no use. "They understood it not," says Luke (ix. 45), "and it was hid from them, that they perceived it not." And where such men as Peter and John, who were always with Jesus, and daily enjoyed his teaching, did not understand it, we cannot wonder that such a man as John the Baptist, for instance, who, strange enough, never joined the band of Christ's disciples, did not understand it either. When that good man at length found himself in the prison instead of on a throne by the side of the Messiah at Jerusalem, he, in his perplexity, sent two of his disciples to Jesus, to inquire whether He was really the expected Messiah or not (Matt. xi. 3). It is true John had at one time, under the inspiration of the Holy Spirit, proclaimed Jesus as the Lamb of God. But we know that the prophets of the Old Testament (and such was John—the last of them) were not always under the inspiration of the Spirit, and that in their uninspired times they often did not themselves clearly understand what the Spirit had prophesied through them (1 Pet. i. 10, 11). In short, there was not one living soul in Israel, however pious and godly, which was not perplexed and disappointed on account of the humble and despised condition of Jesus. And the dark cloud of prejudice which thus dimmed their eyes, did not disappear till it was dispelled by the sun of the resurrection.

We do not read that Mary was an exception. To her the angel had distinctly said, that God would "give unto her child the throne of his father David, and that He was to reign over the house of Jacob for ever." In whatever sense she may have understood these words in aftertime when Jesus had ascended into heaven, this much is beyond doubt, that before that event she accepted them in the sense in which every Jew understood the expressions. If anyone in Israel expected that the babe born at Bethlehem was to become a glorious earthly king, certainly Mary did. But more than thirty years elapsed and nothing extraordinary happened. Now thirty years makes up a long period. Even such impressive events as Mary had witnessed on the occasion of the birth of Jesus, could not but lose much of their freshness to her mind, which was never refreshed again by a renewed apparition. The child grew up like other children. Twelve years after his birth she seemed to have been so little alive to the fact that He was the Son of God, that she got alarmed, fearing lest He might be lost in the crowd. He most likely joined her husband in his trade, and the days and years passed on without anything particular breaking the dull and dreary monotony of a poor artisan's life. Then, at the age of thirty, He came forward as a public teacher, and no doubt Mary's mind must have been quickened again when she heard about the great works which He performed. But soon disappointments came. The spirit of the leading classes turned against Him. Crowds of poor, miserable people flocked after Him, but there was nothing like a throne in prospect. Then her own children and relatives began to shake their heads and shrug their shoulders. Only a strong character, a spirit highly endowed with the gift of faith, could have stood the continuous depressing influence of such circumstances. But such a strong character, such a heroine in faith, Mary was not. Other women followed her Son where He went; but—and it is indeed a remarkable fact—we do not read that she was among them. We find her with Him at the beginning of his career, and we find her, a tender-hearted faithful mother, by his cross; but we do not find her among his disciples who clung to Him steadily as their shepherd.

Truly we find Mary in the wrong place, when we find her, not among "those who sat about" her Son, but among those who "went out to lay hold on Him." It is not necessary to assume that she too believed that He was "beside Himself." We revere and love her too much as the mother of our Lord, not to be inclined to put the most favourable construction upon her conduct. She was a tender, loving mother. To guard her beloved Son against distress and suffering was her heart's desire. Observing the exasperation of the rulers against Him, she could not but expect the most serious consequences from his present conduct. In this fear she was confirmed by the daily conversations of her family and relatives. She may have disapproved of their harsh sayings, that He was "beside Himself;" but she, at all events, believed that He was carrying matters a little too far. At least, to take Him home, and to keep Him away from public life for some time, would do no harm, in her opinion. Nay, it was absolutely necessary, for hers was in those days that same spirit which made Peter say: "Be it far from thee, Lord: this shall not be unto thee." So she joined the company of her relatives who went out to lay hold on Him. She most likely did so, to secure, if possible, the success of their attempt by her maternal influence.

It is strange that the connexion between the 21st and the 31st verses of Mark iii. has been so little observed either by Scripture commentators or Scripture readers. The passage in which the Lord speaks about his mother and brethren in the crowded house has usually been treated in sermons and commentaries as if it stood entirely by itself, having nothing to do with the preceding assertion of the Evangelist, that the Lord's friends had gone out to lay hold upon Him. This seems all the more strange, because we read in the 31st verse: "There came then (own) his brethren and his mother." This then has no meaning at all if it does not refer to something that had been previously said about his brethren and mother. Still, I will lay no stress upon this then, as Lachmann and Tischendorf have rejected it. It is not in the Vulgate. It was, however, received into the text at a very early period of the Church, and shows that the ancient Christians used to look upon the coming of Mary with her family to the house as the carrying out of that plan of theirs, which was described in the 21st verse. Nor is the then necessary to prove the connexion between the two verses. That connexion lies in the story itself. In ver. 20 we are told that the Lord found Himself in a crowded house. In ver. 21 we are told that his friends went out to lay hold of Him—of course while He is in that crowded house; for it is distinctly said that they went out on having heard of his being in such a crowd. In ver. 31 we learn that his friends, now specified as his brethren and mother, really come to the crowded house, and actually find Him there. I cannot see how, without violating the truth of history, we can come to any other conclusion than that his brethren and mother came to lay hold on Him.

No doubt Mary was a pious God-fearing Israelitish woman, but it ought to be borne in mind that her piety was not the ground upon which God chose her to be the mother of the long-promised Seed. That ground lay, not in her mental or spiritual disposition, but solely in her direct descent from David. Even if she had been really sinless, and as pure and godly as the highest of the angels, she would not have been chosen as the mother of the Saviour, had she not been a daughter of the house of David. In a certain sense her piety had nothing at all to do with it; her qualification was exclusively of an outward kind. Of course, she required to be a believing, God-seeking woman, but the degree of piety and spiritual life which she had attained was another matter. With all her qualifications she might have been a woman with great defects. In the genealogy of our Lord we find two maternal ancestors who, no doubt, believed in God and his promises, but at the same time were known as sinners. We are apt to think that those whom God chose to be the ancestors of the great Messiah, and the eminent bearers of his covenant promises, must have been spiritually gifted in an extraordinary degree. No doubt there were some such amongst them, but many of them, too, were men of very ordinary spiritual endowments. Take Isaac, for instance, a man who could prefer Esau to Jacob, because "he did eat of his venison." Or take Judah, who, but for God's providential interference, would have caused Joseph's death. And so we find the very mother of the Messiah in an act of foolish anxiety and unbelief. God's ways are not ours, nor are his thoughts ours. He desires us to know that his Son did not receive his purity and godliness from our nature, but that we are to receive our purity and godliness from his.

OUR FATHER'S BUSINESS; OR, METHODS TO DO GOOD.

BY THE EDITOR.

IV.—OUR CHIEF END—THE GOOD OF MAN.

I HAVE somewhere read the story of a man—if he was worthy of the name—who, though possessing large stores of food, kept them concealed amid the horrors of a famine; shut up, while hundreds of unhappy creatures were perishing at his door. He heard the wail of children crying for bread when their mothers had none to give them; he heard the loud clamour of the maddened multitude; he saw women with infants on their withered bosoms fall fainting in the street; he saw gaunt and famished men fiercely fighting over a bone, like hungry dogs; and while to such as in sepulchral tones, with hollow eye and sunken cheek, implored his pity, he replied, "Alas! I have nothing to bestow," this wretch was calculating the wealth—the cursed, filthy lucre—he would gain by opening his stores, when prices and the famine were at their highest. His crime against humanity, not to say religion, was terrible; and not less terrible its punishment—the wages of his sin, death in a most appalling form. In some way or other, the secret of his well-stocked granaries and cruel selfishness became known; and instead of rushing for food, famishing as they were, the people rose, as one man, for vengeance—forgetting their hunger to wreak their fury on this monster. Their first impulse was to tear him in pieces; limb from limb. They took a calmer, deeper, more terrible revenge. He had refused them bread. They would place him where there was bread enough, and to spare—not, however, to gratify his eyes and appetite, to appease the pangs of hunger, and, returning good for evil, illustrate the blessed rule, "If thine enemy hunger, feed him; if he thirst, give him drink; and in so doing thou wilt heap coals of fire upon his head." Having carried him to one of his own storehouses, with food in abundance on every side, within an inch of his fingers stretched to the full, there they left him, nailed to the floor—bread, bread everywhere, but not a bit to eat—dooming him to pine away amid unavailing cries, and die of famine in the midst of plenty. A tragedy indeed!—and a terrible illustration of the law of nature, and what to a certain extent is also the law of every human government, this, namely, an eye for an eye; a tooth for a tooth; hunger for hunger; and life for life.

This man's crime may have deserved severe punishment at the hands of society. I do not say it did not, for in such circumstances who would listen to the plea, Have not I a right to do what I will with my own? But without entering on that point, and to deal with the case simply on the principles of Christianity, what course would she have dictated? Not certainly that, nor any such, terrible and tragic revenge. No other course, indeed, but such as Jesus Christ, her founder and our pattern, would himself have taken. If any man, he says, would be my disciple, let him take up his cross, deny himself daily, and follow me; a rule which resolves itself into this—Speak as Christ, had he been in our circumstances, would have spoken; feel as he would have felt; act as he would have acted. Now, had Nazareth in his day been the town where this famine raged, and where with others he and Mary had seen neighbours die of want, and had themselves felt the pinch of hunger, does any one suppose that when the wild mob, yelling for vengeance, rushed along the street to wreak it on the author of their calamities, that Jesus would have thrown himself into the throng—to head them, or even as a mere spectator of such vengeance, to stand by, and, without a look of pity or a word of remonstrance, see the wretched man fastened to the floor in sight but out of reach of bread? When I fancy Nazareth the place of such sufferings and such a tragedy, I fancy that I see him leave his workshop, and hurry to the scene. Though foreseeing the time when he himself shall be condemned to a death as cruel, and not one voice to say, Crucify him not, yet in my fancy he presses to the front to place himself between the clamorous, famished, frantic, furious multitude and the pale, crouching, trembling, speechless victim of their vengeance; and there, to my eye, calm and majestic, as he stood one night amid the raging waves of Galilee, he rebukes the murderous passions of the multitude, saying, Peace, be still—Vengeance is mine, I will repay, saith the Lord. Weeping the loss of Lazarus, Mary's first words to Jesus were, Lord, if Thou hadst been here, my brother had not died: nor had that man had Christ been there—or Christianity been there. For though nature, fallen and unrenewed nature, hates her enemies, and, thirsting for vengeance, would drag them from the horns of the altar, Christianity embraces the bitterest foe in the arms of brotherhood. Present in a scene where there were ample stores and a man, wretch and monster though he was, famishing of hunger, she would have lifted in her hand the cross radiant with the love of God and red with the blood of Him who came not to kill his enemies but be killed for them, to ask, as she protested against this terrible retaliation, "Whoso hath this world's goods, and seeth his brother in need, and shutteth his bowels of compassion from him, how dwelleth the love of God in him?"

Besides the glory of God, another grand End for which we should live, as this, and many other passages, and I may say all Scripture, teaches, is the good of others. An end this which we shall be the better able to keep in view, and reach, by forming a correct and sufficiently large idea of what is meant by the term brother, as employed by our Lord and his apostles. Now, when our Lord was, on one occasion, addressing the people, some hearer on the outskirts of the crowd interrupted him, to say, "Behold thy mother and thy brethren stand without, desiring to speak with thee!" As when the lilies bloomed at his feet; or a little bird, free of care, sat sweetly singing on a bending spray; or a sower, girt with sheet, paced the furrows of a neighbouring field, flinging the corn broadcast from his hand; or the valley stood below, with two houses by its brawling stream, one a ruin on a bank of sand, the other weather-beaten and grey with age, yet firmly planted on a rock whose sides the flood was vainly chafing—so here our Lord seized the opportunity this interruption offered to teach an important truth. To the man's appeal and the people's astonishment, Jesus returns this memorable answer, "Who is my mother, and who are my brethren?" adding, as he stretches forth his hand and points to his disciples, "Behold my mother and my brethren; for whosoever shall do the will of my Father which is in heaven, the same is my brother, and sister, and mother!" Was our Lord a stranger to filial or fraternal affection that he spoke what seems to slight the dearest relationships; and on another occasion, addressed his mother not by that endearing term, but irreverent and unrespectful-like, said, Woman, my hour is not yet come? By no means—as his life's last, dark, closing hours bear witness. It is said that the ruling passion is strong in death—hence the dying scholar has been heard muttering classic odes in place of David's psalms; hence the old soldier has fancied himself once more on the field of battle, and put forth his remaining strength, ere he sank back in death on his pillow, to raise a feeble arm, and wave a swordless hand, and, startling the onlookers, thunder out the charge; and hence also, when death had struck him from the helm, the last words of the statesman, ere he sank, have been of the fortunes of his country. And if the ruling passion be strong in death, I am willing that our Lord should be judged by this test. When that alabaster box was broken, what precious spikenard breathed forth to fill the Church and world with its fragrance? Judged by this test, never mother had a more tender son than our Lord; his last, loving, living looks were turned on Mary, and he would seem amid the agony of the cross to have forgotten his own sufferings in sympathy with hers.

Understood aright, our Lord's words do not weaken our household ties. Their purpose was not to undervalue the relationships of nature, but to exalt and magnify those of grace; to teach us that Jesus Christ regards the humblest, poorest, feeblest saint as a brother or a sister—more still, as dear to his heart as his own mother. And this relationship which, by faith, unites him and his believing people in such close and tender and holy fellowship, so unites them to each other that in whatever circumstances they meet, by signs secret to the uninitiated and outer world, they recognise in each other the character and the claims of brethren. His skin may have a hue different from mine; bred for the market, he may be bought and sold like a cattle-beast; he may be marked with the brand, loaded with the fetters, lashed with the whip, crushed with the sufferings of a slave; but if, with faith in Jesus, he lift his manacled hands and streaming eyes to that heaven where bondsmen are free, and, robed and throned, they stand before the throne of God, and share in the glory of his Son, slave though he be, sold though he be, trodden in the dust though he be, he and I are brothers. With the same God for our Father, the same Saviour for our Elder Brother, the same Spirit for our heavenly Comforter, one cross for the anchor of our hope, one Bible for our guide-book, one heaven for our everlasting home, the Gospel tells me to knock off a brother's fetters,—to loose him and let him go. No tie is so endearing and enduring as that of a common love to Christ: and so by that I may be bound in closer fellowship to a man living in the other end of the world than to my next-door neighbour, to foreigners than to fellow-countrymen, to the black man than to his white proprietor and cruel oppressor. And thus, in yonder fields, where the negro man bleeds under his master's lash, or the negro mother weeps, vainly seeking to protect a daughter from brutal violence, I may witness the scene that set Moses on fire, when he saw an Egyptian smiting a Hebrew, and smiting the Egyptian buried him in the sand. Hence in living not only for the glory of God, but for the good of others, we are, because they are brethren in Christ, to regard those who are of the household of the faith as having the first claim on our attention and sympathy, on our help and charity, on our prayers and pity. Who hurts them hurts, and who helps them helps Christ himself. Inasmuch, He says, as ye did it unto one of the least of these, ye did it unto me!

But though the people and saints of God have the first, they have by no means the only claim on our good offices. All mankind are bone of our bone, and flesh of our flesh. Unhappily buried with us in the ruins of the fall, but also mercifully embraced in the covenant of salvation, those against whom equally with us Justice closed the gates of Eden, but to whom equally with us Mercy opened the door of heaven, the lowest savage that roams his forest may address us saying, "Am not I a brother?" nay, the vilest creature that nightly prowls the streets for prey, "Am not

I a sister?" And—for piety toward God is the true parent of pity toward man—if imbued with the love and spirit of Jesus, the sight of a fellow-creature suffering, and by the mouth of every wound imploring help, transforms me into a good Samaritan. Nature, as well as grace, has her claims; and they most adorn the doctrine of God their Saviour whose benevolence, irrespective of creed, colour, country, or even character, rises like the sun, and falls like the sunshine upon all. When a French frigate, pierced by our well-directed, crashing shot, settled down into the sea and left her survivors to struggle with death among the waves, it gave occasion to one of those heroic incidents that shed a gleam of light on the horrors of war. The men who had sunk her, and had other ships yet to fight, threw themselves into their boats; and, heedless of the battle that thundered over and the shot that fell around them, pulled for the drowning, and with the very arms that had wrought the deadly guns plucked their enemies from a watery grave. Nature made her voice heard above the roar of cannon. What was it to our rough but kindly seamen that the head they pulled for belonged to a foe, and a Frenchman? Frenchman and foe, it was a fellow-creature perishing. And in the presence of such a spectacle we should blush for the Christianity of a man who, with the sight of suffering before his eyes and the power to relieve it in his hands, leaves any fellow-creature to suffer; passing by on the other side. He may be robed in the habits of a priest, he may fill the office of a Levite, but with God's showers and sunshine falling alike on the evil and good, and with God's Son hung on the bloody cross for the chief of sinners, to such a man I may well apply the question, "How dwelleth the love of God in him?"

Now, the wants and woes of the world present abundant opportunities of living for the good of others. Speaking only of the poor, The poor, said our Lord, ye have always with you; and, apart from the numerous, too numerous cases of poverty that result from vice or improvidence, many have a hard struggle to live—to keep body and soul together. I have known some come to church on Sabbath without having broken their fast; I have known mothers sing their infants asleep that they might forget their hunger in its sweet oblivion; I have found old age shivering by a cold, black hearth; I have seen an emaciated form lift its skinny arm and shake its thin grey locks to say, when I spoke of Jesus, "I am cold and hungry, nor can think of aught else." This was sad: but, alas! many from year's end to year's end, especially in the dark, squalid quarters of large cities, have a constant struggle for the bare necessaries of life. Objects of sympathy more than of censure, they are sorely tempted to forget the great question, "What shall I do to be saved?" in these—suggested by hunger, squalid rags, and empty cupboards—"What shall I eat, what shall I drink, wherewithal shall I be clothed?" To relieve such poverty alleviates suffering; but more, and in the light of eternity better still, rolls away the stone that shuts up the grave of a soul, and stands, like that at the mouth of Lazarus's tomb, between the living and dead. Nor, as I have seen with my own eyes in these abodes, is bread that perisheth the only, or the greatest want. How many Bibles stand in pawnbrokers' windows?—they who for bread have parted with the Word of Life, excusing themselves almost in the language of Esau, when, addressing one who took unbrotherly advantage of his wants to buy his birthright for a mess of pottage, the hungry hunter said, "Behold, I am at the point to die, and what profit shall this birthright be to me?"

But thousands, millions of our fellow-creatures present us with opportunities of living for their good in matters of yet higher moment. In heathen, in some so-called Christian lands, what multitudes are perishing for want of the Word and Bread of Life? Nor is their case the better, but the worse, that they are insensible to their needs—unlike the hungry man who works for bread, begs for it, will even steal for it, ay, sometimes murder for it. Their miseries, if not their mouths cry, Come over and help us! And with our prayers contributing our money in the shape of Bibles and of teachers,—in answer to this appeal, ready, while we sit at home at ease, to encounter all dangers, and even death itself,—we should be happy, had we millions, to spend them in a cause for which the Son of God spent his life, and poured out his life's blood on Calvary.

Now in aiming at the good of others as one grand end of life, we are to pursue it in an unselfish, generous, brotherly way,—allowing our benevolence neither to be tied down by the conventional rules of the world, nor tainted by its commercial spirit. Our Lord puts this strongly, or rather most strikingly, where He says, "When thou makest a feast, or a supper, call not thy friends, nor thy brethren, nor thy kinsmen, nor thy rich neighbours, lest they also bid thee again, and a recompense be made thee: but when thou makest a feast call the poor, the maimed, the lame, the blind, and thou shalt be blessed; for they cannot recompense thee, for thou shalt be recompensed at the resurrection of the just." But who ever saw such a feast? The poor, the maimed, the lame, the blind,—these we receive at the door where they knock with timid hand, and, in some small coin, in bread, or broken victuals, receive their alms. But who invites them further; ushers them in; receives them as welcome guests into the house, where, treated with frank, respectful kindness, they find a seat at his table, and servants to stand at their back?

No doubt the Church of Rome, as children play at feasts or mimic fights, plays at this thing. I have seen the Pope, a mere play-actor, entertaining pilgrims at his table, where, divested of triple crown and gorgeous robes, he gave each with his own jewelled hand a piece of bread and a cup of wine. The ceremony is performed once a year, and is nothing but a drama—the time, Holy Week; the stage, St. Peter's; the actors, the Pope and pilgrims; and the spectators a brilliant assembly—monarchs, princes, cardinals, priests of all ranks, monks of all colours, and a swaying, fashionable crowd met to see him who claims the right to put his foot on the neck of kings, go through a mockery of Christian lowliness and hospitality. But, while the Pope may be said to carry out our Lord's instructions in empty mockery, who does it in reality? Who would, would astonish society more than by a crime. Let a man invite such guests to dinner, and how people would stop, and stare, and gape with wonder at the stream of poverty creeping along and pouring in at his open door—the lame hobbling on crutches, the blind led by dog or little child, the widow clad in rusty weeds, the poor outcast with rags on her back and at her bosom a shrivelled infant, children, shivering and shoeless, from streets their haunt by day, from dingy dens and cellars their cold homes by night! Not wondered at only, and supposed by many to be mad, the man who dare do this, who would render a literal obedience to Christ's command, might prepare for no measured censure—people saying, this was to turn the world upside down; to spoil the poor; to inflate them with notions unbefitting their condition; to destroy the lines of demarcation which God in his providence had drawn between the different classes of society. What a talk such a feast would make?—how many, more ready to tread the poor down in the dust than raise them out of it, would condemn it as a piece of mischievous ostentation, the empty parade of charity!

Nevertheless, why should it not be tried? It is said of the excellent Lord Chief Justice Hale, that he frequently invited his poor neighbours to dinner, and made them sit at table with himself. If any of them were sick, so that they could not come, he would send provisions to them warm from his own table. He did not confine his bounties to the poor of his own parish, but diffused supplies to the neighbouring parishes as occasion required. He always treated the old, the needy, and the sick, with the tenderness and familiarity that became one who considered they were of the same nature with himself, and were reduced to no other necessities but such as he himself might be brought to. Common beggars he considered in another view. If any of these met him in his walks, or came to his door, he would ask such as were capable of working, why they went about so idly? If they answered that it was because they could not get employment, he would send them to some field, to gather all the stones in it, and lay them in a heap; and then paid them liberally for their trouble. This being done, he used to send his carts, and cause the stones to be carried to such places of the highway as needed repair.

As to turning the world upside down, that charge was brought against the apostles; and, as were true of a pyramid pitched by earthquake or other convulsion of nature on its apex, the world, which sin has set wrong, will never be right till things are turned upside down—till Eternity takes the place of time, the soul of the body, the Saviour of sin, self-denial of self-indulgence, and the despised and neglected poor are treated as brothers—neighbours whom we are to love as we love ourselves, or rather whom we are to love as Christ loved us.

Then again as to ostentation, while all care should be taken that our good is not evil-spoken of, we are not to cease to do good because it may be so. Conscious that it is only sovereign grace which makes them differ from others, none are less likely to make a parade of their good works than God's people. Indeed, I have known some of these run into the opposite extreme—forgetting that the light which flashes over the sea from lighthouse tower on rugged headland or sunken rock, is not kindled to be hid, but seen. A candle, as our Lord says, is set on a candlestick, not under a bushel, that it may light the house; and, however singular our conduct may appear to the world, or whatever occasion it may afford scoffers to sneer, the Christian should never allow himself to be deterred from obeying his Master's behests, following in his Leader's steps, and so making his light to shine that, not he, but his Father in heaven, may be glorified.

It would certainly look singular, while others dole out their charity at the door, or send it by servants or societies to the homes of the poor, were we to invite them into ours. But one of the characteristics of disciples is, that they are a peculiar people, and Jesus, be it remembered, taught his followers that they ought to do many things not done by others—saying, "What do ye more than others?"—saying, "Except your righteousness exceed that of the Scribes and Pharisees, ye shall in no wise enter into the kingdom of Heaven." By all means avoid whatever could countenance vice or encourage improvidence; but let there be more interchange of personal kindness between the rich and poor. I am sure that the sight of worn-out labour, sad and humble widowhood, helpless orphans, and such objects, victims of poverty and objects of pity, as our Lord recommends, sitting all happy at our table, with gratitude burning in their hearts and beaming in their faces, would afford us a purer satisfaction than the highest company we ever entertained. Verily we should have our reward.

True, it may be said, we do this, but after another fashion—through workhouses, hospitals, houses of refuge, asylums, ragged schools, and other such benevolent institutions. Yet these, which form part of the debt the world owes to Christianity, are but an imperfect method of expressing the love which she inculcates, of doing in fullest measure good to others. This object cannot be accomplished but by the direct intercourse of personal visits—those we pay to the poor in their dwellings, or, as our Lord recommends, those they pay to us in ours. It is less the amount given than the way of giving it, that sweetens the cup of poverty and reconciles the pensioners of our bounty to their lot. There are delicate perfumes that owe their fragrance to elements so volatile and etherial, that much of their virtue is lost when they are poured from one vessel to another. So it is with charity, the pleasure it yields, and the gratitude it awakens. Those kind looks and tones which bespeak the feelings of the heart, you cannot transmit with the goods or gold, the meat or messages, which you send through the medium of servants or societies, or any second party whatever. As far as possible, therefore, every one should be the almoner of his own charities, and carry the sunbeams of his presence into the homes of the poor.

Let me remark further, that I fear we have not faith enough in the literal sense of many of our Lord's injunctions, as is touchingly illustrated by the following fact:—Two boys, brothers, had fallen out, and in the heat and whirlwind of his passion the elder struck the younger on the cheek. Brave as steel and quick as lightning, the other raised his arm to return the blow; but ere it fell, he remembered how he had read that morning by his mother's knee these words, "When one smites thee on the one cheek, turn to him the other also." No sophist, but a simple child who took Christ's words in their plain and ordinary sense, he drops his arm, and turning on his brother eyes where tears of forgiveness had quenched the flash of anger, he offered the other cheek for a second blow. It was the other's turn to weep now. Surprised, subdued, melted, he fell on his brother's neck; and, kissing him, acknowledged his offence and implored forgiveness. And there, locked in fond embraces, the two boys stood a living proof of this, that our Lord's highest and apparently most impracticable injunctions admit of a more literal obedience than any give them, and than any almost suppose it possible to give them.

Our Lord himself teaches us by his own example how we are to live for others, and reach this one grand end of life. He laid down his life for us, nor are we to shrink from doing the same for others. The world has made her boast of men who, for suffering kindred and bleeding country, have risked and even lost their lives. And indeed there are few worthy of the name of men who, did they see a fellow-creature sending forth wild shrieks and stretching out suppliant hands from the window of a blazing house, would not shake off such as sought to detain them, and bursting open the door, rush in to save another's life at the peril of their own. And when the ship, hurled by a tempest on the foaming reef, lies off shore with the waves sweeping her deck, and her crew, lashed to the masts or hanging on by the shrouds, implore help in cries heard above the roar of breakers, are not brave men found to volunteer for the rescue, and throw themselves into the life-boat; risking their own lives to save the lives of others? But thus to peril life and to lay it down, as he does who takes another's place on the fatal drop, are different, very different things. I will find you a thousand men who will do the first for one you will find to do the second. Yet this is that which the example of Christ may call us to do for the good of others. Hereby, says the apostle, know we the love of God because he laid down his life for us; not staked it, nor even lost it, but laid it down. And the sacrifice which the good of others may require at our hands, is not only to follow Jesus in those walks where he went about continually doing good, but follow him when he took his way to Calvary, following him to death. For the apostle does not conclude that we should part merely with our money, or luxuries, or ease, or comforts for the good of others, but with that which the devil—speaking truth for once—pronounced more precious than them all, saying, Skin for skin, all that a man hath will he give for his life. Because, says the apostle, speaking of our Lord, He laid down his life for us, we ought to lay down our lives for the brethren.

Nor is our beneficence, the good we attempt to do to others, to be confined to limits any narrower than God's. It is when we bless them that curse us, and love them that hate us, and pray for them who despitefully use us, that we present the truest image of God, and most clearly prove ourselves to be the children of our Father which is in heaven. He makes his sun to shine upon the evil and the good, and his rain to fall upon the just and unjust. But not because he could not do otherwise. Such miracles as that which he wrought on the fleece that was saturated with dew when the ground about it was dry, and on the following night lay dry on grass sown with pearls or sparkling with diamonds in the morning sun, he could repeat on all our fields—so turning the face of nature into a broad, patent mirror of his own secret and unsearchable mind, that we could tell, by the barrenness or fertility of a farm, whether its tenant was, or was not, a man of God. As I have seen a gardener play the water of his engine on one tree and turn it away from another, God, when he drives his cloudy chariot across the heavens, could so guide its motions and dispense its treasures, as to pour refreshing showers on the fields of one man while those of his neighbour were left to wither and die; and he could still dispense the sunbeams which ripen our fruits and fill our barns, with a hand as powerful but as partial, as on the day when Goshen lay smiling in sunlight, and the neighbouring land of Egypt was palled in darkness that might be felt. But who surveys a smiling valley from the summit of a hill sees all its fields alike robed in verdure or waving with golden harvests—God making no distinction between saints and sinners, but distributing his treasures of shower and sunshine equally to both. And thus in the features of the landscape not less than in the pages of the Bible, in the common providence as well as in the inspired precepts of God, we learn to embrace all men in the arms of Christian affection, and, without excluding even our bitterest enemies, to do them good as we have opportunity. This, the peculiar glory of Christianity and grand lesson of the Cross, shines bright in every sunbeam, and sounds in every falling shower.

ON THE LOSS OF FRIENDS.

BY THE REV. A. W. THOROLD, M.A.

THERE are many ways of losing friends. When they go to a distance, and we cannot reach them, we soon discover that the most profuse letter-writing is not like once seeing them face to face. The features grow misty in the haze of distance. Where there are fewer objects in common, there are fewer sympathies. We presently reconcile ourselves to circumstances; we see that in this world we cannot have everything our own way. It is for the happiness of both of us that we soon cease to be necessary to each other, and so we grow fresh flowers in the heart.

Or we may lose them through a momentary indiscreetness we would give anything to recall, or through a wretched misunderstanding which ten manly words, frankly and brightly spoken, would set right for ever. But the opportunity has not come, and the flaw grows into the tree, and a slight estrangement hardens into the alienation of a life. For Time can aggravate as well as heal. Men do not always become more willing to explain things as they grow older. If there were more peace-makers, perhaps there would be more reconciliations; but we all shrink too selfishly, too timidly, from the delicate and difficult task of mediating: and thus warm-hearted but proud men, who would welcome the least excuse for shaking hands over the past, never find it, and go down to the grave with a dull weight on their heart.

But that "loss of friends" on which I would write now is the saddest, for it is irremediable; the commonest, for it is the lot of all in turn; the most abiding, for the Resurrection seems far away. It is the loss by death, which long ago made the army of the dead outnumber the army of the living, and which is ever impoverishing us with a deeper poverty.

De Tocqueville classifies human miseries in the order of sickness, death, and doubt. But while doubt may be settled by conviction, and sickness succeeded by health, the dead never come back to tell us the secrets of the other world, or to say that they love us still.

Every schoolboy remembers the heathen song, in which death is said to strike "æquo pede" the hovels of the poor and the towers of kings. Yet though all lose, the amount of the loss varies. Age, character, circumstances mark us separately with their own pain-lines. "The heart knoweth its own bitterness." We mourn, as well as die, alone. And though there is no universal measuring-line for the waters of grief, yet, if we can find a word that shall define with tolerable exactness the precise value of the relationships of life, we shall fit a key to the real nature of the sorrow. The link between husbands and wives is that of identity. They are one flesh and one spirit. That between parents and children, or brothers and sisters, is one of affinity. They are one blood, they may or may not be of one spirit. That between friends and friends is one of sympathy: they are one spirit.

In married life there are all possible varieties of affection and devotedness, represented in their extremes by the distance between the poles. Where marriage is not much more than a convenient arrangement for the contracting parties, there is not likely to be that fusion of soul into soul which is the true ideal of Christian wedlock. But where, since the day that they were pronounced man and wife together, the life of the man and the maid has been an ever closer interlacing of joys and sympathies, an ever-growing identity of interests, and duties, and tastes; where, whether wisely or unwisely, the one has been to the other, as Hector to Andromache, its entire satisfaction and society, and counsellor and friend; the parting, when it comes, divides one life rather than separates two; the void that it leaves, gapes with a fissure that knows no filling. The soft familiar tread, the rustle of the gown, the music of the bright greeting, the half-timid tap at the study door, the dear and natural caress that for hours of monotonous labour or weary vexation was the desired reward; the sunny face opposite you at breakfast, the cheek which glowed with an irrepressible joy when others praised you, the feet that ran so nimbly to meet you in the distance, the full and tender heart which never felt shame though others detected its love—they are gone, and passed away, and if you live an hundred years can never come back just as they were. There is no one now to cheer you up in the evening. The cares of life are suddenly doubled, for the worries that were kept from you before meet you now. The children are ill, and you must nurse them. The servants leave, and the task of finding others devolves on you. You may have more money now, but she who shared your poverty cannot share your wealth; and you hardly care for it. If the promotion comes about which in early married days you spoke of when alone, merrily and hopefully, your heart sinks at the thought, that the one person in all the world is gone, who would most have rejoiced to hear of it from you, and to whom you would have most rejoiced to tell it. When a wife dies, the husband feels the light gone out of his home, the taste out of his enjoyments, the colour out of his landscape. Again and again he has to say to himself, with Robert Hall, "I did not complain, did I? I won't complain." When a husband dies, the oak is felled to which the tender vine loved to cling. They fall, indeed, together; and the delicate tendrils still clasp the prostrate tree; but the plant, though still it lives, no longer shoots itself into the warmth and blue of the sky; for months and years it grows sadly and humbly on the ground.

When you lose a child you lose part of yourself. No doubt the age makes a difference. The longer we have loved, the more we lose in the parting, and the promise of opening years gives an additional keenness to the pain. Yet there is no reasoning ourselves out of our deep sadness, when we put away the little waxen body in its white coffin, and give the last kiss to the cold marble brow, and wonder at the majesty of death in its face, and comfort ourselves with the thought that it is safe in the Shepherd's arms, and then shut it up, to see it no more till we are dead ourselves. How often we wake, for nights and nights after, as if the sharp wailing cry we knew so well called us to its side. When the first darkness glooms over the little grave, and the rain falls, or the snow, it is hard to sleep: it is as though the rain wetted it, or the snow chilled it, though well we know that no harm can reach it in the sunny land where, knowing what we cannot know, seeing what we cannot see, and loving as we cannot love, it sings among the angels of God. When we come across its toys in the nursery, or put away its little clothes, (it is best to do these things at once,) when, as we walk in the garden, we see the small wheelbarrow, just where the child left it, or the little spade, grasped by tiny hands that will never grasp it again, the loss comes back, the pain comes back; in no distrust of God, in no rebelliousness about the child, but in the genuine emotion of a nature, which mourns because it loves, the sad mother, careful that no one sees her, sits down and has a hearty cry.

When a brother or sister dies, a companion is gone with whom you shared the freshest hours of life; a counsellor is gone, whom you could consult about things you could talk over with no one else. If you wanted to marry, or had got into a boyish scrape, or a parent was displeased, or some secret was to be told which you were too shy to tell yourself, the one person you instantly thought of was the playmate of your childhood, and the counsellor of your inmost soul. Your wife, perhaps, never heard your name until the year when she consented to be yours. Much as we may love our parents, there are trifles with which we cannot trouble them, wishes we cannot put to them, troubles we cannot unburden to them, in a dutifulness which makes us shrink from vexing them, in that proper reserve which is inseparable from filial respect. Until our riper years friendship has no real hold on us. In this respect, the boy is not the father of the man. Our home ties are our real ties until we are fledged, and go out into the world to make them for ourselves. Though in a large family the children will mate in sets of their own, and the tie of blood is not always the tie of sympathy; yet when brothers and sisters are really united, there is no union save one nearer and dearer. When one goes down to the grave, the others hunger after him with a sad and pining love. When our parents die, it is as if the roof over our head was suddenly uncovered, for the winds of heaven to blow down on us; as if the strong arm on which we have leaned was snapped asunder, and we were roughly told to walk alone. Then (if our parents loved us, as some parents can love), the mind that most thoroughly understood us, the heart that was most entirely wrapped up in us, the lips that most continually spoke of us, the soul that so often prayed for us, the face that we first learned to recognise, the voice we first grew to obey, the hand that we first tried to grasp, the knee that we first learned to climb, the cheek we first wished to kiss, are gone, and will never come back. We may be in our prime, and for years past have been bearing the burden of our own life, and the burden of other lives; yet the thought that our father and mother are really gone, and that we can no longer consult them in our difficulties, nor confide to them our secrets, nor share with them our joys, nor lavish on them our love, makes the heart sad with a deep and abiding sadness, unless it has grown old in a premature decay. When a friend dies, whom neither early association, nor a tie of blood, nor mere convenience has joined to us, but who, suddenly crossing our path, has linked his arm within ours, and we have held him fast, through the strong force of instinctive affection, it is like the cutting off of a limb or the choking of an artery. This is not the place to define friendship, but it is a simple matter of experience that the tie of sympathy is nearer than the tie of blood. When there is no jealousy to sever us, and no money to stir up strife; where we love, not because we ought, but because we cannot help it; where a mutual attraction brings us together, and the cause that makes us one keeps us one, there is no limiting the intimacy of intercourse, and no transgressing the bounds of prudence; we do not fear reaction, we do not mistrust silence; and when the friend is gone, with whom we had shared the cares and the joys of a lifetime, the heart seems to ossify into a sudden numbness; for a short and foolish moment we say we will shut our door in the face of the whole world.

If the loss of friends, coming to all in turn, is a loss that all can appreciate, in natures cast in the same mould, it strikes the same chords and evokes the same feelings. On each of the losses we have been thinking over a cloud of regret settles, which reason has no power to expel.

Death with the young seems always premature. Virgil's lament over Marcellus is but the echo of the world's wailing over young lives. The question is always the same. "Why should they leave us so soon?"

As to the old, it is easy, yet somewhat cold, to argue that we have only a certain time to be here; that we each take our turn at the table of life, and when our years are over, we rise to vacate for others the place that was vacated for ourselves. No doubt there is a kind of consolation in the fact that ours is a common lot; and that there is no sense of injustice to make pain keener, or to move rebellious thoughts against that Lord of Life and Death, who in bringing down to the grave, and in bringing up, hath no respect of persons. Nevertheless, death to those who die is always sudden, to those who mourn is always premature. When we close a parent's eyes, we do not usually comfort ourselves with the thought that they are old, and we have had enough of them, though it is indeed a cause of thankfulness if they have been spared to us for long. Nay, in some natures, the passionateness of affection bursts out in a tropical growth, that counts days for years. There have been wives, whose memories of married life are limited to the weeks of a honeymoon, yet who love their dead husbands as with a love of a lifetime.

Tennyson has remarked that if the report were to reach him that the friend, whom he was mourning, had arrived: and he should come out of the ship with the other passengers, and strike hands with him, and "ask a thousand things of home," he would "not feel it to be strange." The reason of it lies in this, that through our constant thinking of the dead, they are ever with us in spirit if not in person: in the exquisite thought of A. K. H. B., they never grow older, and never younger, the little girl is always young, the gray hairs of our parents are always gray; and we so completely realise their existence in another world, though that world is apart from ours, that if they appeared in the body, just as when they left us, it would be but as waking out of a dream, or coming off a journey.

Thank God, though death may part bodies, it cannot altogether part souls.

Another feature in our mourning for the dead is a power, which seems specially given at that time, for shedding out of the memory all that was imperfect, or sinful, or foolish in them, and recollecting them only at their best. There may, indeed, be a certain irra-tionalness about it, for death cannot really alter anything; yet it is very beautiful, as indicating a merciful purpose in God, and no one need find fault with it unless it is carried beyond the bounds of truth, for it helps one to make death less terrible, and the parting less bitter.

There is also in some instances an analogy of a real kind between the more than mortal beauty that steals over the features, shortly after death, and the subdued chastened patience of the believer just before he departs to go to be with Christ. We all know that the majesty of the face in death arises from physical causes: and there is a stolid ignorance, in which some unhappy souls pass away to their Judge, which may be too easily mistaken for the Peace of Christ. Yet, where there is a well-grounded hope of a joyful resurrection, the grand and sweet calmness of the sleeping clay helps us to anticipate the time when this corruptible shall put on incorruption, and this mortal put on immortality. When the last words on the dying lips tremble joyfully at the name of the Saviour, when the last faint smile seems illumined with the sight of Him in Whose presence is life, we are more reconciled to our own loss when we feel it to be their gain. How can we wish to keep them, when the message has come, "The Master is come and calleth for thee"?

> "'Tis better to have loved and lost,
> Than never to have loved at all."

Who does not feel this? We must be richer and better and happier for having been loved, if the true wealth of man is in the heart. What we have enjoyed already may be disturbed and interrupted, yet nothing can rob the past of its joy. Nothing can make us unlive the happy golden years, when we walked side by side with those who are now in their graves. Nay, if we could have looked forward, would we have refused our marriage vows because in the course of years one would be taken and the other left? would we have preferred to go through the world childless, because the sadness of a little grave may for a moment seem worse than the stillness of an empty nursery? Would we have no joys in life, lest haply we lose them? Shall we refuse to love, because in front of us is the tomb? No, no! The heart says no. The reason says no. The Bible says no. If we had no memory, and so could not recall the happiness of the past, if we had no hope, and could not people the future with the blessed joys that are to come: if our love be so thin and selfish, that when our friends cease to be of use to us we can forget them: if our faith is so feeble, that we cannot believe how those that sleep in Jesus God will bring with Him: then let us live the life of beasts, not of God's redeemed, immortal creatures—let us eat and drink, for to-morrow we die. But if we are Christians we shall take life as God ordains it, drink the cup as He mixes it, taste joy when He permits it, accept sorrow when He ordains it, and remembering that here we have no continuing city, and that our rest is to come, wait for our "gathering together unto Him."

Again, if a wish could bring them back, could we have the heart to wish it, lonely and helpless though we be? Possibly, it might not always be safe to give us the chance of it. Does the sick daughter never wish for one more glimpse of that wise and tender parent, who was father and mother in one? That little bright-haired girl, that died just when she was taking her mother's place, and filling her father's heart with a devouring love—is he so always at his best, that he can cheerfully consent to leave her in Paradise with her mother and her Lord? Does the wife never wish for her husband back, just one half-hour, to consult him about the children, to tell him how she loves him, loves him, loves him, with a love that grows rather than decays, how long the time seems in front of her, before she will be summoned to join him at home? And of our friends do not we sometimes say—"Oh, if he were but here, talking with me over the fire, and strengthening my heart with calm and manly advice! But he rests far away among the gray mountains, and I shall never see him again, till others mourn for me."

Still, let them go, let them go. Do not lay hold of their garments to keep them down on earth, but let them mount to their crown. Let your child have its blessed freedom from the soils and stains of wilful sin. Let your parents, whose hoary head was their crown of glory, have the rest they earned in the heat and burden of the day. Do not indeed let them go because you cannot help yourself. That would be no sacrifice at all. Let them go, because the Lord, who bought them, wishes for them—because when once there the only thing they will wish for is to have us at their side.

"And still they rose a countless throng, in solemn slow array,
And still my heart went with them all upon their heavenward way:
But then I marked another there, bound by some unseen ties,
Who hovered long upon the brink, as though she could not rise.

"There was one, who held her down to earth, and on her garments knelt,
In whose sad eyes an untold depth of speechless anguish dwelt;
'And canst thou, wilt thou leave me thus, mine own beloved one,
And must I seek my widowed home, thus desolate and lone?'

"She veiled her mantle round her head, she did not, could not speak,
For, oh, how strong is human love, the human heart how weak!
But with clasped hands all fervently for strength she seemed to pray,
And fainter grew that passionate grasp, and she soared from earth away."

(From an unpublished Poem.)

And here we touch on a part of our subject, which if in one aspect it be commonplace and unnecessary, in another is worth glancing at for the truths it suggests on God's purpose for us, and our attitude towards Him.

To ask why we must lose our friends seems much the same as to ask, why must anyone die? Yet, when one exclaims, "What have I done to deserve this?" and another, "What is the message which God is now sending to me?" not only for the dead in their death, but for the living in their sorrow, is the question a just one, "Why does a kind God part those, whom He has Himself joined, so long before their time?"

For those who fall asleep in Christ, there can be no need to show that death is gain; while we grieve for them, and even speak of them as if they needed our pity, they are delivered from the evil behind them, they are safe from the evil to come, they see His face, and their joy is full. The Church is part of Christ himself. The Head is no more complete without the body, than the body without the Head; and for every ransomed soul that passes up into glory, there is a Jubilate in Heaven. But how is it good for wives to be widows, for children to be orphans, for friends to be desolate? Are not two better than one for the journey of life? Why does God bestow to-day, what He will take away to-morrow?

Now the chief answer to this—an answer, be it observed, which can only be received and comprehended by faith—is that it is "for our profit, that we might be partakers of his holiness."

All sorrow has a purifying purpose with it, but bereavement is meant to produce results which perhaps no other grief can bring about in the same way. When with the spirits of the departed we have, so to speak, mounted up into the higher heavens, and looked down on the earth, as men might look at it from the stars, we see it at its exact worth, both in its compensations and its disappointments, not despising it utterly, since it is the place that God has chosen for us, yet colouring it no longer with the old false hues.

Then we see ourselves, as we never saw ourselves before. Just as pain and fatigue and sickness bring out the features of the body in a kind of ghastly sharpness, so in the hour when God is searching us as with candles, we seem able to look in at ourselves, as persons outside look through an open window into a house. The growth of secret faults, such as covetousness, or envy, or pride, a multitude of little failings separately but trifling, yet together eating out our strength with the voracity of parasites, the heart settling quietly down into hasty prayers, easy self-love, scanty self-denial, these things all suddenly stare at us as the lightning flashes into the darkness of a closed room; and some have felt at such times that there is something more woful, more intolerable, even than the death which has changed the current of our life; that sin is the worst kind of sorrow: that to have grown cold towards Jesus Christ can move the stirred heart into a more bitter relenting than the thought of the dead face shut up in its long home, never to smile on us again.

Then, too, we discover God; whether on the one hand with Job we have confessed and served Him, though with a heart of which too much lay fallow, or with others (some, it may be, who shall read this paper) who have not yet learned to call God Father, or to rest on his love, revealed and offered in Christ, as the most precious possession of the soul. Oh! how many owe their first thoughts of God, their first turning towards Him in a kind of benumbed, bewildered dismay, to the hour when the shore of life seemed strewed with the fragments of their shipwrecked happiness, and when there was no heart left to begin the voyage again.

It does not, indeed, follow as a matter of course that we discover God in sorrow. It is only too possible for the heart to harden itself against that Divine Will, which it conceives to be unjust and unkind. God will not work a miracle on our behalf. His own appointed way of bringing us to Himself is by removing the idols that have kept us separate. God offers us Himself, and He can make the heart glad with a deeper, sweeter, safer joy than man can. But if we will not listen to Him when He speaks to us, nor look at Him when He draws near to us, sadly, but surely He suffers us our way: He departs, and we are more alone than ever.

Then we discover his wisdom in ordering all things, and his tenderness, as we never conceived of it before, both in sparing us a multitude of trifling anxieties, which to sensitive hearts so aggravate suffering, and in moving on our behalf the sympathy and the prayers of friends.

Moreover He himself comes close to us as we sit alone, and whispers, "It is I, be not afraid," and "I am the Resurrection and the Life." He sheds a light on his Word that it never possessed before; we do not wander, or doze over it then. And the power of prayer which He pours out upon us seems to change the aspect of life, gives us an hourly access into his immediate presence, makes us feel, even in the midst of our sorrow, that, whatever else has been taken away, we have an abiding and a sufficient Saviour.

Now if we meet bereavement in this way, and receive God as He offers Himself to us, we are not poorer for our losses, we are richer; and though for years to come the traces of that unspeakable misery leave their furrows behind them, the last is better than the first: we say to the Lord, in the words of one of old, "Thou hast kept the best wine until now." Taking our joy less eagerly, we do not spill it. Not expecting as much as once we expected, we are less liable to disappointment. Not wishing for so much as once we wished for, we make God able to trust us with more. If earth is emptier, heaven is fuller. If autumn is nearer winter, we look for the flowers across the snow; and the glimpse of glory that gleamed on us when the curtain opened for our beloved to pass through, has gilded with a blessed summer brightness the short cold days that separate us from the eternal spring.

> And yet God took with me his plan,
> And now for my appointed span
> I think I am a happier man
> For having wed and wept for her.
> I would not lose from my past life
> That happy year, that happy wife!
> Yet now I wage no useless strife
> With feelings blithe and debonair.
> JEAN INGELOW.

One truth may here be earnestly impressed—that of soberness and self-restraint in sorrow. Let us not selfishly exact too much of others in their sympathy with us. Let us not be blind to the fact that the time will come to ourselves, when time and the loss of friends, and the routine of duty will, through God's mercy, tone down our grief, and move it from the surface into the foundation. It is not heartless in our children to go back after a time to their play. It is not unfeeling in our friends to speak of other things than the great loss that absorbs us utterly. It is unreasonable to complain if the world at large returns to its own affairs after its dole of pity for us. Nay, it need not be fickleness in ourselves, if through the very laws of our own being we presently cease to feel broken and hopeless, and life seems to have something left to make it worth living.

It does violence to our nature to force it into feeling of any kind, and even if there were nothing wrong and unreal in all fictitious emotion, there is something singularly displeasing in artificial sorrow. Besides, we cannot ultimately resist the bent of moral laws, and none have been more inconsistent in their subsequent conduct, or made themselves more remarkable by the contrast between their first condition and their last, than those who, in the uncontrolled extravagance of their early grief, announced to their friends that they would never smile again. We are so made that a kind of irrepressible elasticity compels us soon to rouse ourselves. The growth of the tree may be checked for a while through the loss of a principal bough; but soon it makes green wood once more. Life could not last, the world could not go on, if mourners were to stay by the grave side, instead of going home manfully to face their duties, and trustfully to expect their consolations. It is a false and injurious sentimentality that refuses to be comforted; and that is the best type of human nature which simply orders itself according to the Divine will, and, taking its place in a world which, if in some things it can never be quite the same again, still has much pleasantness left, enjoys the autumn as well as the spring, and though its May blossoms be over is thankful for its Martinmas summer.

> "The human heart can not sustain
> Prolong'd inalterable pain,
> And not till reason cease to reign
> Will nature want some moments brief
> Of other moods to mix with grief;
> Such, and so hard to be destroy'd
> That vigour, which abhors a void,
> And in the midst of all distress,
> Such nature's need for happiness."

Besides, what injustice it is to those who are gone, what unkindness to those who remain! Do we really believe, that those whom we delight to think of as in the light and goodness of heaven wish us to remain in sackcloth and ashes, while they are in joy and felicity? Has the perfect state made them more selfish than they were here? Are they likely to care more or less about our happiness, now that they love us as with the love of God? If they trusted us before, they will trust us still, even though we do not sorrow as those without hope. If before they did not grudge us other friends than themselves, will they begin to be jealous of us now? If we may judge of others by ourselves, we do not wish our children to be always mourning for us, or that our wives and mothers and friends should feel guilty of forgetting us, if, when the sun breaks out, they draw up the blind to let it shine upon them. A little cell to ourselves in the shrine of the heart is all we ask for: and if actual experience is worth anything in the matter, many a dying wife's last whisper to her husband has been the complete triumph of wife-like unselfishness, and an indication of what our friends desire for us, as they ford the river of Death.

> "Wilt thou remember me when I am gone,
> Further each year from thy vision withdrawn,
> Thou in the sunset, and I in the dawn?
>
> "Wilt thou remember me when thou shalt see
> Daily and nightly encompassing thee
> Hundreds of others, but nothing of me?
> "All that I ask is a gem in thine eye
> Sitting and thinking, when no one is by,
> 'Thus looked he on me—thus rung his reply.'"

Besides, is the love of those who are left nothing to us? Shall we despise or throw away the treasures still spared to us in kind and affectionate hearts? One is gone, but others remain: and though at first this does not comfort us—though it may be quite true that all our other friends together cannot quite make up for the one whom we have lost, still we should be willing to see what we yet retain, and use it, and be thankful.

Then how it hinders and cramps our usefulness, if we shut ourselves up with our sorrow, and refuse the surest way of healing our own wounds in hastening to heal the wounds of others. "None of us liveth to himself, and no man dieth to himself." Sorrow is sent to teach us sympathy. We should try to comfort others "which are in any trouble, by the comfort wherewith we ourselves are comforted of God." What a talent for years to come is a sanctified sorrow! But if we will not use it, and persist in hiding it in the earth, we distrust God, and we dishonour Him. If with the heart we believe, with the heart we rebel. If the Christian refuses to give Christ what Christ asks for—the full service of heart and mind and will, —Christ loses much, but the Christian loses more.

There is, indeed, a sense in which the sorrow is to be cherished, not driven away, for it is as an angel of God, and we must hear what it has to say to us.

> "He that lacks time to mourn lacks time to mend.
> Eternity mourns that. 'Tis an ill cure
> For life's worst ills to have no time to feel them.
> Where sorrow's held intrusive, and turned out,
> There wisdom will not enter, nor true power,
> Nor aught that dignifies humanity."
> HENRY TAYLOR.

Yet we need not turn it into an idol. And with respect to our dead, though presently we may feel it better to cease speaking much to others about them, and to be content with cherishing them in the solitude of our own memory, there is nothing either unreal, or unsafe, or foolish in testifying by our actions that they still live in our hearts.

I do not quite mean by this, hanging "immortelles" on their tombs, though if it pleases anyone to do it let him do it. We read their letters, written long ago; and perhaps we reproach ourselves for ever having destroyed one in that dear, dear hand. We look at their photographs, for they are better than nothing, and we wish we had had more of them, taken at more frequent intervals, and marking more accurately the ages and changes of life. We make visits to their graves, not too often, lest the habit become morbid—not too seldom, lest a chance visit shock us with sudden pain. We know they are not there; they are with the Lord: still part of them is there, and we love the corruptible for the sake of the incorruptible. Oh it is blessed to think how churchyards may be watched over by angels, how the Saviour guards the precious dust of his saints, who are laid to sleep in Him. Each of us has some churchyard, as a holy and consecrated place in his memory; whether by a quiet southern stream, or on a hill-side overlooking a grand landscape, or among grey hills, or within the sound of the tossing sea, or in some great cemetery near the smoke and roar of a city, where those whom we love as our own souls, and whom we should not forget if we lived a thousand years, slumber till Christ's return.

Yet there are better ways than these of keeping our hearts true, and of proving our love, not only to those who are gone, but to their Lord and ours. Are there children to rear? Let us be father and mother in one, with all diligence and tenderness striving to fill the void place, and doing the work for which, however unfit we seem for it, strength most assuredly will come. Are there objects of interest to carry on, duties of Christian love to discharge? Is there a wife left behind who would value your sympathy? Are there duties unfinished which you have leisure and capacity to complete? Here are opportunities of showing the reality of your love to the servant, and the servant's master.

But, best of all, follow your friend as he followed Christ. If our dead could speak to us out of Paradise, and tell us how to give them joy and testify our trueness, would they not be likely to say some such words as these:—

"I am now in the eternal world, and while I look down on the earth where once we dwelt together, I look up in the face of Him, whom before I thought I loved, whom now I adore with rapture unutterable. Do not forget me, but be absorbed in Jesus. If you love me, prove it by loving Him, and O learn the awfulness of life. The bulk of Christian people fritter away heart, and strength, and opportunity on things which here seem to be utter trifles both to angels and saints. Remember the shortness of time, and try to save the lost. There is nothing you can lay your hand to of more value than the saving of a soul. It will not be possible long. And now that I see the King in his beauty, I see, as you cannot see, what loss, what woe it will be to be shut out of his presence. Live for the weight of glory. I am happy, O so happy! but perhaps if I had laboured more diligently—thought less of myself and more of my Saviour, prayed more, tried more, and believed more, I should be happier still. Glory is nearness to Christ, and likeness to Christ, and fulness of Christ: as you glorify Him now, He will glorify you presently."

"One writes that other friends remain,
* * * * *
And common is the common place,
And vacant chaff well meant for grain."
In Memoriam.

Still, what is common-place is mostly true, so true that we are tired of hearing it; and though (as has been remarked already), in the first months of our loss nothing seems to compensate us, nature makes us fall back on our remaining resources, it sometimes prompts us to replenish them. The chair at our fireside must always be left empty, though one who used to fill it can never fill it again. If the heart that is made to love aches for something fresh to love, why deny it its righteous desire? Pericles, in his funeral oration, delivered in the first year of the Peloponnesian war, could not indeed console his sorrowing audience with the promise of the Resurrection, but he touched a real chord in their hearts when he bade them comfort themselves with the sons still at their side, and with the hope of children yet unborn. Almighty God has given us hearts capable of indefinite expansion; and there is every variety of soil in them, where all kinds of affections may grow. Where there is room for all, one need not interfere with another. Why is the power of forming new affections confounded with fickleness or inconstancy? Because a man takes a wife to his heart, must he therefore be a less dutiful son, or a less kind brother? No doubt characters will, in this matter, differ materially. Yet while we admire the tenacity of one man's nature, we need not frown on the fertility of another's. The wayside of life is quite lonely enough without our needlessly making it lonelier. Let us cheat the toil and cheer the way by giving and receiving sympathy. He who has most friends has most opportunities of making others happy as well as himself. He who suffers himself, as occasion offers, to replace a lost friend with a new one, will live in a garden, which will blossom in a perpetual summer, and will not be less likely to forget the old, merely because he accepts the new. Every old friend was once a new one. True love, of whatever kind it is, will but strengthen and deepen in us love of every other kind. For the circulation is quickened through the entire system, and in some natures the heart grows as it is filled.

A word of caution and exhortation may fitly end a paper, which could not be real if it had not a hue of sadness; which could not be useful, if it were not even more for the living than for the dead; which could not be Christian if it did not point on to the sun that will soon rise on us in "the morning without clouds."

We have all of us many partings to go through, yet we need not dwell on them, for why should we needlessly cloud over our permitted happiness? and if we persist in anticipating trials, in other words, in suffering before God bids us suffer, it must be at our own risk. Strength is not given us for to-morrow, only for to-day. Partings, which in the distance seem more than we shall be able to bear, when the moment comes may seem but as the evening farewell, when the day's toil is over—softened and cheered by the thought that morning is at hand. For the burdens which God lays on us, there will always be grace enough. The burdens which we make for ourselves we must carry alone. And this, by the way, should make us very careful of not attempting to measure grief by the mere outward demonstration of it, nor to think that there is no real mourning, because the way of showing it is not our own. Tears, talking about our grief, dress, manner, and look, vary infinitely according to circumstances, and character, and sex, and condition of life. At the grave-side, there may not be a single tear; but, perhaps, there is a strength of self-control which you might well envy, girding those hearts to be manful and calm before you, and to testify the consolation of the grace of God. But there was weeping enough yesterday to satisfy any one; and if you could be with them, when they are each alone (for when together they are cheerful), you would no longer think them guilty of a shallow or cold love.

Of course it does not really matter, so far as we are concerned, what the world outside gossips about our grief. The stronger we are in our manliness, the deeper we are in our affections, the truer we are in our friendships, the less is it likely even to occur to us that our sorrow is suspected, the less should we consent to defer in the least degree to impertinent and unfeeling intrusion. Still, indifferent as we may be to what others say of us, let us be careful not to judge others. Of course there are heartless people in the world; but they are usually the most anxious to conceal their heartlessness. If there is one thing more than another that mourners wish for, it is to be left alone.

To mourn for our friends is natural. Would that it were as natural, while still we have them here, to be true and brave with them about their souls. Why are we kind in every other way, and not in this way? Why do we so firmly seal our lips on the one subject which will engross eternity? The time may come, when we would give all we possess for one chance more. We are travellers "between the cradle and the grave, and the great fact of life is death: and the centre of human interest moves gradually towards the other world" (Professor Goldwin Smith); and if we would but see it so, no love is more real, more kind than that which helps a brother man to make his peace with God before he passes behind the veil. And it is no answer to say, that those whose creed is most rigid, and their notions of duty the most severe, and their appreciation of Divine Love most scanty, and their religious charity towards their neighbours most narrow, when their own belongings pass away, put the best possible construction on each last word, and cling to shreds of hope about the future of husband, or wife, or child, which they would ruthlessly tear to pieces in the case of a stranger. For the human heart is weak, and it is easy to reason ourselves into what we wish to believe; and the very notion of an everlasting misery, for those whom we have begotten or reared or loved, is so intolerably dreadful, that if we actually realised it about any one dear to us, life would be one long agony, and death would be the only riddance of our pain. Yet our hopes and our fears cannot change the laws of right and wrong: our tears and our prayers cannot alter the condition of the soul that has gone to stand before God. What is true for a ruffian hanged at Newgate, is true for the most accomplished scholar, or the most refined gentleman. Repentance towards God, and faith towards our Lord Jesus Christ, are the only way of salvation. God forbid that we should take cruel pains to rob the mourner of the only hope that can comfort him. "It is God that justifieth, who is he that condemneth?" The thief on the cross is an instance of Divine mercy bidding us never to despair. Nevertheless, if we hold it possible for men to be lost—if we really believe that there is a wrath to come, and that unless we flee from it it will overwhelm us—if in the Bible we find nothing about all at last returning into the bosom of the Eternal Father—if we hold to the Saviour's words, "Except ye repent, ye shall all likewise perish"—we shall sometimes think of those we love and live with as dying and risen, and judged, and lost or saved: and while we continually pray about them, that God will Himself fit them for his own presence, humbly but earnestly, firmly but gently, we shall try to speak to them of Him.

Yet with all this, it is a blessed thing to rest on the love of God, when we have no ground for supposing that it has been wilfully resisted, or perseveringly cast away. Christ's cross is the proof of God's mercy. If He does not care, does not yearn to save, why did the Son of God taste death for every man? Some of us may know what it is to hear suddenly of the death of a child or a brother thousands of miles away, and far from friends and home. There may be but scanty particulars of the last hours: and the sources from which they come are not always so reliable as to inspire us with much consolation. Well, we were not there, but He was there, without whom no one can live, no one can die; and He, who bought them with his blood, and is able to save to the uttermost, can be more in the last hour to the fainting struggling soul, than mother, or wife, or friend. Oh, it is solemn to think how busy Death is every minute of every hour; how "never morning wore to evening, but some heart did break." We cannot, nay we need not wish to know of all the suffering in the world, for if we did we could not help it, and to see what we cannot mend is a useless pain. But there is One who knows and feels for it all. On this wide groaning earth, on palace and cottage, on town and village, on hospital and workhouse, on the restless sea, on the burning desert, on the forests of the West, and the snows of the North, on the steppes of Thibet, and the meadows of England; wherever there are men and women and children to pity and to save, the holy solemn face of Christ looks down with tenderness unspeakable. He is ever near, though we cannot be. Everywhere He can sustain those who lean on Him; and his blessed smile nerves the departing spirit for the struggle that sets it free.

In a little while friendship will be a reality. When we meet round the Tree of Life, we shall have shed our last tear, and Death and Hell will be cast into the lake of fire. Friendships are made on earth to be enjoyed in Heaven. This is a busy world, and, as things are now, much of our time is passed over objects for which we do not care, and with men whom we do not love. We have but snatches and foretastes of that heart and soul intercourse, which in its consummation and perpetuity will be part of the happiness of Heaven. What a gathering it will be when we meet from the east and the west and the north and the south in the many mansions of the House of our common Father, and each in our own glory recognise and embrace those whom we loved on earth. It is sometimes an anxiety to sensitive persons that they will have no one to welcome them in Heaven. As if Christ would not take care of that. As if He, who hath prepared us for our home and our home for us, may not be safely trusted to make it a happy one. We shall meet there many whom we did know, and more whom we did not. But Infinite Love will fill every glorified soul; and if friends will still be friends, no one will wound us with the cold glance of a stranger. The parents that bore us, the servants who ministered to us, pastors who have brought us to Christ, physicians who have pulled us through weary illnesses, and made us grateful with the gratitude of a life; the friends who have loved us, the good who have edified us; many, whom we have seen and longed to know, but never could get to know; many who saw us, and wished to know us, but who died, without the interchange of a word; writers of books which have helped us, promoters of plans which have inflamed our zeal and set us working, in a multitude which no man can number, all, all will be there! Yet God makes Heaven; and the "friend that sticketh closer than a brother" will be the one friend of all others we shall most desire to see; and when we see Him as He is, we shall not think we took too much pains to make others love Him; we shall understand then how the "loss of friends" on earth was to prepare us for our life with Him.

The peculiar mental unrest of the present time has brought it about, that, of all histories which can be written and read, the most interesting, to many classes of the community, is a mental history. In the midst of its thousandfold material activities, the thoughtful mind of the age—it might almost be said, its thoughtless mind as well—is feverishly alive to all the problems of inward life. The work done, the battles fought, the suffering endured, in the invisible domain of human hearts, have been found to possess often a great and tragic interest. There will be differences of mental histories, of course, as there are differences of minds. The toil and trial of inward life, like the toil and trial which have been seen and known of men, will be, in one case and in another, of lesser, or of mightier, import. Many spiritual histories laboriously pourtrayed, turn out to be without individuality and freshness, and the record of them is made up of disappointing commonplaces, every one of which we seem to have heard a hundred times before. There are higher and meaner among the souls whom God has made; and, within as well as without, the one will be found to have lived the higher, more eventful, more significant, and the other the meaner, more eventless, more insignificant, life. In the case of the latter, the question of personal salvation will generally be found the only one which it has been much concerned to settle; in the case of the former, the foundations of the stable earth have been shaken, and solemn problems have risen up, spectre-like, and moved across its field of vision—problems of Law and Love and Life—of Humanity and God.

The Life of Mr. Robertson of Brighton, which is now before us, is a mental history of this latter sort. The facts of his career in the world are few. Not only, however, as framework for his inward history, but also, because of their vital connexion with it—the action and reaction of the external and internal—they are of the utmost moment. But it is what he thought and felt, and so thinking and feeling, spoke and wrote, that enchains our interest. In the latter part of his lifetime, the attention of men began to be directed to him—of men far beyond the circle of those who had his voice and presence in the midst of them. But it was after his death, when his sermons were issued from the press in a collected form, and the words which had been addressed to sympathetic or unsympathetic hearers in Trinity Chapel, Brighton, found their way to the ear of the great world, delighting or startling, reading the thoughts or enkindling the hearts of many in distant places, that the question, "Who and what manner of man was this?" began to be commonly asked; till at length an answer has been supplied to it, in the biography of Mr. Brooke, more or less satisfactory. A copy of the first volume of these sermons, published in 1864, now lies before me, and is marked, "Thirteenth Edition." A very large amount of buying and reading, in the case of this book at least, is indicated by the prosaic announcement. To many, through these sermons, Mr. Robertson has become, not a voice only, but a living and breathing presence. It is too plain that he poured out his inmost soul in them; that they are written often as with blood from his own heart. From some of their doctrinal statements we strongly and unequivocally differ, less however in the way of attributing to them positive error than of lamenting their defectiveness. The propositions which he maintains are mostly true in the full sense which he gives them; but his great error seems to lie, in excluding other important propositions, that ought to be at their side, as if they were utterly inconsistent with them. When he thinks himself broadest, he is often narrowest, fixing his eye, with its microscopic or telescopic intensity of sight, on some aspect or corner of truth, and so, disclosing that, as in a sunshine gleam, or perhaps lightning-flash: but then, unhappily, seeming to claim for a part the place of the whole, for his own particular illustration of the truth the credit of being the truth itself in its widest and deepest form. In most cases, if not in all, the evangelical theology which he stigmatised as hopelessly narrow, if rightly and comprehensively presented, would include all that was true in his views, and something more. It was his special faculty, and perhaps his mission, to set forth, in vivid illustration and unchallengeable certainty, the humanity of the Redeemer's Person and of his Cross —the humanity of the Bible and the Christian faith and life, in an age that needed such teaching. The friends of catholic evangelical doctrine will thank him for that, while they will be disposed to mourn over the intellectual presumption, which supposed itself to be conquering the new when it was simply coming into living contact with the old, which mistook the narrower for the broader truth. Narrow men—men whose life is built on a few great thoughts, is devoted to one grand aspect of doctrine or duty—are intense, vital, suggestive, in proportion to their narrowness. You must meet them on their own ground; and there, you find them, in thought, or speech, or action, giants. The catholic doctrine of the Church, and still more the Holy Scriptures, from which it is drawn, by their very breadth and tolerance, put to shame the exclusive spirit in which such men are often criticised. The Bible has its Antinomies —Law and Love; Predestination and Free-will; Faith and Work: and the Creeds of the Church have ever left these where it sets them, side by side; their practical reconciliation ever found in actual human history, their theoretical reconciliation hidden in the vastness of God.

London was the birth-place of Mr. Robertson. He was born there on the 3rd of February, 1816. But the first five years of his life were spent at Leith Fort, where his father, then a captain in the Royal Artillery, was on duty. This early period left on his susceptible mind its own especial impress. As is usual with children, the mist-curtain which hid the beginnings of his life had breaks of azure in it. He remembered certain outstanding scenes and events; the rest passed out of his conscious life altogether. The sea in these early days awakened in him an affection which never died, and its fresh breezes blowing inland, across Inchkeith, or from the grey distance out of which the ships came one by one, seemed, in the dreams of after-days, to stir his hair again, and sprinkle his face with spray. At the end of these five years his father resigned his commission, and removed to Beverley in Yorkshire, where the education of Frederick, his eldest son, was carried on, partly at home under his own superintendence, and partly at the grammar-school of the place, for the next eight years. Thereafter, in 1829, the family removed to Tours, where Mr. Robertson acquired his thorough knowledge of the French language. The Revolution of 1830 drove them to this country again, and this time young Robertson was sent to school in Edinburgh. This strangely desultory mode of education, which I have not yet fully described, had no doubt its effect, in shaping the mental tastes and habits of Frederick Robertson to what they afterwards became. He was a man evidently of very varied culture, furnished, as few men are, with manifold personal knowledge of the world and of mankind, but making up in freshness and variety for what he lacked in accuracy and depth. His father was a soldier; all his younger brothers, in one way or another, gave themselves to a military life; and one can therefore imagine how, in the household of Captain Robertson, would be nursed the frank daring chivalrous spirit which had such a battle before it, harder to face sometimes than a storm of shot and shell. He was already dreamy and sensitive, full of the imaginings of noblest boyhood; and yet, also, of healthy physical development, and passionately fond of every kind of boyish activity; building up the slight but lithe thews and sinews of a frame which yet was too fragile for the fiery soul within it, and was worn to death prematurely, avenging itself, of the spirit that wore down and wasted it, by the infliction of maddening pain.

At the Edinburgh Academy, Frederick Robertson devoted himself to his work with characteristic ardour; and, though labouring under the disadvantage of having pursued his earlier studies elsewhere, he seems, if I understand his biographer aright, to have stood second dux of the school at the end of the year. The following year was spent at the Edinburgh University, under the care of Bishop Terrot. No memorials remain of his attendance at any of the classes, except that of natural history, then taught by Professor Jameson; but his name may be found, perhaps, in the roll-book of some of the others, for the session of 1832-33. He left Edinburgh to become the articled clerk of Mr. Borton, a solicitor at Bury St. Edmunds. A year at Mr. Borton's desk was enough for him; and his father gave him leave to follow out the purpose which he had been cherishing through all his previous life—to become a soldier. An application was made to the Horse Guards for a commission. His name was placed on the list for a cavalry regiment then serving in India. Meanwhile, at Chatham with his brother, or in Cheltenham, where the family now resided, he anxiously prepared himself for a military life. His culture was still of the same healthy and comprehensive sort, physical as well as mental. He studied engineering; became a skilful draughtsman; read much and deeply in the history of India, its wars, even its missions, trying to solve the problem of its connection with this country and its future destiny; and at the same time spent much time in riding and shooting, till he became a great proficient in both. Two years thus passed, but there was no sign of his commission, and his heart grew sick with hope deferred. He was now twenty years of age, and impatient to feel himself engaged in the work of his life.

At last, in the beginning of 1837, under the influence of Mr. Davies, now Vicar of Tewkesbury, and others, he was led to reconsider his determination to be a soldier, and to decide for the Church instead. This was done, however, very much in deference to the wish of his father and his friends: and if it had been delayed a little longer, would never have been done at all. On May 4, 1837, he matriculated at Brazenose College, Oxford. The die was cast. Only a fortnight afterwards, news came of the long-expected commission, but, with much regret, the offer of it was now declined. On the receipt of this letter a few days later, or a few days earlier, the shape which his career should take depended, in the providence of God. The relation which he has come to hold to thousands of his fellow-men was thus determined, much against his will and hope. It were folly not to see the Divine Hand in this, and to hold, as we shall have to hold throughout, that God mixed for Mr. Robertson the cup which he had to drink.

The next three years were spent in Oxford, till, in 1840, he took his degree, and his academic training, at least, was completed. He found Oxford the scene of great intellectual activity—rent especially by theological dissensions, so that, during these years, much of his time was given to the study of doctrinal and ecclesiastical questions. The man whose name was in all men's mouths, and about whom there went on a constant turmoil of discussion, was the Vicar of St. Mary's, John Henry Newman. He excited a deep interest in the mind of Frederick Robertson, won his affection as well as admiration,—for Newman's sermons were a chosen and beloved companion to the end of his life,—by the glow of his genius and the nobleness of his earnest and devoted spirit; but, at the same time, repelled, by his ascetic and idealizing temper, Robertson's broader humanity. We find him write even bitterly of the Tracts and the Tractarian school; his bitterness, however, being the bitterness of a heart which is not at rest, but which hides, beneath its argument and denunciation, the pain of a secret love. The system, though he tried to regard it ever so favourably, repelled him; the men, in spite of himself, he was forced to hold in the highest honour. It is always hard, for an enthusiastic, sympathetic spirit like his, to distinguish between doctrinal belief and personal character, between the truth or untruth of the principle, and the truth or untruth of the lives of those who maintain it. This characteristic I believe to appear also in his later relations to the Evangelical party, and to be indeed, in a great measure, the key to his career.

During this period, Mr. Robertson kept his own heart with a singular care. He was a man of prayer. He set on foot a society for prayer and conversation on the Scriptures. His Bible was ever within his reach. He had a very accurate memory, and turned it to good account, by committing to it daily some verses of the New Testament. Before very long, he had gone twice through the English version, and once and a half through the Greek. All this was done partly out of antagonism to the Tractarian school, but it endowed him with an accurate knowledge of Scripture which was of the greatest value to him in his future life. And yet, while not ashamed of Christ, while living thus in continual contact with the Divine Word, he delighted in his classical studies: Plato, especially, was a friend and counsellor. "One of the poets," he calls him in after years, "who, when his brain was throbbing, and his mind incapable of originating a thought, and his body worn and sore with exhaustion, made him know what it was, to feel the jar of nerve gradually cease, and the darkness in which all life had robed itself to the imagination become light, discord pass into harmony, and physical exhaustion rise by degrees into the consciousness of power." One other reminiscence of Robertson at Oxford. He was a member of the Union Debating Club, and Mr. Davies tells how, the second time he had attempted to speak, he opened a discussion on the question of the moral or immoral tendency of the theatre. Robertson's speech was on the stricter side. Before getting up to make it, he pressed his friend's knee and whispered, "Davies, pray for me!" His opponent was one John Ruskin, of whom men have since heard, and who in his reply was very witty and clever at Robertson's expense.

At this period, Mr. Robertson bore all the marks of a genuine piety. But it was of a very spontaneous and child-like sort. His feet had not yet felt the chill of the deep waters through which he was to pass. The tender charms of early association bound him: the dreams of boyhood had scarcely faded. He followed and sought to realise a high ideal of chivalrousness, of faith and courtesy. He was a born soldier: but in the preparation for his clerical life, and in that life itself, this character of his had field enough for its display; there is another warfare than that of camps and armies, and blood-red battle-fields. He longed to be a Vindicator of the Right, and Avenger of the Wrong. Consistent with this, and from the same root, was his devotion to his ideal of womanhood. The gentler sex had an immense power over his mind, because he saw in them what he deemed the highest attributes of human being, which they do not seem to have been aware of, and which they used for the most part only to wound and thwart him. "At seven years old," he says, "woman was a sacred dream, of which I would not talk. Marriage was degradation. I remember being quite angry on hearing it said of a lovely Swede—the loveliest being I ever saw—that she was likely to get married in England. She gave me her hair, lines, books, and I worshipped her only as I should have done a living rainbow, with no further feeling. Yet I was then eighteen, and she was to me for years nothing more than a calm, clear, untroubled fiord of beauty, glassing heaven, deep, deep below, so deep that I never dreamed of an attempt to reach the heaven. So I lived. I may truly say that my heart was like the Rhone as it leaves the Lake of Geneva." "I have seen him," writes one of his friends, "grind his teeth and clench his fist when passing a man who, he knew, was bent on destroying an innocent girl." "My blood," he writes himself, after a conversation on the wrongs of women, "was running liquid fire!" This idea', then, which he cherished, of manhood and of womanhood, explains much in his teaching, and much in his personal life. It was this which made him so impatient of the harshness and pettiness which he encountered: which gave his life its character of peculiar isolation: which made his attachments so sudden and strong, and his reactions so violent: which drove him from actual men and women, to find in Christ the truest characteristics of manhood and womanhood too, and to lavish the wealth of his love on the God-Man Redeemer, stronger than the strongest, and tenderer than the tenderest of all. In many sermons, besides that especial one on the Glory of the Virgin-mother, he shows the ideal, which he had never found even partially realised on earth, to have its eternal realisation in the Man Christ Jesus.

On Sunday, July 12th, 1840, he was ordained a deacon by the Bishop of Winchester. He had received a title from Mr. Nicholson, rector of the united parishes of St. Maurice, St. Mary Kalendar, and St. Peter Colebrook, Winchester. Mr. Nicholson was an earnest Evangelical, and, for a busy year, Mr. Robertson and he worked to each other's hands, in much brotherly love, and with apostolic devotion. It is curious to note, how well the Bishop and Mr. Nicholson understood their man, for the latter preached the ordination sermon from the same text which the former gave Mr. Robertson as a motto for his future life—it was 2 Tim. ii. 3, "Thou therefore endure hardness, as a good soldier of Jesus Christ." The parishes were inhabited by a poor population, and, during the incumbency of Mr. Nicholson's predecessor, had been almost wholly neglected. But times had changed. The rector and his curate were obliged, in a few months, to open two churches instead of one, and both were crowded. Mr. Robertson's ministry was greatly blessed, more than he knew till long afterwards. He was as Evangelical as his rector. His texts on his first three Sundays were Isaiah lv. 1, Isaiah lvii. 15, and these words (John i. 42) which make Andrew a type of truest and highest brotherly-kindness—"And he brought him to Jesus." Here in Winchester, his labours were incessant, and of the humblest and most self-denying kind. Meanwhile, he strengthened his intellectual grasp of the truth by the thorough study of President Edwards; kept the edge of his spirit keen by much holy meditation with the help of "The Imitation of Christ;" and drew his impulse and his power from frequent solitary prayer. Yet was he possessed in some measure by a spirit of bondage and fear. He spent much time in mere self-dissection. There is a freer Christian life, which harmonizes work for God with communion with Him, which looks less in on self, and more out on Christ and on the world for which Christ died. And to this, with all his doctrinal defectiveness, he seems to have attained afterwards in fuller measure, when the pain and strife were past.

Too intense and consuming labour produced ill-health, and after but one year of work in Winchester, he was ordered abroad by the physicians. Before setting out, he was invested with priest's orders. He travelled on foot through many parts of the Continent, storing his mind with all grand and beautiful imagery, revelling in the glory of Nature, and the aspects of strange cities and men. Yet he never forgot his work of winning souls for his Master. There is a touching story of a young Prussian of Elberfeld, with whom he travelled on one occasion, and whose views were of the most sceptical kind. After much argument, Mr. Robertson simply told him in plain words, what was his own conviction, belief, and hope. The young man, unconvinced by argument, was melted before the reality of truth. "C'est une belle croyance," he said—"I wish that I could believe it too!" In Geneva, Mr. Robertson remained for a considerable time, meeting there both the Evangelicals and their opponents. He was delighted with Malan and Merle d'Aubigné. The well-known views of the former on the assurance of faith startled him, and suggested profitable thoughts, but did not win his assent. In Geneva, he met, and shortly after married, Miss Helen Denys, third daughter of Sir George William Denys, Bart., of Easton Neston, Northamptonshire. She survives her husband. Returning to England with his bride, he took farewell of his flock at Winchester, and after a month or two of enforced idleness, accepted the curacy of Christchurch, Cheltenham. This was in the summer of 1842.

Cheltenham was to be the scene of his labours for the next five years. In some respects this period was the most important of all, the turning-point of his life. But that life was now turned violently aside from the path which it had hitherto followed, and involved in the overshadowing gloom both of error and of sorrow. Three children were born to him in this period, one to be taken as it had been given, very soon. He passed through the usual routine of a clergyman's life, with its monotony, and yet wondrous variety, of work. It is in his relations to the people around him, and the effect which outward circumstances had on his inner spirit, that the interest of this Cheltenham period entirely lies. The incumbent of Christchurch was the Rev. Archibald Boyd, now of London, an able preacher and stanch Evangelical. Mr. Robertson, of course, ranked with the party to which Mr. Boyd belonged. His admiration for Mr. Boyd was intense, and their friendship warm, till growing divergence of doctrinal teaching introduced embarrassment. The influence of the incumbent on his curate was stimulating and yet also depressing. It impelled Mr. Robertson to more careful and matured preparation for the pulpit, but led him also to make comparisons most disadvantageous to himself. The Cheltenham public, with which Mr. Robertson came into contact, was of that fashionable and somewhat idle sort, which could not understand him, and which provoked him to anger and impatience. Amidst the active thought and work of the day, amidst scholars and thinkers, amidst merchants and artisans, he would have struck fire at once. He found himself in the midst of a peculiar society, with many characteristic excellences, but broken up into little sets and parties; tractarianism and evangelicalism being the most popular watchwords. He was one of those persistently original men who must think their own thoughts and speak their own words, or else neither think nor speak. He could belong to no party, being charged with the work of hewing out new paths of thought, which might be marked with milestones afterwards, and made distinctive tenets of, by others, when he meant nothing of the kind. The comforts of partisanship, the sympathy of friends and backers, the good things which the chiefs of the party can bestow, when it is in power at least, were not for him. To many of his hearers his modes of expression were strange—nay, were not his views also strange, and being strange, of necessity dangerous? They tried first to enlighten his own mind. They gave him on Monday mornings their opinion of the sermon of the previous day somewhat plainly. On one occasion he had pronounced this world in itself a riddle, but had commended the Christian religion as the key to that riddle. The next day an anonymous lady-correspondent, who must have been asleep during the latter part of the discourse, informed him that Christianity made all the difficulties he spoke of plain. He smarted under such interference; but otherwise gave no heed to it. He called these wise ladies his "muslin episcopate." He was, in short, incorrigible. Then they began to let their opinion of him be known. I have said enough before to show that to Mr. Robertson all this must have been almost intolerably painful. As his Evangelical friends drew off, friends of a different stamp gathered around him. A certain philosophic inquirer, a student of Coleridge and the Germans, accorded him the sympathy which was elsewhere denied; but such a one might supply him with intellectual stimulus, but not with the needed guidance towards settled truth. In the case of an inquirer, the influence of a fellow-inquirer is perhaps the greatest; the influence of one who has through pain and struggle won his way to rest is next; the influence of an altogether settled and untroubled dogmatist, given to didactic monologue, is simply nothing at all. Mr. Robertson's spirit was wounded deeply, and a wounded spirit who can bear?

Yet let us not blame too much the people of Cheltenham. The devotedness and purity of Mr. Robertson's Christian character might have made them more patient and considerate, but there were undoubtedly very strong grounds for anxiety and perplexity. Mr. Robertson's teaching, at this point, was the teaching of one who was feeling his way, not indeed to new truths, but to a new and more living relation to the old. It lacked that roundness and scriptural fulness which they had good reason to love. Unsettled himself, it was not desirable that he should be permitted to unsettle them. Their feet were planted on a rock; they had no wish to tempt the seething surges; the man who would plunge them into these would, they felt, do them a cruel wrong. Ill-health came again and deep despondency; and in 1846, Mr. Robertson had left Cheltenham never to resume his labours there.

He went back to the Continent, to travel alone in the Tyrol, to go chamois-hunting in its mountain solitudes, to do anything and everything to escape from the unquiet of his spirit. The Evangelicals had cast him off: the narrowness, as it seemed to him, of the Evangelical theology and life, of which he had formed a wrong conception, caused a revulsion of feeling all the more intense and agitating, that he was still hiddenly drawn to both. One cannot help thinking, that, if he had met at this stage with some humble, faithful, and not untried believer, his course might have been different. His heart cried in its anguish for sympathy, and found no more reply from other hearts than it did from the crags of the mountains, from the serpentine mists, from the vast silences of heaven, from the changing skies of sunset or of dawn. If he had had the true theology before him in its Biblical fulness, he would have found the representations of God and man from which he revolted to be but caricatures, for which he had his own proud impatient spirit not a little to blame: if he had seen how, in the real doctrine of the Atonement, for example, the Father and the Son are perfectly at one in the work of redemption, and he that hath seen the Son hath seen the Father, and the utmost honouring of law is also the utmost honouring of love: if, again, he had distinguished between the creed and the life of Christians, had counted the harshness, weakness, inconsistencies, stupidity, which he happened to find in good people, only a thing to be expected, and ever to be forgotten in gazing on the beauty of Christ,—his teaching might have been full-orbed and complete, his heart more at rest, and his sermons purged from their traces of reaction against cherished beliefs, and made richer in positive truth —truth not one whit less human, but more divine. I cannot refrain from quoting the terrible words in which he describes the case of a doubter, which, at the time I am speaking of, was evidently his own. "It is an awful moment when the soul begins to find that the proofs on which it has blindly rested so long, are many of them rotten, and begins to suspect them all; when it begins to feel the nothingness of many of the traditionary opinions which have been received with implicit confidence, and in that horrible insecurity begins also to doubt whether there be anything to believe at all. It is an awful hour—let him who has passed through it say how awful—when this life has lost its meaning and seems shrivelled into a span; when the grave appears to be the end of all, human goodness nothing but a name, and the sky above this universe a dead expanse, black with the void from which God himself has disappeared. In that fearful loneliness of spirit, when those who should have been his friends and counsellors only frown upon his misgivings, and profanely bid him stifle doubts which, for aught he knows, may arise from the fountain of truth itself—to extinguish as a glare from hell that which, for aught he knows, may be light from heaven, and everything seemed wrapped in hideous uncertainty, I know but one way in which a man may come forth from his agony scatheless; it is by holding fast to those things which are certain still—the grand, simple landmarks of morality. In the darkest hour through which a human soul must pass, whatever else is doubtful, this at least is certain. If there be no God, and no future state, yet even then it is better to be generous than to be selfish, better to be chaste than to be licentious, better to be true than to be false, better to be brave than to be a coward."

This is certainly a picture drawn from personal experience. To many, of course, it will seem, either a wild imagination and unreality on the one hand; or, accepting it as true of Mr. Robertson, they will conclude from it that he had not, and never had, any spark of the grace of God in his heart. Deeper spiritual experience, however, will reverse such judgments. It is not the shallow, easy-going believer, whose faith, even on its intellectual side, seems to go out like a candle in a night of tempest, and from whom the face of God is hidden till there seems to be no God at all.

It is not made by any means plain in the biography, by what means Mr. Robertson regained his mental clearness and calm. Such storm-clouds, indeed, by a hidden law of their own, which is the will of God, do their work, spend their force, and, one scarce knows how, glide away. This, however, was to some extent a new beginning. The season of doubt and tribulation left Mr. Robertson with a deeper knowledge of his own heart and the hearts of others, and a deeper insight into the things of God. Only by such means do men attain to such pathos and power, such skill in striking the deepest notes in the music of humanity, such lightning-like vividness of speech. Mr. Robertson certainly attained to all this when his soul was swept by a wind from the wilderness. One is all the more saddened to find, that the agency which had been used to bring about his time of trial, mingled with his future teaching a certain harshness of tone, a certain bitterness of reaction against the school to which he had belonged; and for which, allowing for the negations which are due to this woundedness of spirit and this reaction, I am disposed to claim him still. While he was still on the Continent he resigned his Cheltenham curacy, and then returned home to seek for work elsewhere. This was found, for a month or two, at St. Ebbe's, in Oxford, where he carried all before him; and then at Trinity Chapel, Brighton, where he entered on his duties on the 15th of August, 1847. His incumbency at Brighton is but the last chapter of his life; though it is that one which makes us ask eagerly for all the rest. Here his peculiar teaching was matured, if we may call it mature, in the form in which we have it now. And here were the beginnings of that fame which has sounded its trumpet most loudly, after his ear could hear it no more for ever. Here he had scope and freedom at least. A good many of the former worshippers in Trinity Chapel, Brighton, trained in a different school, fled at the very sound of his earlier sermons; but their places were filled at once by an eager thoughtful crowd. Brighton was a wider world, and with a more varied humanity, than Cheltenham. "He met with men of all classes, whose opinions had been formed and widened in the storm and stress of London life; and with others whose prejudices were as blind as those of the smallest village in England." He knew that he would die soon, and determined to work while it was day. His great practical thought was, that "Christianity was too much preached as theology, too little as the religion of daily life; too much as a religion of feeling, too little as a religion of principles; too much as a religion only for individuals, too little as a religion for nations and the world. He determined to make it bear upon the social state of all classes, upon the questions which agitated society, upon the great movements of the world." It was a time of singular activity. His published sermons belong to it, and most of the letters which are now printed in his biography. Now, at least, he had friends to whom he poured his very heart out; and he is allowed to speak for himself with a fulness and self-accusing faithfulness, for which we cannot too much thank his biographer. Intense work alternated with intense physical exercise. The sunsets seen from Brighton, and the sea, ever-changing, in its gloaming calm and its tempestuous gloom, were to him a continual joy.

His fresh and unfamiliar statements of truth still fell among people who did not understand them fully. He had much sympathy now, but also much hostility more pronounced than ever before. In his crowded audience there were sure to be some at least who came to entangle him in his talk. And the very thought of this, instead of making him more cautious, made him more rash. The same curious interferences with him, especially by ladies, from which he had suffered so much, even while he indignantly resisted them, at Cheltenham, still continued. The revolutions of 1848 interested him mightily. They seemed to him in his ardent philanthropy "a bridal dawn of thunder-peals." At this time, he lectured on Samuel the prophet, and so laid down the respective duties of kings and subjects, that he was called a Democrat in the unreasoning panic which then prevailed. He was the originator of a Working Man's Institute, in 1848, which had a chequered history and did not survive its originator. In many ways he addressed himself to working-men and anxiously befriended them, till he was next pronounced a Socialist. Happily the day has gone by when such a charge would be made. He excited the hottest ferment and injured himself most seriously, by his sermons, in 1849 and 1852, on the Sunday question. His view of this question is that, which disconnects the Sabbath of Christendom from the law given by Moses, and builds it on the two pillars, of the original and universal necessities of humanity, and the Resurrection of the Divine Redeemer. Men slow to make a doctrinal distinction, were startled, when he carried his theory into practical application, by refusing to petition against the opening of the Crystal Palace on Sundays, and by preaching on "the religious non-observance of the Sabbath." In this, more than anything else, may be seen the extremeness of a man stung by rancorous opposition, and tempted by the allurements of paradox.

The last months of his life were embittered by a dispute with the Vicar of Brighton, Mr. Wagner, who used the authority which he possessed to prevent the appointment, as Mr. Robertson's curate, of Mr. Tower, on whom Mr. Robertson had set his heart. The result was, that, weak and worn, he had to go on single-handed with his work. For some time past that work had been done at fearful cost. He spent days and nights in terrible pain, as though his head and neck were being torn by the beak of an eagle, or cleft by a sword. Intense mental activity: the bitter sense of isolation, in the midst of enemies, which deepened on him to the last: the conflict of his life, not long, but hot and fierce, almost without a parallel:—these bore their fruit at length, in the physical anguish from which he found release only in death. The controversy with Mr. Wagner was at its hottest, when all Brighton was startled to hear that Mr. Robertson had received his death-blow. His disease was supposed to be an abscess in the brain. The turmoil of his outward life grew quiet and far away as the shadows of death stole over him. His last effort was to creep from his bed to the window, and look out on the "beautiful morning." His two sisters, long since dead, seemed to come to him with a crown for him in their hand. He felt assured that he would live in Christ for ever. Between him and all men who had troubled him fell the calm of forgiveness and peace. Again and again the pain smote him, keen and terrible, but it could not bereave him of his patience. The two hours before his death were filled with fearful anguish. "My God!—my Father!" he cried feebly at intervals: and then, when they sought to move him: "I cannot bear it; let me rest. I must die. Let God do his work." These were his last words. The storm of physical agony raged itself out: and, a few minutes after midnight, on Sunday, August 15th, 1853, he died. He was but thirty-seven: his sun reached its highest noon, and then vanished into the great darkness. So he

"pass'd
To where beyond these voices there is peace."

I have already characterised his teaching, and explained its peculiar character. It remains only to borrow from his biography some idea of Mr. Robertson as the multitude saw and heard him in his pulpit at Brighton. We are invited to imagine a high intellectual brow, strongly marked; blue deep-set eyes; a mobile mouth, capable of a most radiant smile; a voice not loud, but with a swell of power and thrill of passion in it; a manner of the quietest, but of singular grace and refinement, and suggestive of force under restraint: the very preacher for an audience of sensitive culture, and yet visibly an earnest man, speaking to, and making, while he spoke, earnest men. His utmost popularity and most manifest success never won him from his habitual and painful self-depreciation. The excitement of his preaching left him despondent and depressed—turning wearily from his fellow-men to cling to the bosom of the Eternal Love. He has, I believe, told the story of his own spirit, in these sentences descriptive of John the Baptist, with which I leave him now. "When that crowd dispersed at sunset, and John was left alone in the twilight, with the infinite of darkness deepening round him, and the roll of Jordan by his side, reflecting the chaste clear stars, there was something there higher than Pharisaic forms to speak to him—there were heaven and eternity to force him to be real. This life was swiftly passing. What is it to a man living like John, but a show and a dream? He was homeless upon earth. Well, but beyond—beyond—in the blue eternities above—there was the prophet's home. He had cut himself off from the solaces of life. He was to make an enemy of the man of honour, Herod. He had made an enemy of the man of religion, the Pharisee. But he was passing into that country where it matters little whether a man has been clothed in finest linen or in coarsest camel's hair; that still country, where the struggle-storm of life is over, and such as John find their rest at last, in the home of God, which is reserved for the True and the Brave."

THE PRODIGAL.

I.

AND thou art he! But ah! how changed
Since last I looked on thee;
Ere from thy father's house, estranged,
Thou soughtest to be free.
With love as with a garland crowned
Light rested on thy brow;
And joy was in thy footfall's sound,—
There's sadness in it now.

II.

That quivering lip, that clouded eye,
That pale and wasted cheek—
Oh! what a tale of misery
And sin and shame they speak!
Ay, speak of thee, o'er whose young head,
Ere yet by guilt defiled,
An honoured sire his blessings shed,
A holy mother smiled.

III.

And where is now the siren throng,
So full of mirth and glee,
Who filled thine ear with their wanton song,
As they spent thy substance free?
Oh! they merrily laughed as the cup they quaffed
Till they saw thy wealth run dry;
Then flung thee off, with taunt and scoff,
And bade thee work or die.

IV.

Return, thou wanderer, return!
Why shouldst thou longer roam?
The fires of love still brightly burn,
Within thy childhood's home.
Wealth in thy father's halls is stored,
And raiment rich and fair;
There's plenty on thy father's board,—
Why shouldst not thou be there?

V.

Arise! thy sin 'gainst earth and heaven
Is deep, as sin may be;
Yet not too deep to be forgiven;—
There's mercy yet for thee.
Go to thy home! thy father's heart
Waits thee with welcome there:
Go to thy God! He'll grace impart;
'Tis He who answers prayer.

MILICZIA OF PRAGUE; OR, THE BOHEMIANS IN LONDON.

AN EPISODE OF THE REFORMATION.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "A ROMANCE OF TRUTH."

I.

WHERE the noble town of Sheerness now reflects its lofty spires and handsome store-houses in the waters of the Medway, there stood, in the year 1413, only a few fishers' cottages, amongst which a substantially built two-storeyed house figured very much like a sturdy oak surrounded by copse-wood. From the structure of the walls and windows and the massive-looking front door, it was evident that this dwelling had in former days formed part of a castle, which may have witnessed many a bloody affray in the times of the barons. It was now however reduced to the humble and more peaceful destiny of being the shop and dwelling-house of Will Simpkins, a worthy citizen of London, who conducted a lucrative business as a ship chandler and marine store-dealer. These names did not exhaust the extent of his business. Not only could the sailor who came up or down the Thames or the Medway, obtain at his shop everything he wanted in the shape of eatables, but also every article of dress, from the coarsest worsted stockings to the finest duffel jacket, not to speak of the immense varieties of rope and canvas, brooms and brushes, oils, tars, soaps, &c. &c., which filled the warehouse from top to bottom.

Will was a tall, stout, broad-shouldered man, whose sinewy face, dark flashing eyes, and manly form indicated firmness of character as well as bodily vigour. Still there was a kind, mild expression in the features round his mouth which seemed to guarantee the submission of his powerful capacities to the rein of reason. Indeed throughout the neighbourhood he was known not to be so ferocious as he looked, though everybody at the same time knew that he was a terrible fellow to have dealings with, by all those who dared to dispute his theory about the liberty and rights of man. In this respect he was looked upon as a worthy son of his father, who, it was said, assisted Wat Tyler, when he occupied London with an army of 100,000 men, some thirty years before, to compel the king to give up the poll-tax. Will of course could only have been a baby then, for he was scarcely past thirty now; but no doubt there was something of Wat Tyler's spirit in him, for nobody could with greater fervour have proclaimed the doctrine of equality and liberty than he did, when among his friends. Only his arrows were never, like those of Wat, aimed at the king. He was as loyal a subject of Henry V. as could have been found in the whole of Kent. The Pope and the bishops, the monks and the clergy, and all who had embittered the life of that good man John Wycliff, and had consented to the death of William Sawtre, the first in that noble band of martyrs for true liberty, were his declared enemies. And among these there was none he hated so much as Arundel, the Archbishop of Canterbury, the tower of whose palace, at Lambeth, was continually crowded with the innocent victims of his bloodthirsty vengeance. His greatest friend was Sir John Oldcastle, Lord Cobham, that noble knight whose princely mansion, Cowling Castle, had, since William Sawtre's death, been the refuge of the "poor priests," and all who had walked in Wycliff's footprints. Nor were Arundel and the other "bloodhounds of his stamp," as Will used to call them, ignorant of the fact that Will had for the last ten years been Cobham's right hand in distributing the writings of Wycliff, which that noble and zealous lord caused to be copied at his castle and at his expense. It was well known too that among all the Lollards there was no such "damnable heretic" as Will Simpkins the store-dealer, but hitherto not one of the priests had ventured to apprehend him, for they knew that every stroke of his good sword cost a man's life, and that the two bull-dogs which lay growling night and day in their kennels in his back-yard were no fellows to joke with.

To understand Will's spirit and practice aright, it must be borne in mind that he lived in a critical time, at once political and religious. In the fifteenth century the seed of God's word, sown by the precursors of the Reformation, began to germinate, and to strike powerful roots into the heart of the nations. John Wycliff, who died in 1384, had bequeathed to the English people the Bible translated into their own tongue, and a great number of writings besides in which he taught the great, and to Rome terrible, truth, "that a Christian ought not to submit to the word of a priest, but to the word of God." The writings of this great man, multiplied by the quick pens of transcribers, not only spread through this country with all the rapidity of light, but also found their way to the then powerful kingdom of Bohemia with which England stood in close alliance, both political and commercial. The produce of that country, which, while England's trade and industry were yet scarcely born, had reached an uncommon height of prosperity, was sent down the Moldau and the Elbe from Prague in small crafts till it reached Hamburg, where large mercantile vessels took cargoes and carried them across the North Sea to London. The Bohemian sailor who in this way provided "the children of the far west" with necessaries and comforts, brought back to his own home many a written leaf which contained food for the life that endureth for ever. The writings of Wycliff became, under God's blessing, so many stars enlightening the dark sky of Bohemia, and preparing for the rising of the sun of the Reformation in Germany. It was by their light that the eyes of John Huss and Jerome of Prague were opened to the truth of the Gospel.

At the time our narrative commences the persecutions with which Rome tried to extinguish this light had just come into full operation. Wycliff had just died in time to escape the stake which was being prepared for him. His disciples, who went under the name of Lollards, i.e., singing or chanting people (perhaps because the singing of psalms formed a considerable part of their religious service, or because their preachers had got into the habit of addressing the people in a certain cadenza, which struck the medium between speaking and singing), did not allow the new doctrine to die with its first preacher. Having adopted the principle that the clergy ought to be independent of Rome, and that every preacher had a right to administer the sacraments, they dispersed themselves through the country in all directions, addressing the people in the markets and the high ways. They fought with unflinching courage against the chief errors and abuses of Rome, and especially against the luxuriousness, wantonness, and laziness of the popish clergy. They themselves led a simple life, almost verging upon poverty, so that the people called them the "poor priests." No wonder then, that they drove the great bulk of the clergy mad with anger. Still many a priest joined them, under the conviction that a "poor priest" was more like Christ than one who, like Dives, fared sumptuously every day. The conscience of the people, too, bore testimony to the truth of the new doctrine. From the towns as well as from the villages great multitudes flocked to hear the addresses of these eloquent and popular preachers. Soldiers and lawyers, noblemen and peasants, listened with pleasure to the simple truths which, like precious jewels, were brought forth from the heaps of rubbish under which they had lain buried for centuries. Encouraged by these signs of sympathy, even from the highest classes of society, the Wycliffites did not limit their zeal to mere preaching, but affixed placards to the walls of the churches, in which they stated their charges against the Pope, the priests, and the monks. This was too much for the bishops, who had long been watching for the fit moment to strike a decisive blow. No sooner did Henry IV., in 1399, push King Richard from the throne and place himself upon it, than Arundel, Archbishop of Canterbury, while putting the royal crown upon the usurper's head, said to him, "Be thou a friend to the clergy and a terror to the Lollards, and thy throne shall be established for ever." Henry believed that word. "I will be a defender of the Church," he answered; and with this speech he placed all the power which they desired in the hands of the clergy. The nobility, observing into which scale of the balance the king had put his weight, gradually abandoned the "poor priests," who were now left to the mercy of their enemies. Henry enacted that all heretics who refused to recant should be burnt alive. This was that famous 2 Henry IV., c. 15, the first Act of Parliament that was issued in England against the heretics. Its first victim was William Sawtre, a priest and a godly man, who had the courage to say, "I will not adore the cross on which Christ died, but I adore Christ who died on the cross." He was burnt alive in 1401.

This was the signal for a series of persecutions. Arundel issued his "Constitutions," in which the reading of the Bible was prohibited, and the Pope was proclaimed as being "not of pure man but of true God here on earth." The archiepiscopal palace at Lambeth had a large, lofty tower, teeming with prison-cells. These were soon filled and kept crowded with heretics, who never left those abodes of darkness and misery except to walk to the stake. Still the friends of truth continued to spread its light with unyielding faithfulness. Public preaching had become impossible, but they assembled in houses, in back-streets, in courts and lanes, in remote hamlets and villages. The common people gladly heard them preach, and of the nobility many were favourably disposed towards them, although few had the boldness to give public evidence of this disposition. The clergy had become too mighty for them, since the king had sided with the archbishop.

But there was one nobleman who, loyal to his king, yet could not sacrifice the peace of his conscience to his loyalty. That nobleman was Sir John Oldcastle, Lord Cobham, who lived at Cowling Castle on the bank of the Medway, a few miles from Rochester. He was a true knight, who in many a battle in France had maintained the honour of the English arms. In him there was no guile. To him truth remained truth, even though it was abandoned by his friends and accepted by his enemies. To him liberty of conscience was a treasure more precious than life itself. He was not a theologian nor was he a philosopher, but he was possessed of much common sense and simplicity of spirit. A plain truth, once well understood, lodged for ever in his heart. To defend it he was ready every hour of the day or night, and if the matter could not be settled by words, then he was prepared to settle it by the sword, according to the chivalric notions of that knightly age. Such a man could not have met Wycliff without becoming enthusiastic about him. He only needed to make the acquaintance of that Reformer's simple doctrine to embrace it with all his heart. After Wyclif's death he devoted all his time and a considerable portion of his income to getting his works transcribed and circulated. His castle was at all times open to the "poor priests" and especially so after the martyr death of Sawtre, when he came boldly forward as the defender and protector of the oppressed against their inhuman persecutors. He often attended their religious meetings, and, when their enemies tried to hunt them away, he kept them safe under the cover of his sword.

Such a man could not but be a thorn in the side of Arundel and the clergy. His friends—and he had many among the nobility—trembled for him. But he had nothing to fear as long as Henry IV. lived. This king had scarcely one among the noblemen of his realm whom he esteemed more or loved so much. Was it because Sir John's valiant arm had once saved his life in a brawl at Calais? Or was it because Sir John's noble and knightly character commanded the boundless admiration of the unhappy sovereign, who saw none but flatterers and hypocrites round his throne and person? Perhaps both went to form the cause. Enough that Henry IV. could see no evil in Sir John, and that Arundel was shrewd enough not to touch a man who was as the apple of the king's eye. But Henry died in the beginning of 1413, and his son and successor, Henry V., was a Pharaoh who knew not Joseph. True, he, too, in the beginning hesitated to withdraw his favour from his father's favourite; but what the value of that favour was the following chapter will show.

II.

One evening in September, 1413, there was a small assembly in Will Simpkins' dwelling-house. An old servant of his father's, who had nursed him when a baby, and felt attached to him like a mother, had pushed the heavy oak table into a corner, and laid half-a-dozen of deals across a dozen of wood blocks. These were the forms or pews of the hastily-improvised little chapel. A chair was placed upon the table. This was the pulpit from which a young man with pale face, shorn head, and in a monk's coat, proclaimed the new doctrine. A train-oil lamp, suspended from the ceiling above his head, threw a fantastic glare upon his lank form. There was no other light in the room, nor was any other light required, for those days were not like the present, when every hearer can read in his own Bible and hymn-book the texts and hymns the preacher gives out. The room was well filled, but from the dimness of the light it was difficult to notice anything of the dresses or faces of the people. Only Deborah, Will's old housekeeper, was visible from a ray of the lamp falling upon her white linen cap; and so was a portion of Will himself, as he sat next to her.

"My friends," said the preacher, "I have been a monk myself, as you must have observed, so I could tell you what monks are, and how monks live. But I won't tell you now, for I understand that William Cawtre spoke to you last week, and he knows as much of it as I do."

"Yes, William spoke here last week," said Will, "and told us all about the monks and the priests, and a wicked, drunken, lazy lot they must be."

"So they are, most of them," resumed the preacher, who did not seem at all put out by this familiar way of interrupting his discourse, "so they are most of them; but don't be too hard upon them, dear friends, for you have no conception of their ignorance. They don't know better. They are trained in the belief that they please God by shutting themselves up in a convent, by scourging their bodies at one time, and fattening them at another. And how could they know better? The Gospel is never preached to them. The Pope is their God, and the saint whom they pray to is their saviour. So it was with me until I met with the copy of the Epistle of Paul to the Romans, which Will put into my hands while passing Ave Maria-lane one day."

"Yes, I thought I would require to give it to you," observed Will, "for I had watched you going all through Paternoster-row, and as you kept standing at nearly every shop, I noticed you read the nonsense exposed for sale, and as I noticed that you could read, I thought I was bound to give you worth your while."

"Why, it was something worth my while," continued the preacher, "for I found peace, everlasting peace to my heart through it. I never found true peace in praying to Mary. I don't know how it was, but I could not help always hearing a voice whispering within me: 'She was but a woman: how could she save thee?' But Paul tells us a better story. He points us to Jesus Christ, the Son of God, and the Son of Man. He is both Man and God. He came down from heaven to save us, and He is mighty to save, for He is the true God, and has everlasting life. He was scourged for our sins. So we must no longer scourge ourselves. He paid our debt by his blood. So we must no longer pay to pope or priest, for it is all paid,—yes, it is all, all paid. Do you hear that? I must repeat it once more, that you may understand it well, and never forget it, and keep it in mind day and night, this great, all-sufficient, all-comprehending truth, viz., that it is all paid, that it is all finished, on the cross, by the blood of the Son of God, who died for us, and loved us more than father or mother could ever love us. We must not go to any human being to obtain heaven, for he alone has bought it for us. No human being, whether called Mary, or Urbanus, or Clemens, or Arundel, can give it to us, for they never bought it, nor could they, because it was bought long before them. Jesus is the only owner of that great treasure, salvation. He can save whomsoever He will. And He saves freely. He has bought Heaven at a very high price, the highest price He could give,—his own precious heart's blood—but He makes it over to us at a very cheap rate. He gives it to us for nothing. Only think of that, for nothing! I never could believe this, till I read it with my own eyes in the Epistle of the Apostle Paul. From the beginning of the Church there has been some truth in the Latin Bible, and I could have found it there, as there was a copy of it in our convent. But that big book was seldom or never looked into by any one of us, as we were all of us bad Latin scholars. It is quite true what the prior of St. Dunstan's said the other day: 'John Wycliff has, through his translation of the Bible into English, made that book more intelligible to laymen, and even to women, than it ever was before to learned clergymen.' Why, when I read that Epistle of Paul in my own mother tongue, it was to me as if a thick cloud had been suddenly taken from before my eyes, and as though I saw the most beautiful landscape, with its hills and valleys, fields and forests, lakes and rivers, spread out before me. I read not one word of Mary, nor the Pope, nor Purgatory, but everything of Jesus, his Cross, and our Salvation through Him. And when I had found this treasure, I thought I was bound to go out into the world, and tell it to everybody. So I fled from the convent, and began travelling through the country to bring the glad tidings to everyone who wanted to hear them. And I must make haste, for these are bad times; my young life may be taken away from me soon, for I find that——"

Here a rap at the door was heard. There was a rustle through the congregation, which at once rose to its feet. Meanwhile, Will opened the door, and keeping it ajar, asked:

"Anything the matter, Bob?"

"Not a bit," answered a rough voice. "There's a tall, stout fellow outside the gate, who wants to get in, as he says he knows you."

"What is his name?"

"Why, the devil may know it; I can't keep it in my memory."

"I'll go and see myself," said Will, and off he strode with his servant.

"There is no danger, at all events," said the preacher; "so resume your seats, and let me tell you something further about the way to heaven."

The preacher was just about to take up the thread of his discourse again, when the door was opened, and Will entered with a gigantic man, who surpassed him by at least half a foot in height, and had to bend his head to pass through the door.

"Here is our friend, Justus of Prague," said Will, "and a good friend he is."

"Oh, the tall Bohemian!" cried several voices joyfully, and from all sides hands came forward to be shaken. "Welcome, old friend!" cried some. "How dost thou, and how does thy soul?" asked others.

"Are you from Prague—from Bohemia?" asked the preacher, addressing the stranger from his elevated seat. "Then do you also know that good man, John Huss?"

"Don't I know him!" answered the Prague man, with a bass voice that seemed even to make the floor thrill. "It is scarcely six months since I saw him at Magdeburg, when we passed in April last."

"Is he as tall as you are?" asked Deborah, who found herself put entirely in the shade by the gigantic form of the Bohemian.

"Eh, old Deborah!" answered Justus, good-humouredly. "How do you do, old soul? Why, I cannot say Magister John Huss is as tall as I am, though he is one of the tallest of the land. But he is not nearly so stout as I am. In this respect he much more resembles you, Mr. Preacher. He is a thin, meagre man. And no wonder, he is always buried in his book-cell, and has gone through a great deal of suffering of late."

"Suffering? Was he in prison?" asked the preacher in an anxious voice. "I think you had better step up and take my place, and tell us all about that great man of God."

General applause supported this proposal. Justus placed his foot upon the table, and, having got hold of the preacher's hand, soon found himself in sight of the whole assembly. He had to sit down in the chair, however, because his head touched the ceiling when he stood upright. A blushing, weather-beaten face, hemmed in by a strong reddish beard and whiskers of the same colour, now became visible to the congregation. The head to which this face belonged turned upon a long neck, which was visible almost all over its length, till it disappeared in the blue collar of a coarse sailors' jacket, which hung loosely about two broad shoulders.

"No, thank God, John Huss is not in prison yet," he said in very fluent English, though strongly tinctured by a foreign accent, "and if he were, he would be sure never to get out again except to be roasted as a turkey, for the priests in our country don't open a prisoner's dungeon on any other occasion. But I'm afraid it won't be long before they have him in their claws, for times are hard, and even worse than they were when I saw you three years ago. You can understand that John Huss could do no good in the eyes of the archbishop since he publicly praised that good man John Wycliff, and has spread his writings with might and main."

"Hear! hear!" cried the assembly, unanimously. "Cover the whole of Bohemia with them!" cried several voices.

"Would to God we could!" said Justus; "especially since three years ago the archbishop succeeded in laying hold of more than two hundred volumes of Wycliff's writings, which were publicly burnt in the market-place under the toll of the church bells and the singing of Te Deum.

"For shame!" cried the assembly.

"So it was," continued Justus, "and among those books there were costly jewels, for they were magnificently bound, and had cost many a rixdaler, depend upon it, for the binding alone. It was a great loss to the owners, for they had paid for them with their good money, and they were their legal property. But the priests did not care about that. The Pope, you know, may rob everybody if he thinks it profitable for the Church. The university and even the king tried to speak a word to prevent the terrible destruction, but in vain. The king, however, compelled the bishop to pay the owners of the books for their loss. But the archbishop, the more exasperated, got a thunder-bolt from Rome, which excommunicated Huss. The people, however, were all John's friends, and laughed at the papal bull. They took all the papal bulls they could lay hold of, and hung them on the necks of harlots, who carried them in procession through the town. Then they laid those bulls on a cart surrounded by armed men, who cried: 'Here we carry the epistles of the greatest scoundrel and heretic to the stake!' And having arrived at the gallows-field, they put fire to the papers and burned them."

"That's right!" cried Will. "A pity they could not burn the archbishop in addition."

"Pst! Pst! No vengeance," said the preacher. "'Let us not avenge ourselves,' says the Apostle, 'for it is written, Vengeance is mine: I will repay, saith the Lord.'"

"Ah well, I don't know," muttered Will, between his teeth; but he held his peace, as he knew most of the congregation were of the same opinion as the preacher. The Lollards were on the whole a meek, submissive sort of people. Heavily persecuted as they were, they persecuted nobody.

"Our King Wenzel, too, was on John's side," continued the Bohemian, "but at length he was compelled to yield to the threats of the Pope. He advised John to leave Prague for some time, till the rage of the priests should have subsided a little. So John left Prague in December last. He has been living since with his friends, who are delighted to have him for their guest. It was owing to his wandering from castle to castle, and from one country to another, that I was so happy as to meet the beloved exile in Magdeburg. And fond as I am of my poor country yet I hope he will never return there, for I know it would be his death."

"I cordially hope with you that the Lord may spare that good man's life," said a voice apparently belonging to an old man, a father in Israel; "but if it should be the Lord's will that John Huss be offered up a sacrifice to the praise of His name, let us pray that strength and boldness may be given to him to persevere to his last breath in proclaiming the great truth of salvation. The blood of the martyrs is the seed of the Church, and perhaps the death of John Huss will prove the life of Bohemia."

"Father Henry Elmwood, will you offer up prayer for John Huss?" said the preacher to the old man. "Pray for him and for our dear brother the noble Lord Cobham, and for our other dear brethren and sisters who are sighing in the dungeons of Lambeth."

The old man yielded to this invitation with all his heart. His prayer for the servants, witnesses, and martyrs of God was humble, submissive, supplicating, yet mighty, as if besieging heaven. The sobbings, which were heard all through the room, showed that his words were supported by the feelings of those present. No wonder, indeed, for many a one prayed for a beloved brother, or a husband, or a child, now sighing in dark, damp dungeons, and never to see this world again, except by the glare of the flame which was to burn them to ashes.

A hymn was sung. The preacher pronounced a benediction, and the congregation dispersed, making way through the back-door.

"Is Lord Cobham in prison?" said Justus to Will, in a voice of distress and alarm.

"He is," answered Will.

"Impossible!" exclaimed Justus, clasping his hands upon his knees.

"It is a fact, I tell you," replied Will. "Sir John is in the Tower of London. This is the sorest stroke that ever came upon me, I tell you. I think of it day and night. It makes my bread bitter and my ale sour."

"Merciful God!" sighed Justus, "and how could it happen? Didn't the king protect him? He was the king's favourite, wasn't he?"

"He was a favourite of the late king, but not so much of the present. But Sir John, in my opinion, was imprudent. He knew that Thomas Arundel had sworn not to rest till he was dead. Now, he also knew that Arundel stood high in favour with the king. This, in my opinion, ought to have warned him to trust the king as little as the archbishop. But he continued confiding in the king, until at last the king has betrayed him. But it is rather too long to tell you all about it now, for it is late. And you never told me anything about yourself. When did you arrive?"

"This afternoon. Our ship is lying just opposite the first lime furnace."

"So you did not sail up to town at once?"

"It grew too late in the day. Besides a fog set in, so I thought I had better drop anchor and give you a call. Moreover, I have a parcel of letters from John Huss to Lord Cobham, which he requested me to be very particular in delivering, and as I thought Sir John was at Cowling Castle, I purposed to walk up with you to-morrow to his residence. But I see that's hopeless now."

"I will see you on board to-morrow," said Will. "Is your sister with you?" he added, casting a peculiar look at Justus.

"Who—Miliczia? So you haven't forgotten her yet, you rascal."

"How could I ever forget Miliczia?" answered Will, enthusiastically. "Why didn't you bring her along to-night?"

"It was too dark. Besides, she could not leave our old mother alone all night."

"I see, I see. But at all events I shall see her to-morrow morning. At eight, look out for me."

The two friends shook hands, and while Will fastened the heavy door of his house, Justus of Prague strode along in the dark to the little boat, waiting for him, and which with only a few strokes of the oars, landed him safely on the large merchantman in the middle of the Thames.

III.

The next morning, at the appointed hour, Will found himself on board the Libertas, which name was seen in big letters on the broad white flag flapping on the helm, and on the pennon that floated on the big mast. Now-a-days the vessel would be numbered among the small craft that ply up and down the Thames, but in those times she was looked upon as one of the finest and greatest ships that entered the Thames. Indeed, as Will's house figured among the fisher cottages that surrounded it, so the Libertas appeared among the vessels which ploughed the back of Father Thames. The crew which manned this big two-masted ship was quite in keeping with its size. Will counted but few among his friends who could "take his ear between their teeth." But here among the Bohemians he saw himself reduced to a middle-sized man, upon whose shoulders even the smallest of them might have rested his elbow.

No sooner had Will stepped on the quarter-deck than Justus pressed him to his bosom, and, after the German fashion, bade him a cordial welcome with a kiss on his forehead. They thereupon went down to the cabin, where two women, dressed in the national costume of the Bohemians, were sitting at a small table, which sighed under the weight of liberal hospitality. Eight o'clock in the morning then was what we now call our luncheon-hour. Ten o'clock, or at the very latest eleven, was the regular dinner-hour for all respectable people in the Christendom of the fifteenth century. One of the women was evidently enough the mother of the other. She was like her in the same way as you will be like your present photograph thirty or forty years hence. She was a beautiful old woman, of nearly three score, but Will's eye could not rest long upon her, as Miliczia was sitting next to her—Miliczia, the finest pearl of Bohemia, whom he never forgot since he had first seen her three years ago. She was a girl of seventeen then. From a child she had accompanied her late father on his voyages between Hamburg and London, so that she knew England as well as her own country, and spoke both languages with equal ease and fluency. The sea air in which she had grown up from her infancy had imparted a health and strength to her system, making her beautiful blue eyes sparkle with buoyancy and her cheeks blossom like spring-roses. Her dark-brown hair only stealthily peeped out from under a white muslin cap, which was folded and stiffened in a square form. The long white slips of this cap, after having been tied together under her chin by a red ribbon, floated down her neck and bosom, where they disappeared behind a richly-embroidered stay, which at the same time served as a jacket, and which was profusely trimmed up with red and blue and yellow tape and string. Under the stay a red checquered apron was fastened, which covered the front of a blue petticoat that came down to her ankles. The whole of her dress had something very picturesque about it, especially if seen in the open air, with the clear blue sky of Bohemia above and its ever-green fir-clad hills for a background.

The acquaintanceship of three years ago was soon renewed.

"Do you remember where we saw one another the last time?" said Will to Miliczia.

"I think I do," answered she, with a blush. "It was at a meeting at Cowling Castle."

She remembered how, together with her brother and a few sailors, he had guided her home through the dark of the night across the partly inundated fields, and how on that occasion he had often taken her on his arm like a child to carry her through the swollen streamlets, as he whispered into her ear that he wished the rivulet were as wide as the whole world, and that he had to carry her all his life long. She remembered all this quite well, and much more that he had whispered into her ear; and she confessed to herself that though she heard it at the time with surprise, she very often afterwards remembered it with pleasure. Still she could not say on seeing him again, after a lapse of three years, that her expectation was realised. He did not look nearly so meek and innocent, she thought, as he did in those days. He had acquired a roughness and fierceness in his look and manner which but for her agreeable reminiscences, would have made her frightened at him.

"We shall have no meetings there now," said the old woman, in a sad voice. "Justus tells us that the noble lord is in prison."

"You were to tell us how it came about," said Justus.

"Why, I told you that Thomas Arundel, the archbishop, had sworn not to rest till Sir John was in his claws. Knowing, however, that the king held him in favour as the people held him in honour and love, the shrewd priest ventured on no direct public attack, but set at work slyly to prepare the way for it. In the beginning of this year, immediately after the king's accession to the throne, the hypocrite assembled a Convocation, in which the present growth of heresy was debated. A petition was sent up to the king to the effect that a commission should be despatched to Oxford to inquire into the cause of this increase of heretics. This was granted at once, and the answer the commissioners brought home was, that Lord Cobham was the only cause, as he encouraged scholars from Oxford to study, to copy, and to circulate Wycliff's writings and propagate his opinions by preaching. The tiger now thought the fit moment had come to take his fatal leap. Accompanied by a large number of his wicked accomplices, he approached the king with the humble and charitable request that he should put Sir John to death for Christ's sake. But the king refused. He thought Sir John was not so bad as that, and too good, at any rate, to be burnt. He said he would reason with Sir John himself, trusting that he would put him right if there should be anything wrong. So the king sent for his lordship, and bade him change his mind and leave those new opinions alone. Upon this Sir John answered that he had ever been a dutiful subject to the king and hoped ever would be. 'Next to God,' he said, 'I profess obedience to your majesty. But as touching the Pope and his spirituality, I owe them neither suit nor service, forasmuch I know him by the Scriptures to be the great Antichrist.' Now, you may imagine how horrified the king was when he heard such language. He gave Arundel leave to proceed against his lordship with the utmost severity. Yesterday ten days, being the 11th of this month, the archbishop sat in consistory to hear Sir John's case; but Sir John did not make his appearance, and rightly so, for if the priest had to say something to him he might take a boat and sail to Cowling Castle. In the meantime Sir John drew up a confession of his faith, and went up with it to the king; but his majesty coldly pushed back his lordship's hand. 'I will not take this piece of paper,' he said; 'give it to your judges.' 'Please your majesty,' said Sir John, 'I offer, for the defence of my faith, to fight for life or death with any man living, whether Christian or heathen, your majesty always excepted.' This was a fair, noble offer, as it behoved a valiant knight like him to make; but the king, instead of accepting it as he ought, ordered him to be tied like a vagabond and led away to the Tower like a rebel. Oh, isn't it a shame for the house of Lancaster to have dealt thus with such a noble knight and true Christian!"

While giving utterance to these exclamations, Will clenched both his fists and so stamped the floor with his foot, that everything on the little table shook.

"It is a shame," said Justus; "and I should never have believed that Henry IV. would have come to that. But what are they going to do with his lordship?"

"To-morrow is the Lord's Day," said Will, "and that's no day for burning a man; but on Monday next, I am informed, his lordship will have to appear before the court to have a final trial, and then of course they will sentence him to death. Depend upon it Arundel can have no peace as long as Sir John Oldcastle, Lord Cobham, is in the land of the living."

"Will," said Justus, "I must interrupt you here, as business compels me to do so. Tide is coming up now, and the wind is favourable. We must weigh the anchor. So, if you won't sail up with us, you had better take to your boat."

"Well, I don't mind sailing up," said Will; "since it is the Lord's Day to-morrow, and I should like to be in town on Monday to know how Sir John's trial at the Dominican convent comes off. Besides, you have brought a great many nice things from Bohemia, I suppose, which you will show me in the course of the day, since I want to have a little bit of haggling with you, as in days of yore."

Justus went up to the quarter-deck to give orders to his men. The weather being mild and dry, the mother suggested that they might as well continue their conversation. So, seated on the bench on the quarter-deck opposite the caboose, that the charming panorama of the shores of the Thames might cheer up their minds, they talked, for they wanted cheering indeed in these sad times of persecution. There was also another reason why mother Zbyrna wanted to be near the caboose. She wanted to have a look now and then at what the cook was doing with the dinner, now that they were to have a guest at their table. Those looks, however, soon became so frequent that she remained in the caboose altogether, and left it to Miliczia to entertain their guest; an arrangement which Will was of course perfectly content with.

"I have always been a loyal Englishman," he said, "but since Henry could deliver up my lord to his enemies, I fear I am about to feel as deep a hatred to kings as I already do to priests."

"Hush!" answered Miliczia, lifting up her finger, as if to warn him, "you should not feel hatred to either."

"They are the oppressors of mankind," said Will, clenching his fist; "until they be cast out as dirt in the streets there will be no true liberty on earth."

"Oh yes, there is true liberty even now!" cried Miliczia, in a voice of enthusiasm. "There has been true liberty ever since Jesus was born and crucified."

"Indeed!" said Will, in a tone of surprise, and looking with amazement at the maiden's ecstatic attitude. "Then show me the man who has that liberty in our times, please."

"Why, Sir John."

"Sir John? He who is in prison, whose hands are perhaps chained to the wall, and his legs fastened in a block."

"Yes, the same," answered Miliczia. "True liberty is not the liberty of the body. It is the liberty of the spirit, when the heart is made free from sin and its service, from fear of death, from fear of men, from relying upon any other strength but the strong arm of God. In that state of liberty is Sir John's mind at present, I suppose, now that he has come to let his last props go, viz., the king's protection and his own sword, to be left alone with God, and none besides."

"So you are glad he is in prison?" said Will, looking the girl sternly in the face. "I have been thinking all the night how to get him out of that dungeon; but you would not help me even if you could, I presume."

"The Lord helping, I think I could give my life to rescue him from prison," answered the girl, in a faltering voice. Will looked in her face. Her eyes were filled with tears.

"Dearest sister!" he exclaimed, taking her snow-white hand between his, and pressing it to his bosom; "I did not mean to grieve you. I hope you will forgive me if I have hurt you. But——"

"You misunderstood my words," answered she, with a kind smile, that broke through her tears, as the sun through the morning dew. "I never said true liberty could only be found in a prison. Where Jesus is, there is the liberty of love."

"Quite true," said Will; "but not to be permitted to preach the Gospel, or even to speak one's mind except in secret in the evening or in some hidden corner of the world, and under danger of being apprehended by spies, and put in prison, and burnt to death,—that's not a state of liberty, at all events. Then, again, how many tithes must the poor people bring up all the year round to fatten the bellies of those gourmands, not to speak of the endless taxes which the kings put upon our shoulders just as often as they please. There must come an end to that; yes, there must. We are all of us creatures of one God. Why should any one of us have the right of making a slave of his brother, of preventing him from saying what he believes to be true, of binding his limbs with cords or chains, of flogging and tormenting him, of——"

"Enough, enough of that!" answered Miliczia, while a shudder passed through her frame. She remembered the tortures which, just before her leaving Prague, three young men had undergone before being burnt to death, because they had contradicted the priest during his sermon. "All these horrors would not be if Jesus had made all of us free. But that is not the case. The priests are not free, nor are the kings, nor are the people. They all serve sin, their own lusts and passions. So there must be chains and prisons, racks and stakes, for these things belong to the kingdom of the devil, who is a murderer of man. Nor will it be otherwise until the nations have learnt to love Jesus, and to worship God in His name. We, therefore, ought to speak of Jesus to everybody, to proclaim the Gospel everywhere, no matter whether kings or priests forbid it or not. We ought rather to allow ourselves to be burnt to death than to cease to call people away from the idols, to bow down at the feet of Christ."

"B-r-r-r," muttered Will, beating the hilt of his sword, that never left his side day or night, "but before they get me there!"

"Your sword can do nothing," replied Miliczia; "and as long as you place your hope in that you cannot be free yourself."

"Me not free!"

"No. You are the slave of passion. You are in the service of hatred, not of love. Jesus never told you to take the sword. He never killed his oppressors. He prayed for them. He allowed them to put Him to death, and his death has become our life. The liberty which you aim at is only the liberty of the body, the liberty of the mouth to speak and of the hands to act; but you do not seek the liberty of the heart."

"But I do."

"No, you do not; for you allow yourself to be in the service of a master who prevents you loving your enemies. You may kill them, but you cannot pray for them."

"Pray for Arundel, for instance!"

"Yes, just as Jesus prayed for the men who nailed Him to the cross, and as He prayed for you and me, who were his enemies before we knew Him."

Will rose and paced the quarter-deck. He felt the girl was right, yet he did not want to acknowledge he was wrong.

"She is an angel!" he said to himself. "Oh, she must be my wife! Indeed, I cannot live without her. I shall never be truly good until she is always with me."

IV.

Monday, the 25th of September, 1413, is a day always memorable in the history of the Reformation of England. Will's prediction was confirmed. The Consistory, with the Archbishop at its head, sentenced Lord Cobham to death. He was designed to be the first-born of that illustrious band of English noblemen who after him were to lay down their lives for Christ.

It was in the Dominican convent that this great iniquity of Antichrist took place. A crowded assembly of bishops, priests, and monks worried the noble knight all day from dawn till dusk with their scoffings, scornful reproaches, insulting questions, and tormenting insinuations.

"Confess your error!" said one of the bishops.

Sir John knelt down. His mind was heavily shaken. He perceived the importance of this day for his own soul—for the cause of Christ—for England.

"O God," he cried, lifting up both his hands to heaven, "to Thee I confess that from my early youth I have sorely sinned against Thee, through pride, through anger, through license and impurity of heart. For these transgressions I pray Thee to have mercy upon me!"

Then, rising from his knees, his eyes filled with tears, he said to the assembly—

"I do not ask your absolution, I only want that of God."

This was plain language. It was the good confession of a noble Christian knight. The priests saw it was in vain to try to intimidate such a hero. They then took to art and cunning. They tried to shake his faith through subtle sophistry. They held out great promises, they said he would be the "Preserver" of the Church of Christ if he would only give in. In vain. All their cunning devices were lost upon the unsophisticated sincerity of that simple hearted Nathanael. The primate and the priests rose, and having uncovered their heads, the sentence of death was read in the most lugubrious manner that that doleful solemnity is capable of.

"Very well," said Sir John. "You have sentenced my body, but, thanks be to the everlasting grace of God, you can do no harm to my soul!"

"Nor to thy body either, Sir John!" cried a stentorian voice.

Everybody was amazed, and everybody looked towards the corner from which that bold word had proceeded. A crowd of people thronged the doorway and even a portion of the hall in which the trial took place. An iron bar prevented them from pushing too far into the hall. As the sun had set, and the hall was only dimly lighted, the faces could not be discerned. But a tall strong man moved through the crowd to leave the place, and two soldiers of the archbishop's lifeguard followed him closely.

"Are you the man who said that word?" they asked him, when he arrived at the street.

"Suppose I were?"

A scuffle ensued. The next morning the two soldiers were found dead at the spot.

It was late in the evening when Will found himself again on board the Libertas. She was lying opposite the Tower.

"Why, you are bleeding?" cried Mother Zbyrna, pointing to his hand, across which there was a fresh cut.

"I must have got a scratch somewhere," said Will in an indifferent tone, while Mother Zbyrna opened a drawer from which she took a plaster.

"No, you must have been fighting," said Miliczia, gravely. "Your shoulder is also cut, though it seems not to have penetrated beyond the skin, thank God."

"Have you been in a brawl? Confess, now," said Justus. "You'll never learn to hold your peace, I fear."

Will told his story.

"Of course," he said to Miliczia, "I have done wrongly in your opinion. I should have allowed myself to be chopped like straw by those scoundrels."

"Not at all," she said. "You were right, I think. It was in self-defence. You have done a good deed by speaking a word of sympathy and encouragement to Sir John at that moment of death. It will have done him good. It must have been to him like a draught of cold water in the burning heat of the desert. God will bless you for it. Yes, He surely will."

While she said this her eyes sparkled.

She tendered him her hand, which he brought with enthusiasm to his lips and kissed with great devotedness.

"Justus," said Will, while he was standing on the rope-ladder to row ashore, "do you see that bay-window over there?"

It was a bright clear September evening, and the moon ruled like a queen in the sky.

"You mean the lieutenant's chamber?"

"The same. Do you see the fourth window to the left from the bay-window?"

"I do."

"That's Sir John's prison. If he would just jump down into the water, we should not forget to pick him up, eh?"

"How could he, Will? Haven't you noticed the iron staves?"

"That's the bother, you see. But think of it. Something may be done in one way or another. Good-by."

The splash of oars was heard in the water, and Will disappeared behind the numerous vessels which already crowded that part of the Thames.

After that evening the eyes of Justus, of his mother and sister, were a thousand times a day turned to that "fourth window to the left from the lieutenant's." Day and night they pondered over the question, what might be done to rescue the beloved prisoner. Miliczia spent many an hour in prayer, beseeching the Lord to tell it to her. Meanwhile Will returned to his home, where his business called him. It was made known that Lord Cobham was not to be executed before Easter next year. So, if anything could be done, there was time for preparation.

In those days, the feeling for what is seeming and proper was less developed than in ours. The manners and customs were simpler, and the daily life, especially of the middle class, was much humbler. In our time the sister or daughter of the captain of a first-class merchantman would disdain to live on board ship, and to spend her life in little else than assisting in the management of the vessel and in superintending the cargo. Miliczia, on the contrary, was not only accustomed to be a sailor with sailors, but it was also part of her duty, when arriving at the place of destiny, to walk through the town, basket on head, selling the curiosities of her country at the houses. Soon the fair Bohemian peddleress was well known to the gentlefolks of London, and especially to the young noblemen, who many a time emptied her basket and filled her pocket, just to have a chat with her and to hear her sing her national songs.

One day, it was in February, she found herself at the gate of the Tower. This was perhaps the twentieth time she had found herself there since her arrival in London, but she never had the courage to enter among the rough soldiers she saw swarming about. Still, she thought she must do so now, as time was rapidly advancing. So, taking courage, she stepped in.

"Hallo! There is our fair Bohemian!" cried a voice. "Come away, dear girl, don't be afraid!"

The voice came from an officer who from an open window kindly beckoned her to walk through the narrow passage to the inner portion of the premises. She remembered having seen him before. Indeed, she recognised him as her valiant and gallant protector against three intoxicated young noblemen, who were one day molesting her. She soon found herself in his presence, surrounded by a few other officers, who received her with great kindness and respect. Her basket was unpacked, and many articles were sold at handsome prices. Then she had to tell all about Bohemia, and the Kaiser, and the noble town of Hamburg, and how the people were dressed, and how they lived, and what songs they sang at wedding or carnival.

All this pleased the gentlemen so exceedingly that they requested her to come as often as she liked, and gave her permission to visit the Tower at any time of day. This was the very thing she desired, and she did not neglect to turn this permission to her own profit. She came nearly every day, each time extending her visit a little farther. Soon she penetrated to the inmost parts of this labyrinth of buildings, gates, passages, steps, and courts, with which she soon became as familiar as she was with the compartments of her own ship. And all who saw her, the highest officials as well as the common soldiers, were pleased with her appearance, as she was always cheerful and naïf and curious as a child.

"Dear me, what a heavy iron door, captain! That's a prison cell, I suppose."

"It is, darling."

"Is any one in it at present?"

"Here? Let me see—Number 2—yes, of course, that's Thomas Balfour's, the late king's secretary. It is nearly a twelvemonth since he came here."

"Poor man! Could I not see him? Perhaps he may buy something out of my basket that may give him pleasure. And I will sing a song to him to cheer him a little."

"Not bad, that," said another officer, laughing. "Let poor Tom have some fun, I say, John."

"Well, I don't mind. Bob is to bring him his dinner in a quarter of an hour. You may go in with him, if you like, pussy."

And soon Bob, the turnkey, was accustomed to see the fair Bohemian about dinner-time in the passage, in order to go in with him when he brought the prisoners their scanty rations. And even rough Bob was pleased to see what a comfort her words were to the poor captives, and how her melodious tunes made them for a moment forget all the misery of their position.

One evening in March, Miliczia, on entering the cabin of her ship, put down the basket quickly, and producing a slip of paper from her bosom, said to her mother and Justus:—

"Sir John gave me this to-day. Listen now: 'The staves are through. I am ready.'"

"Then let us send for Will at once," cried Justus. "Happily he is in Greenwich just now. To-morrow night it must be done."

The next evening, Will and Justus, under cover of a dense darkness, gently pushed along in a boat, till they found themselves under the well-known fourth window. Groping over the wall, they soon laid hold of a string that hung down from the window. A gentle pull from below, was followed by a responsive pull from above. Then a rope-ladder was fastened to the string, and gently hoisted up. A few minutes elapsed, and there was profound silence. Then a short crack was heard, and a gentle rush, as if somebody was gliding down the wall, and next a few heavy shakes of the rope-ladder, and down into the boat came a man, who was caught in the arms of those in the boat.

"God be praised!" he whispered. Justus immediately grasped the oars, and within a couple of minutes Sir John Oldcastle, Lord Cobham, found himself in the cabin of the Bohemian Libertas.

There was no time to be lost. The rope-ladder which was hanging down from the window would be sure to betray them. The anchor was weighed as soon as the moon peeped out, and before the escape of the prisoner was discovered next morning, the Libertas found herself, with her precious cargo, many miles down the Thames. Next day Sir John left the ship in the company of Will. He resolved, after having arranged some matters at Cowling Castle, to fly to Wales, where he was certain he would be safer than in any other part of the world.

Four years later, in April 1418, Justus and Miliczia were sitting on the grassy bank of the Moldau, enjoying a magnificent view of the venerable city of Prague. The spot, too, was visible where, nearly three years before, John Huss had been sacrificed as a burnt-offering for the name of Christ. They were recalling the faith, courage, and love of that great man, manifested even at the last moment, when the smoke, driven into his face by a gush of the wind, choked him—and a young man, who had approached them unnoticed, asked in broken German, while pointing to the place :—

"Is that the spot where Huss died?"

"It is," answered Justus in English, for he knew at once that the foreigner was a native of the "far west."

"You speak English!" exclaimed the young man in a tone of pleasant surprise. Then, looking Justus in the face—

"Why," he said. "I know you. Aren't you Justus of Prague?"

Justus now examined the stranger from top to toe, but in vain.

"Don't you remember the preacher who invited you to come upon the table at Will Simpkins'?"

"Is it you?" cried Justus, joyfully. "Sit down, sir, and tell me all about your dear noble country. When did you leave it?"

"Two months ago."

"And how is Sir John?"

"He is in heaven. He was safe for four years under the protection of his Welsh friends. The king set a price of a thousand marks upon his head, and promised a perpetual exemption from taxes to any town that should secure him, but he was never delivered up. At length, however, the archbishop succeeded in prevailing upon the Lord Powis to play Judas. He was again brought to the Tower, from which on the day of his martyrdom he walked out with a cheerful countenance. Arrived at the place of his execution, he fell upon his knees and implored God to forgive his enemies. He then stood up, and, briefly addressing the multitude, exhorted them to continue steadfast in the observance of the laws of God as contained in the Scriptures. He was slowly burnt to death upon a small fire. He praised the Lord with his last breath."

"Why didn't he stay with us?" exclaimed Justus; "he would have been safe now."

"He is still safer where he is," said Miliczia. "He has now that crown of glory which nobody can take from him. Oh, to be a martyr for Christ! What an honour! What a glory!"

A glare of joy shone from her face while she was saying these words.

"And what has become of Will?" asked Justus.

"After Lord Cobham's recapture it was discovered that he was with the Bohemians who effected Sir John's escape. So a band of soldiers was sent to his house to capture him, either dead or alive, as he was known to be a strong man and a desperate one. As they approached his house all the people of the neighbourhood ran to their arms, and a regular fight was like to ensue, when suddenly he threw away his sword, and falling on his knees cried: "Lord Jesus! Help me now!" Then, stepping on towards his enemies, he said: "Let there be no blood shed for my sake: I am ready to die." He was conveyed to the prison in the archbishop's palace at Lambeth, and there he was when I left England. But he is in heaven most likely now, for Arundel, you know, roasts his game as soon as he can."

Tears streamed down Miliczia's face.

"I am sure you loved him, as I always said," observed Justus.

"I esteemed—I liked him," she said, "but I love him now. Nor shall I love any other man henceforth. We never were united in life, but we shall be in death."

On the list of the Bohemian Martyrs the name occurs of Miliczia of Prague, burnt to death A.D. 1419.

LAST WORDS IN CANTERBURY CATHEDRAL, 1865.

BY THE DEAN.

"I am Alpha and Omega, the beginning and the end, the first and the LAST."—Rev. xxii. 13.

THERE is ever something solemnising in the thought, that it is the last time. The last gleam of the day—the last word before parting—the last look of a life—all these acquire an importance and an interest vastly beyond any which they would possess in and of themselves. The sun shone brighter before he approached his setting: the farewell word was some very ordinary one, of no real weight: the parting look was one which we would willingly otherwise have forgotten. But no noon-day splendour was so cherished in memory, as that slanting beam that disappeared in a spark of gold over the western hills: no one tone in all our converse dwelt on the ear so long and so clear, as that one word, "Good bye:" no look has ever been so often recalled, as that smile of recognition on the pallid face from whence life was taking its flight.

And so, whatever those words may be in themselves which I am about to utter here to-day, they may claim some hold on your attention perhaps, as being the last which will sound in this church in the year now ending. Another long course of human hopes and fears and interests, has passed away. We stand at another barrier of those spaces which divide our lives. A few hours, and a door will open to us, and admit us into a new field for desire, and action, and suffering, and will close behind us for ever. To-morrow we shall be in another year—not really more changed from what we are to-day, than to-day has changed us from yesterday; yet, in spite of reality, more, inconceivably more, changed. For it is not matter of fact which makes differences between one state of man and another, but it is the thoughts, and deemings, and ways of speech among men: by these we are ruled, and to these we are conformed. And besides, after all, there is, say what we will, a certain reality in our comparative measurement of ourselves at these intervals. It is matter of fact, that we are none of us the same, nor near the same, as we were when we met here standing before the last barrier of this kind, waiting admission into the year which has now passed over us. The child's limbs have knit into strength, the youth has come nearer manhood, the maiden has put on the matron, the brow of mature age has become barer and more furrowed, the aged step is not so firm. And for some the grave has opened, and their places know them no longer.

Nor is the mere passage of time to each of us all that makes a difference. The happy voices that surround us in our homes—some have sprung into life, some, alas! have been hushed for ever; over others has gathered sadness. The multitude of thoughts that are in our hearts,—those oceans that have their calms and their storms, their depths and their shallows, they too have passed through changes, and are not as they were. Some who were fainting and doubting then, have gathered trust now, and are walking in healthy communion with their God; some, whose mountain seemed strong, have been shaken, and find now in all the promises but scanty comfort; others, who trusted and obeyed when we began the year, have gone on from strength to strength, making advance in obedience and self-denial; while others again, hesitating and trifling with the momentous business of man, have passed into deeper shades of unbelief and are more than ever paralysed with irresolution for good.

No, my brothers and sisters, we are none of us what we were. Granted, that in the unbroken vigour of youth, day is as day, and year as year; granted, that in the confirmed health and strength of mature life, business goes on, and week after week passes unobserved; granted, that to the green old age the eye becomes not dim nor the natural force abated: yet if we seem to change not, our times change, and carry us with and in them. For each of us there is an inevitable day, somewhere in the line which stretches its dim perspective before our imagination, known to One only; and to that day we are year by year advancing by long steps:—a day when there will be no more spaces to traverse, no more barriers to pass through; when time for us shall be at an end, and the world shall toll its hours for us no longer. With reference to that day, we are all changed—changed by much—since we closed the door of the last year. It has come closer to us. The feet of them that shall carry us forth are nearer the door. The remaining time is shorter: shorter by all this long space which we have now traversed.

And if it may be allowed us to cast back our thoughts over a few of these breaks in the course of our lives, how different were we, how different was all around us, from our present condition! And how great will the difference also be, if we are spared yet over a few more! Our beginnings—here in this, or in any house of prayer—at first brought thither, the feeblest and least intelligent of the worshippers, and gradually taught to join in the prayers and praises of the great congregation; then taking our place, as now, fathers, mothers, grown up members of households: and then, if we may venture to look onward, will come the gradual enfeebling by infirmity or disease,—the less frequent appearance in the house of God,—the service read, and the holy rite administered, at home; then the space and the faculties narrowing, till one dim room shall be all the range, and a few sentences of the service all that the shattered powers can bear:—and so the strongest pass away; and so those who have preached, and those who have sung, and those who have listened, sink alike into silence and decay together, and are unenquired after, like the heaped leaves of the autumn that is past. So hurry onwards, so spend themselves and come again, so intertwine and crowd out one another, the alpha and omega, the beginning and the end, the first and the last.
